FOREWORD

The reports on individual country human rights practices contained herein were prepared by the Department of State in accordance with sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. They also fulfill the legislative requirement of section 31 of the Bretton Woods Agreement Act.

Because there is interest in human rights practices of all nations—those that receive U.S. foreign assistance and those that do not—these reports are being printed to assist Members of Congress in considering legislation in the area of foreign assistance.

DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs,
RICHARD G. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations.

COUNTRY REPORTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS PRACTICES

INTRODUCTION

1985 Human Rights Report

This report is submitted to the Congress by the Department of State in compliance with Sections 116(d)(1) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended.* The legislation requires human rights reports on all countries that receive aid from the United States and all countries that are members of the United Nations. In the belief that the information would be useful to the Congress and other readers, we have also included reports on countries such as Switzerland, which are not technically covered in the congressional requirement.

In compliance with a new legislative requirement in Section 505(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended by Title V of the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984 (Generalized System of Preferences Renewal Act of 1984), the 1985 reports include additional information on worker rights. While the legislation requires

* Section 116(d)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act provides as follows:

"The Secretary of State shall transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, by January 31 of each year, a full and complete report regarding --

"(1) the status of internationally recognized human rights, within the meaning of subsection (a) --

(A) in countries that received assistance under this part, and

(B) in all other foreign countries which are members of the United Nations and which are not otherwise the subject of a human rights report under this Act."

Section 503(B)(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act provides as follows:

"The Secretary of State shall transmit to Congress, as part of the presentation materials for security assistance programs proposed for each fiscal year, a full and complete report, prepared with the assistance of the Assistant Secretary for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, with respect to practices regarding the observance of and respect for internationally recognized human rights in each country proposed as a recipient of security assistance."

Section 505(c) of the Trade Act provides as follows:

"The President shall submit an annual report to the Congress on the status of internationally recognized worker rights within each beneficiary developing country."

reports on worker rights in developing countries that are beneficiaries under the Generalized System of Preferences, in the interest of uniformity, and to provide a ready basis for comparison, we have continued our practice of applying the same reporting standards to all countries on which we prepare reports.

This year there are 164 separate reports. Conditions in most countries are described up to the end of 1985; for a few countries, significant developments occurring during the first weeks of 1986 are also included. The guidelines followed in preparing the reports are explained in detail in Appendix A. In Appendix B is a discussion of worker rights reporting. Appendix C contains a list of 12 international human rights covenants and agreements. Appendix D is an explanation of the statistical tables following reports on countries which received United States bilateral assistance or multilateral development assistance within the last 3 fiscal years.

Definition of Human Rights

Human rights, as defined in Section 116(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act, include freedom from torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, prolonged detention without charges, disappearance due to abduction or clandestine detention, or the flagrant denial of the rights to life, liberty, and the security of person. Internationally recognized worker rights, as defined in Section 502(a) of the Trade Act, include (A) the right of association; (B) the right to organize and bargain collectively; (C) a prohibition on the use of any form of forced or compulsory labor; (D) a minimum age for the employment of children; and (E) acceptable conditions of work with respect to minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health. (Categories A and B are covered in Section 2b of each report, C in Section 1d, and D and E in the discussion of the economic, social, and cultural situation.)

In addition to discussing the topics specified in the legislation, our reports, as in previous years, cover other internationally recognized human rights and describe the political system and the economic, social, and cultural situation of each country. In other words, these reports deal with the basic standards by which to measure a government's relationship to its people. In applying these standards, we seek to be objective. But the reports unashamedly reflect the American view that the right of self-government is the basic political right, that it is legitimate only when grounded on the consent of the governed, and that government thus grounded should not be used to deny people life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Individuals in a society have the inalienable right to be free from governmental violations of the integrity of the person; to enjoy civil liberties such as freedom of expression, assembly, religion, and movement, without discrimination based on race or sex; and to change their government by peaceful means. The reports also take into account the fact that terrorist and guerrilla groups often violate human rights; such violations are no less reprehensible if committed by violent opponents of the government than if committed by the government itself.

We have found that the concept of economic, social, and cultural rights is often confused, sometimes willfully, by repressive governments claiming that in order to promote these "rights" they may deny their citizens the right to integrity of the person as well as political and civil rights. There exists a profound connection between human rights and economic development; and these reports devote extensive attention to the economic, cultural, and social situation in each country in order to provide the full context in which human rights performance may be judged. Experience demonstrates that it is individual freedom that sets the stage for economic and social development; it is repression that stifles it. Those who try to justify subordinating political and civil rights on the ground that they are concentrating on their economic aspirations invariably deliver on neither. That is why we consider it imperative to focus urgent attention on violations of basic political and civil rights, a position given renewed emphasis in 1985 by the 1984 Congressional Joint Resolution on Torture. If these basic rights are not secured, experience has shown, the goals of economic development are not reached either.

United States Human Rights Policy

From this premise, that basic human rights may not be abridged or denied, it follows that our human rights policy is concerned with the limitations on the powers of government that are required to protect the integrity and dignity of the individual. Further, it is in our national interest to promote democratic processes in order to help build a world environment more favorable to respect for human rights and hence more conducive to stability and peace. We have developed, therefore, a dual policy, reactive in the sense that we continue to oppose specific human rights violations wherever they occur, but at the same time active in working over the long term to strengthen democracy. It is in this context that I want to pay tribute to my predecessor, Elliott Abrams, Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs from 1981 to 1985, who played a critical role in helping define a consistent and coherent human rights policy that took into account both our country's national interests and the altruistic sentiments of the American people, who want their Government to identify itself with decency, fairness, and justice throughout the world.

Mr. Abrams is also to be credited with helping devise a human rights policy that is both realistic and effective, one that seeks real progress toward our human rights goals by using those means that have the greatest chance of success in a given circumstance. In much of the world, the United States has a variety of means at its disposal to respond to human rights violations. We engage in traditional diplomacy, particularly with friendly governments, where frank diplomatic exchanges are possible and productive. Where we find limited opportunities for the United States to exert significant influence in bilateral relations, we resort to public statements of our concerns, calling attention to countries where respect for human rights is lacking. In a number of instances, we employ a mixture of traditional diplomacy and public affirmation of American interest in the issue.

The United States also employs a variety of means to encourage greater respect for human rights over the long term. Since 1983, the National Endowment for Democracy has been carrying out programs designed to promote democratic practices abroad, involving the two major United States political parties, labor unions, business groups, and many private institutions. Also, through Section 116(e) of the Foreign Assistance Act, funds are disbursed by the Agency for International Development for programs designed to promote civil and political rights abroad. We also seek greater international commitment to the protection of human rights and respect for democracy through our efforts in the United Nations and other international organizations.

Preparation of these annual Country Reports constitutes an important element of our human rights policy. The process, since it involves continuous and well-publicized attention to human rights, has contributed to the strengthening of an international human rights agenda. Many countries that are strong supporters of human rights are taking steps of their own to engage in human rights reporting and have established offices specifically responsible for international human rights policy. Even among countries without strong human rights records, sensitivity to these reports increasingly takes the form of constructive response, or at least a willingness to engage in a discussion of human rights policy. Experience has thus demonstrated that Congress did indeed act wisely in calling upon the State Department to prepare these Reports.

for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs

AFRICA

ANGOLA*

Since its independence from Portugal in 1975 the People's Republic of Angola has been ruled by the small group who lead its only recognized political party, the Marxist-Leninist Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). All major policy decisions are made by the party central committee and the political bureau. President Jose Eduardo dos Santos is both Head of State and chief of the MPLA. In December, the MPLA held its Second Party Congress and enlarged the central committee to 90 members.

In 1985, there was further intensification and expansion of the civil war, now in its 10th year, between the Government and the main opposition force, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), with drastic effects in terms of human suffering. Reportedly more than 2,000 persons on either side were killed in the fighting in 1985. Each side accused the other of killing civilians and committing atrocities. The government forces undertook a major offensive during the dry season (July-September), recapturing the Cazombo salient, but suffering defeat at Mavinga. UNITA continued guerrilla activities throughout the country directed at the political and economic infrastructure.

A number of civilians also died in the hostilities between the Southwest Africa People's Organization (SWAPO--a Namibian resistance movement with bases in Angola) and South Africa, which illegally controls the territory of Namibia on Angola's southern border. During 1985, South Africa conducted repeated cross-border raids into Angola, including an unsuccessful commando attack in May on the U.S. oil facilities in Cabinda and two major interventions in southern Angola during the dry season offensive in September.

The Angolan Government receives extensive military assistance from the Soviet Union, estimated at more than $2 billion in the past two years, and in the 1985 offensive Soviet advisors played an increased role in planning and directing military operations. An estimated 35,000 Cuban military personnel provide logistical support, training, and advice to government forces and garrison key strategic population and economic centers. They also occasionally take part in combat operations. UNITA, led by Jonas Savimbi, apparently has the allegiance of a substantial portion of the population and now controls approximately one-third of Angola's territory. UNITA has stated publicly that it favors a government of national unity and has not sought to establish an alternate government.

The escalation of the war has severely disrupted the economy and government administration. The low world market prices of oil and diamonds, the two principal sources of Angola's revenue, and the serious disruption in food production and transportation infrastructure caused by the hostilities have exacerbated this serious economic situation. Drought has also been a factor in reducing food supplies. Oil provides the country with 90 percent of its foreign exchange, and oil production and exploration have continued, with new discoveries reported in 1985 off the northwestern coast of Angola. As

*The United States does not maintain diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of Angola and thus has no diplomatic personnel in country to monitor human rights conditions or to evaluate allegations of abuses.

fighting has escalated, the Government has devoted an even larger portion of its financial resources to the military.

The increased fighting in 1985 also led to a continued deterioration in respect for human rights. Some 200,000-500,000 persons in central, eastern, and southern Angola have been displaced from their homes as a result of civil strife and drought. Both the MPLA and UNITA have made efforts to provide humanitarian assistance to these displaced persons.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The escalation of the war in Angola has resulted in numerous allegations that government, UNITA, and South African forces have killed civilians and that the MPLA and UNITA have executed political prisoners. While there is little specific substantiation of the various claims and counterclaims, circumstantial evidence indicates that the internal parties have on some occasions arbitrarily executed prisoners.

The fighting has also resulted in hundreds of civilian deaths. Undoubtedly, some of these deaths were inadvertently caused by military operations, but others have been deliberately perpetrated by the opposing forces in order to intimidate civilian populations. Roads are mined in many places, and civilians have died as a result of guerrilla actions, such as attacks on trains. There are no reliable casualty figures. UNITA and the MPLA have both publicly and repeatedly accused each other of practicing terrorism against their respective supporters, including killing or maiming civilians. UNITA has also charged that Cuban forces have been involved in attacks on civilians.

b. Disappearance

There is no information to confirm that abductions, secret arrests, or clandestine detentions are practiced by government security agencies or by UNITA, although both sides have accused each other of such practices.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Persistent allegations have been made of torture and mistreatment in Angolan prisons, but information is insufficient to determine the extent to which torture is practiced by the police, security services, and armed forces.

Angolan prisons are overcrowded, with substandard diet and sanitation, but these conditions seem to reflect the poor state of the economy rather than deliberate maltreatment. Some reports have alleged that foreigners are not well treated, but Americans who have been imprisoned in Angola have been relatively well-treated and have had access to medical care.

Prison authorities reportedly have wide latitude in the treatment of prisoners. Treatment of political prisoners in the prisons controlled by the Ministry of State Security is alleged to be harsher than treatment in the regular prisons. Mistreatment reportedly includes solitary confinement, confiscation of personal effects, physical intimidation, including beatings and threats, and prolonged interrogation with the use of force. Prison visits appear to be arbitrarily restricted in many instances. Foreign advisors, including Cubans and East Germans, are involved in assisting Angolan state security services and may be involved in helping to run state security prisons. The Government continues to put captured UNITA supporters on public display. Amnesty International protested the parading of five UNITA soldiers in front of a stadium crowd in Benguela after their trial in April.

Very limited information is available on the situation and administrative structure within UNITA-held areas. It is known, however, that UNITA holds a number of foreign and government prisoners, captured in the course of military operations, in makeshift facilities in its areas of control in Southeastern Angola. There are no reports that UNITA has mistreated its prisoners. During 1985 UNITA cooperated with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in releasing foreign prisoners it held. None of the released alleged mistreatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Two of the most persistently and frequently reported charges of human rights violations have been arbitrary arrest and imprisonment without due process. Numerous reports allege that individuals are arrested and imprisoned on suspicion or denunciation by others and, in some cases, held for years without being notified of the charges against them. In its 1985 report, Amnesty International stated that unofficial sources estimated that more than 1,000 political detainees were held in detention centers in Luanda and provincial capitals and in rural detention camps in 1984.

Under Angolan law, persons suspected of committing serious acts against the security of the State may be held by the Ministry of State Security without charge for an initial period of 3 months, renewable for a further period of 3 months. Such detainees need not be presented to a judge within 48 hours of their arrest, as otherwise stipulated in the code of criminal procedure, and apparently have no right to challenge the grounds of their detention by invoking provisions of the habeas corpus code. After 6 months' detention without charge, the detainee must be informed of the accusations against him, with the state security service either informing the public prosecutor of the charges against the suspect or releasing him. Once the case is presented to the public prosecutor, there does not appear to be a specific time limit within which the suspect must be brought to trial. Many political detainees have reportedly been held for years without being tried. The exact number is not known.

The deterioration of the security situation has contributed to demise of judicial safeguards and due process. The Government has established regional military councils throughout much of Angola. They are responsible directly to President Dos Santos and have broad authority to restrict the movement of people and goods, to requisition people and goods without compensation, and to try crimes against the security of the State. The Government has also created "people's vigilance brigades" for urban areas, whose powers are not clear, but include general administration and "protecting the people and ensuring public order and stability."

ANGOLA

In 1984, the Angolan Government was cited by the International Labor Organization (ILO) in Geneva for being in violation of ILO Convention 105, which prohibits forced labor. The basis of this citation is Angolan legislation, still in force, which provides for the imposition of penal sanctions involving compulsory labor for breaches of labor discipline and participation in strikes.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution states that no citizen shall be arrested and brought to trial except under the terms of the law, and it guarantees the right of the accused to defense counsel. There is, however, insufficient evidence to determine to what extent these rights exist in practice. Amnesty International expressed concern in its 1985 report that trials of government opponents do not conform to internationally recognized trial standards. In particular, defendants reportedly were not given adequate opportunity to present their defense or appeal their cases. The right of appeal exists in some cases, but Amnesty International reports that some political prisoners were apparently executed in 1984 without appeal. Judicial lines of authority are unclear, especially since the new regional military councils have been given responsibility for the trial of offenses against the security of the State, including "economic crimes." It is not known which trials are open to the public and under what rules of procedure the various military and civilian courts operate. The Constitution provides for a People's Supreme Court, but its jurisdiction is not known.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although the Constitution guarantees the inviolability of the home and privacy of correspondence, arbitrary searches of homes have been reported, and there is some interference with private correspondence, either through censorship or interruption of mail delivery.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of expression "in the context of the achievement of the basic objectives of the People's Republic of Angola." Censorship exists, and the Government runs the media. Opposition views are not tolerated. The prominent Angolan writer Fernando Costa de Andrade Ndunduma, who was arrested in late 1982 for a play critical of the President, was never brought to trial and was held uncharged for 2-1/2 years before being released in January. Amnesty International is investigating the case of Bartolomeu Dias Fernandes, accused of "insulting the head of state" and of "fractionalism" and sentenced in April to 6 years in prison.

The Government is especially sensitive to criticism in the foreign press. Since independence in 1975, Angola has restricted the travel of foreign correspondents to Angola and has occasionally expelled foreign reporters, e.g., a reporter from Agence France-Presse was expelled in November. Angola endorsed the Kadoma Declaration in July 1983, banning the travel of South Africa-based correspondents to the "Front Line"

ANGOLA

States, (Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe). The circulation of Western journals and periodicals in Angola is tightly restricted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is denied to any political group or movement other than the MPLA. All other political movements have been banned. There are numerous unconfirmed reports of arrests of people who voice support of opposition movements or alternative political systems. The recently established people's vigilance brigades and the martial-law climate throughout the country tend further to restrict freedom of assembly and association.

The only trade union movement in Angola is the National Union of Angolan Workers, which is controlled by the MPLA and is a member of the continent-wide, Ghana-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity. Traditional labor union activities are tightly controlled by the Government. Strikes are prohibited by law as a crime against the security of the State.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Constitution guarantees the inviolability of freedom of conscience and belief and provides for separation of church and state, the Government publicly emphasizes the importance of propagating "atheism" and has been critical of religious activities. The overwhelming majority of the Angolan population is Christian, however, and the Government has not moved to close down churches. Church services are regularly held, and there is widespread attendance. Foreign and Angolan missionaries are allowed to carry out their normal activities. Reportedly UNITA respects the freedom of religion in the areas it controls, but the ability of religious personnel to carry out activities in Angola has certainly been circumscribed by the intensification of the civil war.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

As a result of the increased fighting, the Government is acutely security-conscious and has tightly restricted travel, notably through the regional military councils. Travel by road in most areas of Angola is dangerous. There is a pass system within Angola, and foreigners are generally prohibited from traveling outside the principal cities. UNITA has publicly warned that it considers all of Angola to be a war zone and that it cannot guarantee the safety of persons traveling there.

Angolan citizens are allowed to travel abroad, but this travel is carefully controlled by restrictions on issuance of passports and exit visas and by currency restrictions. Emigration is restricted. The Government limits travel to Angola through a selective and stringent visa policy. Angola is a signatory to the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees. There are currently approximately 70,000 Namibian, 20,000 Zairian, and 6,000 South African refugees in Angola. Since mid-1980, between 120,000 and 150,000 former Zairian refugees in Angola returned home under the auspices of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

Approximately 200,000 Angolans have taken refuge in Zaire since 1975, and an estimated 73,000 have taken refuge in Zambia. Of the estimate total of 400,000 Angolans who have left the country since independence, the Government claims that 180,000 have returned, but this claim cannot be verified.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change their government. Angola is ruled by a small group of officials within the party apparatus of the ruling Marxist-Leninist MPLA. The Constitution provides for popular participation in the political process, but the MPLA is the only legal party, and activities by all opposition groups have been banned.

In effect, political activity is limited to participation in the party or in one of its controlled and sanctioned organizations such as its youth wing, the Angolan Women's Organization, or the trade union movement. Political power is centered in the elite membership of the politburo and the somewhat larger central committee. Party membership is very restricted, with under 30,000 members out of a population of 7 million, according to the official media. The Constitution provides that the popularly elected national People's Assembly, established in 1981, is to be the supreme organ of state power. There are also people's assemblies at the provincial and local level. Only candidates chosen and endorsed by the party are elected to the people's assemblies, and key members of the party also hold leadership positions in the people's assemblies. The people's assemblies endorse measures proposed by the party at the national and local levels.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has allowed the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) to operate in areas it controls, and UNITA allows the ICRC to operate in areas it controls or is contesting. Amnesty International stated in its 1985 Report that it is concerned about the imprisonment of people for criticizing government policies or officials, long-term detention without trial, unfair political trials, and mistreatment of prisoners. Amnesty International has also appealed for commutation of death sentences imposed by the People's Revolutionary Tribunal and military courts and the need to respect the right of appeal, especially in capital cases. Amnesty International was also concerned over apparently arbitrary detention by UNITA forces of civilians not involved in the conflict. Freedom House rated Angola "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Angola's population of 7.9 million is growing at the rate of 3 percent a year. Gross national product per capita in 1983 was approximately $888, but this reflects the oil revenues from the Cabinda field and has little meaning to the bulk of the population in the midst of civil war. Many rural inhabitants have abandoned the countryside to seek food and safety in urban areas, such as Luanda, which have been overwhelmed by the influx. As a result of the rural exodus, crops are not being planted. There are severe food shortages in urban areas, and public services are severely taxed. In these circumstances,

ANGOLA

Angola in 1985 continued efforts to obtain food assistance from Western countries and various international organizations.

The MPLA has established as its goal the transformation of Angola into a "socialist" economy, and the major sectors of the economy--oil, diamonds, and banking--have been nationalized. However, the Government has encouraged substantial Western investment, notably in oil production, in order to develop its economic and industrial infrastructure. The right to private property is guaranteed by the Constitution, and a small portion of the economy, mainly in the agricultural sector, still operates under private ownership.

The intensification of the fighting has devastated the country's infrastructure and has forced the Government to divert most of its assets to the military. Payments to the Soviet bloc for military equipment and for the Cuban combat troops have become a recognized burden on the economy. Although thousands of civilian Cuban and East European advisors are working in technical and professional positions, Angola still faces a critical shortage of skilled manpower. Of the approximately 500,000 Portuguese residents prior to independence, only 30,000 remain.

With a high infant mortality rate of 143 per 1,000 live births, life expectancy at birth is only 43 years. Adequate health care is available to only a small fraction of the total population. The current literacy rate is estimated at about 30 percent, and there is high level--90 percent--enrollment in primary schools in noncombat areas. In 1982, there were more female children in primary school (92 percent) than male (85 percent).

There is no information available on working conditions in Angola.

Women participate in the MPLA, not only in the Angolan Women's Organization, but also in the higher levels of the party. Women were given more positions in the top leadership by the Second Party Congress.

Both the MPLA and UNITA have primarily ethnic bases of support--the MPLA among the Kimbundu, and UNITA among the Ovimbundu. While they have worked with mixed success to broaden popular support, both groups show political favoritism towards their own ethnic group. There are no formal ethnic or racial restrictions on participation in the political process, and whites and mesticos occupy a number of high-level positions within the MPLA.

BENIN

Following independence from France in 1960, Benin experienced considerable political instability and numerous changes in government until 1972, when the army staged a decisive coup that brought the present Government, headed by President Mathieu Kerekou, to power. In 1974, the new leadership declared the establishment of a Marxist-Leninist Government under the direction of a single political party, the People's Revolutionary Party of Benin. Despite the imitation of certain political structures, Benin's Marxism thus far bears little resemblance to that of the U.S.S.R. The party itself is directed by a small leadership group in which the influence of the military remains important. It controls the selection of candidates for the National Assembly and local government bodies.

Early efforts at radical political and social transformation in the mid-1970's encountered widespread resistance and resulted in significant erosions of political and personal liberties. An unsuccessful coup attempt in 1977 was followed by a period of intense suspiciousness toward foreigners and domestic critics. In recent years, however, the authorities have exhibited greater tolerance of divergent social and political views. In August 1984, the Government amnestied all political detainees with the exception of those implicated in the 1977 coup attempt.

Benin is one of the world's poorest countries; its underdeveloped economy is largely supported by subsistence agriculture (80 percent of the population lives in rural areas), a small commercial sector and recently oil production, located offshore near Cotonou. Economic activity has been hampered by the Government's efforts to institute centralized controls. In 1985, mounting balance-of-payments problems and rising debt service costs led the Government to enter into negotiations with the International Monetary Fund to reduce the number of state enterprises and to encourage foreign private investment.

The human rights situation did not improve in 1985. The Government viewed developments in early 1985, in particular activism by students at the National University, as threatening to political stability and public order. It responded with a series of extraordinary security measures, including closing the National University and expelling of 18 students for subversive activities. According to some reports, clashes between demonstrators and police in May resulted in the deaths of two youths and one security officer. The student unrest reflected in part dissatisfaction with government austerity measures intended to address the country's worsening economic and financial difficulties. Suspicion that outside elements may have been behind the strike also led the Government to reissue regulations governing access by Beninese citizens to foreign diplomatic missions. The implementation of these and other security measures occasioned numerous allegations of human rights violations.

BENIN

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance or secret arrests.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been several reports alleging that students and others arrested in the wake of the student demonstrations in April and May were subjected to cruel or unusual punishment. Information from several sources suggests strongly that one student died as a result of injuries suffered during interrogation by security personnel. It does not appear, however, that these or other reported excesses were ordered by the political authorities. Prison conditions in Benin are very poor; sanitation facilities are inadequate; there is overcrowding; and the prison food supply is inadequate unless supplemented by friends or relatives. Physical punishment reportedly occurs. There is no evidence of discrimination against prisoners on the basis of sex, religion, or national origin.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Benin's legal system provides for the review of detentions by a court of law in all but a few sensitive political cases. The Constitution states that no citizen may be arrested without an order of arrest by an established judicial body. In practice, however, persons have been detained, some for extended periods, without recourse to legal assistance or judicial hearing. Most of these arrests have occurred during periods of political tension. Periods of incarceration are at the discretion of the authorities. Although arrests are not publicized, no special attempt is made to keep them secret.

A large number of arrests were made in the wake of the 1985 student strike as a result of the Government's tightened security measures. Most of these were for minor infractions, such as the inability to produce required identity papers. A number of persons were arrested for failing to heed a newly revived order requiring all Beninese to obtain prior government authorization before seeking entry to foreign diplomatic missions. In most cases, people arrested under these measures were detained only briefly. In contrast, an estimated 30 to 40 persons, suspected of complicity in the student strike, including some teachers and university professors as well as students, were detained for periods of up to 3 months, apparently without specified charges having been brought against them. Reportedly, most of these detainees have since been released, except for three self-proclaimed leaders of the student strike, but this has not been confirmed.

There were several other reports in 1985 alleging the denial of prompt trials, including two publicized cases of top officials of state enterprises for possible corruption. Both had been released by the end of 1985. In such cases, the courts are normally denied a role pending dispositions taken by the political leadership. There were reports in December 1985 that the Government had also detained a number of persons allegedly associated with a radical leftist group.

There were no reports in 1985 alleging the use of forced labor, which is prohibited under Beninese law.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Benin's judicial system is allowed to function independently in all but sensitive political cases. In such instances, detainees may or may not be permitted legal counsel or granted a public hearing. There is no time limit with respect to charging a defendant or on bringing the accused to trial. In recent years, the Government has used only the established civilian "revolutionary court" system. Courts are organized on provincial and national levels, and there are future plans for the courts at the district level once sufficient judges have been trained. The highest court of appeal is the Central People's Court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although Benin's Constitution provides for safeguarding the inviolability of the home and calls for warrants to be obtained from a judge before the police can enter a residence, there have been occasional unconfirmed reports of forced entries in sensitive political cases. Other reports indicate that security police monitor telephones and the mail of suspected persons. There are no other known types of interference with the home or family.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

With two exceptions, the local press, radio, and television are all government-owned and operated. The exceptions are a weekly paper published by the Catholic church and Echo, a monthly journal of opinion circulated throughout West Africa. While both treat political issues, they do so with circumspection. The official media carry only those stories that are approved by, or serve the interests of, the party-state. Opposition to government policies and open criticism of the Government are not tolerated. Academic freedom on nonpolitical issues, however, is permitted, and there normally is no censorship of foreign books and artistic works. One exception in 1985 involved an attempt to prohibit distribution of a European journal which carried a report critical of the Government's detention of a former Beninese bank official. Foreign radio broadcasts are readily available to much of the population through shortwave radio. No attempt is made to interfere with radio reception.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All meetings of a political nature must be sponsored by the single political party. Although organized public opposition to the Government itself is not permitted, there are numerous examples of groups which have organized to protest specific government policies or actions. In recent years, the Government has welcomed the formation of a wide variety of private social, service, and professional organizations (including Lions and Rotary), many of which maintain active international affiliations. There is no known persecution of professional groups.

Labor unions are organs of the party and unified under a general labor organization, the Union Nationale des Syndicats des Travailleurs du Benin (UNSTB). Although controlled by the Government, individual local unions negotiate with individual employers on labor matters and represent workers' grievances to employers and to the Government. The Government often plays the role of arbiter.

Although the right to strike is not explicitly denied, it is clear that labor strikes are not sanctioned. The Constitution of 1977 states that "union activities are guaranteed to workers" but "must be used for the elevation of the conscience of the proletarian class and for the augmentation and continued development of production." When labor actions occasionally occur in Benin (usually by students rather than workers), they take the form of brief work stoppages to protest such things as late salary or scholarship payments.

Christianity, Islam, and traditional religions all coexist in Benin, and adherence to a particular faith does not confer any special status or benefit. With the exception of one group, Celestial Christianity, which has been declared illegal by the Government, there are no restrictions on religious ceremonies or teachings, and religious conversion is freely permitted.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Domestic movement is not restricted. International movement is controlled in that a passport and exit permission must be obtained for travel to other than West African countries but obtaining them is not difficult. Economic rather than governmental constraints usually preclude travel outside the region. There are no restrictions placed on residence within Benin, except for recently released prisoners who may be subject to travel restrictions.

Emigration is a way of life in Benin. Many Beninese move to neighboring countries to earn their livelihood, and their citizenship is not revoked. Beninese who live abroad are encouraged to return home to help develop their country, but only a small number have returned. In 1985, there were many more refugees in Benin than usual. Almost 100,000 Ghanaians from Nigeria transited Benin and were given limited assistance by the Beninese Government. About 200 Chadian refugees, who came to Benin during the past several years, are now more or less permanently settled, although they are still free to return to Chad according to Beninese law.

Leadership is exercised by President Kerekou and a small group of senior officials, many of whom also hold positions in government. The electoral process allows for citizen participation in the nomination of candidates for the National Revolutionary Assembly, in theory the principal decisionmaking body of the Government. Party membership is not a requisite for participation in this process or for high office or civil service employment. The final selection of candidates for the single national slate, however, is made by the party leadership. No opposition parties or slates are permitted. The Assembly itself rarely takes issue with policies formulated by the political leadership.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government considers any outside attempt to investigate human rights practices an interference in its internal affairs. Amnesty International's 1985 report (covering 1984) cited the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience and other political prisoners detained without trial, unfair trial practices, and ill-treatment of prisoners as its major concerns. All of the prisoners whose cases were taken up by Amnesty International were released on August 1, 1984 in a presidential amnesty. The Government occasionally denounces alleged human rights abuses in other areas of the world, e.g., Grenada. Freedom House rates Benin "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Benin's 4,015,000 population is growing at the rate of 3.1 percent annually. Over 80 percent of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture. The estimated annual per capita income was only $290 in 1983. Although in 1979 an estimated 65 percent of the population was below the absolute poverty level, these statistics are unreliable since much of the country's income derives from informal trade with neighboring countries which is not reported and is not reflected in official government figures.

Benin has made a major effort to address health and education problems. There is free or nominally priced medical care in Benin, and a system of old-age benefits has been established. Clinics have been set up throughout the country, many with assistance from foreign governments. In 1985, life expectancy at birth was estimated at 49 years, and the infant mortality rate was 143 per 1,000 live births. Twenty percent of the total population had access to safe water in 1980, with 26 percent in urban areas and 16 percent in rural areas. A 1977 estimate showed calorie supply as a percentage of requirements at 92 percent.

An active literacy program is in operation in Benin. In 1980, it was estimated that 28 percent of the adult population were literate, 40 percent of all males and 17 percent of all females. In 1982, primary school enrollment was estimated at 68 percent of the primary school-aged population: 95 percent of all boys and 43 percent of all girls.

The Government has given vigorous support to policies designed to improve the conditions of average workers in both the industrial and agricultural sectors. It has, for example, committed itself to the gradual extension of free or low-cost medical care and social services; legislated minimum wage levels and occupational safety conditions; and established procedures and mechanisms for the protection of worker rights.

including legislation prohibiting child labor. The Beninese labor code implicitly defines a "minimum age" by authorizing participation in the social security system beginning at age 14, and the civil service administration will not hire persons under 18. In many instances, however, the Government's ability to enforce these policies and regulations is limited by a lack of administrative and financial resources and by the need for the entire family to farm subsistence plots of land.

Historically, Beninese women have played a major role in the commercial sector. While there are no women in ministerial positions, a number of women figure prominently in executive-level positions in the presidency and the various ministries. There are only two women on the central committee of the party.

BOTSWANA

Botswana is a multiparty democracy with free elections, an independent judiciary, a police force, and a small, well-disciplined army subservient to civilian authority. Under the Constitution, executive power is vested in the President, chosen in a national election for a 5 year term, most recently in 1984. The President, currently Quett K.J. Masire, selects the Cabinet from the National Assembly. One party continues to dominate the country's politics; the Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) has held a majority in the National Assembly since independence in 1966 and now controls 28 of 34 elective seats.

Botswana encourages private enterprise and free trade. All citizens, including those whites who accepted Botswana citizenship, are free to participate in the economic and political life of the country. More than 83 percent of the population lives in rural areas and is dependent on some form of agricultural activity.

Botswana's human rights record generally remains excellent. Citizens receive equal protection under the law; domestic political violence is unknown; public debate, including in the press, is lively; and several women hold positions of importance in the public and private sector. For more than a decade, Botswana has been a haven for refugees from the political and military strife of neighboring countries. South African actions, including the South African Defence Force raid on Gaborone in June 1985 and two bombings which the Government of Botswana attributed to South Africa, have neither destabilized Botswana's Government nor encouraged restrictive measures.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The Government of Botswana has never been accused of involvement in political killings. There is no guerrilla or insurgency activity.

b. Disappearance

The Botswana Constitution provides for the protection of personal liberty. There have been no allegations of secret arrests or clandestine detentions.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reports of improper treatment by the police of criminals or criminal suspects during 1985. Prison conditions allow for adequate diet, health care, and visits from family members. Jails are sometimes crowded, however, and inmates with no relatives to see to their needs may encounter difficulty in arranging for assistance. Flogging is permitted for infractions of prison rules and is a mandatory punishment for rape, attempted rape, armed robbery, burglary, housebreaking, and related offenses. No summary executions have occurred.

BOTSWANA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Botswana Constitution contains a provision protecting citizens from arbitrary arrest. Preventive detention is illegal. There is a functioning system of bail, and defendants have access to lawyers of their own choosing. As required by law, the police bring a suspect before a magistrate for charging within 48 hours of his arrest. Suspects must be released after 48 hours unless the magistrate issues a warrant of detention which is valid for 14 days. Every 14 days, the police must appear before the magistrate and show that they are making progress in the case. To date, there have been no known instances of abuse of this system. Forced labor is illegal in Botswana.

The right to a fair public trial is provided by law and is honored in practice. Defendants are entitled to counsel; consultation between defendants and counsel may be held in private. The judiciary is independent of the executive and military. The High Court has ruled that one may not be compelled to testify against oneself. Moreover, silence cannot be construed as proof of guilt, and the burden of proof remains on the prosecution. All trials are held in public. Provisions exist for conducting closed trials on matters relating to national security or if a minor is charged with a crime; the High Court provides oversight of these cases.

In September, a judge warned that he might impose gag rules on a participant in the court's proceedings because of the sensational newspaper coverage given to a trial in which the defendant alleged that high government officials were guilty of improprieties. The High Court has made no comment on this warning. No citizen of Botswana has been exiled since the country's independence.

There is also a system of traditional tribal courts, presided over by chiefs, where jurisdiction is limited to minor offenses.

There are no political prisoners in Botswana.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Rights of privacy are safeguarded by law and respected in practice. A search warrant issued by a magistrate is required for an official to enter a private residence, except in cases of suspected diamond theft or drug trafficking. However, there have been no reported instances in which this exception was used during 1985.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedoms of speech and of the press are guaranteed by the Constitution and are respected in practice. The government-owned newspaper (in English and Setswana) continues to print statements from all opposition parties. Three independent newspapers are published on a weekly or semi-weekly basis, all of which publish articles representing a wider range of views than the government-owned daily. Recent coverage of the Government's decision to force two persons--one a businessman, the other a journalist--to leave Botswana sparked a heated debate, especially in the National Assembly, on the role of the press. Government spokesmen have confined comment to stating that national security interests were involved in these expulsions and that press interests must be subordinated to national security interests. This latter statement led to a further round of press editorials critical of the minister's statement.

BOTSWANA

Botswana has signed the Kadoma Declaration which bans entry of journalists from South Africa, though it has not enforced the ban. In its first application of some of the principles of the Kadoma Declaration, Botswana sought to restrict the activities of four South African journalists by requiring them to obtain visas prior to entering Botswana (not generally required of South Africans). Government sources were quoted as saying that these actions had been taken in response to the irresponsible reporting of the Gaborone raid by these journalists.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is a well-established tradition in Botswana, exemplified by the Kgotla, a communal gathering similar to a New England town meeting in which citizens freely question leaders and voice opinions on local politics. Kgotla meetings are used regularly by political candidates and Members of Parliament, including ministers, to explain their programs to the people. Large gatherings require local police approval, which is routinely given. Demonstrations are permitted so long as order is maintained. Organizers are required to submit a detailed plan for any demonstration and are personally responsible for ensuring that the plan is followed.

Unions have the legal right to strike but only after exhausting established dispute settlement procedures, which require that the Government be invited to attempt to arbitrate. The last strike occurred in 1976. Unions have chafed under government regulations which prohibit the contribution of union funds from sources outside Botswana and require that all union leaders be full-time working members of the trade covered by their union, thus preventing employment of full-time salaried union organizers. Unions are important in the country's largest industries, mainly mining and extraction industries, but have not yet taken hold in other sectors of the economy. Independent of government control or political party affiliation, unions in Botswana actively represent their members. Unions associate freely with international organizations, and leaders attend international conferences. The Botswana Federation of Trade Unions (BFTU) is affiliated with the democratically oriented International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels and is also a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and the Southern African Trade Unions Congress.

c. Freedom of Religion

The open practice of religion is permitted and encouraged in Botswana. There is no state religion. While most residents are Christians, active groups of Muslims, Hindus, Baha'is, and others practice their faiths freely. Religious affiliation is neither an advantage nor a disadvantage in the political and social contexts. Religious conversion is permitted in Botswana, and missionaries are allowed to enter the country and proselytize. Foreign clergy are also permitted to enter Botswana to serve expatriate congregations.

BOTSWANA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Botswana citizens are not restricted with respect to emigration, repatriation, or domestic or foreign travel. Passports are easily obtained. Refugees documented by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), mostly Zimbabweans, are generally required to live in the refugee settlement at Dukwe in northern Botswana. While conditions are relatively good, the U.N. Security Council has called for increased levels of international assistance to Botswana to improve the Dukwe refugee camp. Refugees may be authorized to live elsewhere for reasons such as employment or schooling. As with other foreigners in Botswana, refugees are not permitted to accept jobs which could be filled by citizens. There are allegations from some refugee-producing countries that refugees are using Botswana as a sanctuary from which to pursue activities directed against their governments. Hence, the Government of Botswana has declared that Dukwe residents found outside the camp without permission will be considered to have abandoned refugee status and will be repatriated; as will any refugee who engages in criminal activity or invites outside intervention through political activities inside of Botswana. A U.N. Security Council mission found that, as a result of the June South African raid on Gaborone, the relationship between refugees and citizens of Botswana has become strained since citizens of Botswana fear similar future attacks.

A 1982 citizenship law, which permits the Government to withdraw citizenship from a person found to have committed disloyal acts or to have shown evidence of disaffection, was enforced for the first time in September 1985. A refugee from South Africa who had been granted Botswana citizenship was stripped of his citizenship and returned to South Africa against his will. No reason was given for the deportation and the UNHCR was not consulted to discuss possible resettlement in another country.

Botswana is ruled by a Government genuinely elected by its people. In the 1984 national election (the fifth since Botswana became independent), an estimated 70 percent of the eligible voters registered, and 86 percent of the registered voters actually voted. The election was unmarred by violence, and no incidents of serious fraud were reported. However, one election for a parliamentary seat was disputed and was consequently rerun; the previously defeated opposition candidate triumphed and took his seat in the National Assembly. There are five parties in Botswana, three of which are represented in the country's National Assembly. Opposition parties now control three city councils, including that of Gaborone, Jwaneng, and Francistown. There are two female members of Parliament; one, the Minister of External Affairs; the other, an executive secretary of the majority party. The one white member of Parliament is also a cabinet minister, and the speaker of the National Assembly is also white.

Ethnic differences do exist in Botswana, though they play only a marginal role in the country's politics. Only the 50,000

BOTSWANA

Basarwa ("Bushmen") remain generally unrepresented in government. Pastoralists who have little contact with the population centers of Botswana, the Basarwa remain relatively unaffected by government educational and economic assistance programs and consequently have participated only marginally in the country's political life.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Botswana cooperates with international agencies concerned with human rights. Relations with the Office of the UNHCR, the only international human rights organization active in Botswana, are friendly and open. There are no Botswana-based organizations set up to observe, report, or contest human rights violations. The Government has consistently responded promptly and forthrightly to the inquiries it has received about the human rights situation in Botswana. A sparsely populated country surrounded by larger and more powerful neighbors, Botswana usually refrains from public comment on alleged human rights violations in neighboring countries but joins other governments in condemning apartheid in South Africa. Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report, was concerned about the use of the death penalty. Freedom House rated Botswana as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Botswana's population in 1985 reached 1,068,000 and is growing at 3.3 percent annually. Most Botswana are involved in agriculture and animal husbandry, but exploitation of the country's mineral resources, e.g., diamonds, has helped bring about significant economic development and has raised dramatically, but not evenly, per capita gross national product from $69 to $920 in 17 years.

Rural incomes are much lower than urban incomes, which has led to increased rural migration to the cities during the past decade. The urban population increased from 8 percent in 1971 to 17 percent in 1981 and, according to government statistics, has reached roughly 25 percent in 1985. Severe drought has accelerated this trend. Despite general improvement in the economy during the past decade, poverty still affects a large proportion of the population. Based on 1979 data, the most recent year available, 55 percent of the rural population and 40 percent of the urban population have incomes below the poverty level.

In 1985 life expectancy at birth was 63.5 years; and infant mortality was 63 per 1,000 live births. The percentage of urban population with access to potable water increased from 71 percent in 1968 to 100 percent in 1985; in rural areas, the figure remains about 39 percent due to the difficulties of supplying drinking water to Botswana's scattered rural population. According to the World Bank, the average Botswana in 1982 received 92 percent of the daily nutritional requirements. Because of the severity of the drought, the country has been increasingly heavily dependent on imported foodstuffs. Four consecutive years of severe drought depressed the agricultural sector of the economy, although in 1985 rainfall was sufficient to permit planting to begin again in many parts of the country.

Botswana has made steady progress in providing educational opportunities. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio increased from 56 in 1968 to 105 in 1981. There is a difference in enrollment rates between boys and girls because of the tradition of requiring boys to herd cattle. In 1981, the enrollment ratio for girls in primary school was 113, while that for boys was 97. The adult literacy rate was estimated at approximately 40 percent in 1971 and is undoubtedly higher in 1985.

In the area of worker rights, Botswana law prevents the employment of children 12 years and younger by anyone except members of the child's immediate family. No juvenile under the age of 15 can be employed in industry, and only those over 16 can be employed in night work. No juveniles 16 or younger are permitted to work in hazardous jobs, including mining. Women are not permitted to work at night (except on an emergency basis in agricultural work) and are not permitted to work as miners. The country's law also provides for minimum working standards, including job safety, maximum working hours, and wages. For some jobs during certain seasons, Botswana law permits working weeks longer than 48 hours (in agricultural jobs during the harvest season, for example).

Women hold approximately 24 percent of the paid jobs in Botswana. An estimated 41 percent of central government employees are women, many of them in high-level positions. While there is little overt sexual discrimination, social custom elevates the rights and privileges of men above those of women despite their importance in the economy. Some 40 percent of rural households are headed by women. Access to capital, labor, draft animals, seeds for farming is significantly more difficult for women than for men. Women who intend to marry may choose civil marriage, in which all property is held in common, or customary marriage, which recognizes the division of individual property brought to a marriage. Most women are not aware, however, of the implications of these alternatives. The Government has assisted in the publication of a women's rights handbook and has established preferences for women who seek government-sponsored development loans.

The Government of Botswana promises equal treatment of all its citizens in the distribution of social services. However, since most of the Basarwa occupy the harsh and remote areas of the Kalahari desert where population density is very low, there are few clinics and schools available to them. The Government has built some facilities at the edge of the desert which serve as a magnet for Basarwa families. This in turn creates new problems as these occupants of the desert, traditionally hunter-gatherers, not accustomed to a money economy, are pushed towards wage labor and cattle herding where they tend to be absorbed into Tswana society.

BURKINA FASO

Burkina Faso is one of the poorest countries in the world and a victim of frequent drought and political instability. In August 1983, Captain Thomas Sankara took power in the country's third military coup since 1980. Sankara is the President of Burkina Faso and of the National Council of the Revolution which appoints the Council of Ministers, Burkina's main forum for ongoing political decisions. In 1984, to emphasize its revolutionary break with the past, the Government changed the country's name from Upper Volta to Burkina Faso.

Political parties have been permitted since 1980, and there are no indications that the country will return to constitutional rule. Instead, the Government is using a growing network of Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR), organized at national, regional, and local levels to mobilize the population and promote its revolutionary goals. The national leadership of these committees is appointed by the Government, and it conducts elections to select local committee leaders.

Burkina Faso is overwhelmingly tied to subsistence agriculture with 90 percent of the population living in rural areas. The economy is highly vulnerable to fluctuations in rainfall. Drought, lack of communications and other infrastructure, a low literacy rate, and a stagnant economy are all long-standing problems.

There was little net change in the human rights situation in Burkina Faso in 1985 from 1984. There have been arbitrary arrests and brief detentions without trial or charges of labor leaders, potential political opponents, and others suspected of being hostile to the regime. The Government continued to conduct trials of former government and political leaders, almost exclusively on fraud and corruption charges, outside the traditional judicial system in Peoples Revolutionary Courts where defendants had no recourse to legal counsel. After explosions of two munitions dumps in May and June (allegedly sabotage), there were allegations of torture and there was one admitted death among those detained. The Government continued to dismiss or retire civil servants, military and police accused of lack of enthusiasm for the revolution and for reasons ranging from misconduct to laziness. Freedom of speech, assembly, and publication was effectively prevented by fear of loss of jobs by government workers, the largest work force in the country, and by the absence of an independent press. At the same time, government initiatives, such as the anticorruption drive being pursued through the People's Revolutionary Courts, responded to long-standing abuses and enjoyed popular support. The Government was increasingly sensitive to criticisms of human rights abuses in Burkina Faso by international human rights organizations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

Following explosions at munitions dumps near Ouagadougou and Bobo-Dioulasso in June 1985, the Government detained a number of persons, at least one of whom subsequently died in a hospital immediately after the attack. The Government stated that the person had died from exhaustion and other health problems, but the death probably resulted from mistreatment by security agents. The Government has stated that there will be no executions of these detainees without public trial.

Amnesty International, however, estimated that as many as 10 persons (2 of whom later emerged alive) suspected of sabotage had been killed by government agencies, many by torture. Another Western Embassy claimed to have corroborative evidence indicating that several of the detainees were delivered to the hospital with indications of torture. In general, the Government appears in overall control of army, police, and security forces.

There were no reports of disappearances during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were reports of torture being inflicted on prisoners following the munitions dump explosions of June 1985. Amnesty International claimed that at least 100 persons had been arrested, at least 1 and as many as 10 tortured to death, and others subjected to electric shock, sexual abuse, and burning with blow torches. On August 6, the Government denied reports of torture and presented eight detainees to the press; all seemed in good health. Two of these persons were among the 10 which Amnesty had listed as possibly tortured to death.

These reports marked a departure from previous years when there had been no reports of torture or of cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment. The material poverty of the country contributes to poor prison conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Reports of arbitrary arrest followed by detention for as much as four or five days without charges have continued. Several prominent intellectuals, military officers, and former government officials remain in self-imposed exile. Habeas corpus does not exist in Burkina Faso. Laws permitting preventive detention for a maximum of 72 hours, renewable one time in criminal cases, are followed in practice, but with a number of violations for both Burkinabe and foreign nationals. At least three leading trade union officials remained in custody throughout 1985, and other labor officials were detained for varying periods of time.

On August 4, Burkina Faso's national day, President Sankara amnestied 54 prisoners, many of them common criminals, and reduced sentences of 41 others, several of them former senior officials, including a former president and a former president of the National Assembly. Former president Jean-Baptiste Ouedraogo, whose regime Sankara toppled, was released but remains under surveillance.

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by the labor code.

BURKINA FASO

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

During 1985, the People's Revolutionary Courts, created in late 1983 with jurisdiction over state security and political crimes, heard cases primarily involving public corruption. The Court president is a magistrate appointed by the Government to head the tribunal which is composed of magistrates, military personnel, and members of the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution. The court president follows the practice of asking questions directly of the defendant. There is no role for a public prosecutor, and the accused has no right to consult counsel during the session. Witnesses can be called by the Court or they can present themselves to give testimony.

President Sankara has said these People's Courts should be viewed as a permanent part of the country's judicial system. During 1985, the Government began organizing a series of similar tribunals starting with conciliatory bodies at the village level and higher bodies at department and province levels to hear minor cases. The Government's oft-stated aim is to ensure that European-imposed judicial procedures do not deny fair access to justice for an overwhelmingly illiterate, impoverished population. Meanwhile, the traditionally independent judiciary has continued to function for criminal and civil cases. The supreme court, abolished in March 1984, has been replaced by two high appeals courts for public and private criminal and civil cases, in accordance with French judicial practice. The defendant traditionally receives a fair trial and is represented by counsel.

Government authorities are not known to interfere in the privacy, family, home, or correspondence of ordinary citizens. Homes may be searched under a warrant issued by the attorney general, a procedure generally followed in practice. There is no regular monitoring of private correspondence or telephones. However, a special law permits surveillance, search, detention, and monitoring of telephones and correspondence without warrant in national security cases. This law has been used against individuals suspected of participation in coup plots.

The Government encourages participation in the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR). There is little pressure on private citizens to join these committees or discrimination against those who choose not to participate. However, vigorous participation in CDR activities helps in obtaining civil service appointments and promotions. The Government considers opposition to activities of the CDRs to be political opposition, which can lead in serious cases to such measures as discharge from the civil service.

International radio broadcasts are not jammed. A government practice having great impact on family life is arbitrary dismissal of government personnel, military, civil servants, police, teachers, for primarily political reasons. These individuals must search in the underdeveloped private sector for further gainful employment or remain dependent on their families. The number of such dismissals in 1985 was significantly lower than in 1984.

BURKINA FASO

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While there is no formal government mechanism for censorship, the high pitch of revolutionary rhetoric, with its frequent references to enemies of the state at home and abroad, inhibited both government-employed journalists and ordinary citizens from taking advantage of their theoretical right to express critical views. The same inhibition, further stimulated by the frequency of sudden dismissals from government service and by reports of arbitrary arrests, continued to dampen a lively tradition of debate on political topics. In October 1985, the Government announced that those dismissed from government service could apply for reinstatement, provided they maintain an acceptable political attitude.

The media in Burkina are now entirely government-owned, consisting of a daily newspaper, a weekly magazine, and a government-operated radio/television station. There has not been a single case of criticism of the Government in the media, which are charged with carrying official news to the people while defending the revolution. The Government maintains that the daily Sidwaya is free to print criticism and independent judgments. A mid-1985 reorganization of all government media placed the Minister of Information and Culture in direct control of the media, giving the Government a direct means to shape or control media output as desired. Foreign newspapers and magazines continue to enter the country freely. Foreign journalists and local representatives to foreign press organizations travel and file stories without censorship or hindrance and enjoy easy access to government officials up to and including the President. There are no formal limitations on academic freedom. University professors and administrators, however, have been criticized for "elitism" and dismissed for alleged counterrevolutionary tendencies. University students are now subject to political education. The major student organization is dominated by a left-wing group, aligned with Albania, which regards the present regime as insufficiently revolutionary. In the arts, movies are subject to censorship by a review board which includes religious authorities as well as government officials.

Political parties are banned, and administrative permission is generally required for assemblies of any kind. During 1985, there was little effort by opposition groups to organize meetings.

Organized labor, which continues to be an important feature of the political scene, has been under increasing government pressure and has jurisdictional conflicts with Committees for the Defense of the Revolution. Four labor federations and a number of autonomous unions exist. They range in orientation from two moderate federations, traditionally unrestricted in their adversarial relationship with the Government, to a much more radical federation of civil service local unions. To counter the latter, a new union of government employees was formed in 1985. One federation is affiliated with the Government, a second with the Christian-oriented World Confederation of Labor, a third with the democratic International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and a fourth with the World Federation of Trade Unions.

BURKINA FASO

The right to strike was formally restored in early 1983, but in its only test thus far, the Government charged that the independent primary school teachers union strike of March 1984 was illegally organized and politically motivated, and broke it by firing the strikers, nearly half the union's 6000 members. An amnesty was extended to the fired teachers in August 1985, but the two teachers' union leaders still remain in detention. In January 1985, the Government imprisoned Marxist trade union leader Soumane Toure after he denounced government austerity measures and accused the Government of corruption. He remains in detention and has reportedly been ill. On January 28, 11 union leaders, primarily from the left-wing unions, signed a petition criticizing the Government. The Sankara Government immediately suspended them from their government jobs, and an unknown number were detained for a time. Despite the Government's tightening stance, there were no indications that existing labor organizations would be brought under government control or replaced by a state labor federation. President Sankara has stated he wishes to maintain a dialogue with all Burkinabe trade unions. In February, the President indicated willingness to work with moderate union leaders, and in May apparently reached an understanding with the more radical unions. In any event, attacks by gangs on six union central offices during a confused melee on May 1 have not been repeated. Unions have continued to exercise their rights to hold conferences, train workers, and attend international congresses.

Burkina Faso is a secular state, and there is no discrimination on religious grounds. Islam and Christianity exist side by side, with about 25 percent of the population Muslim and 10 percent Christian. Both Muslim and Christian holidays are recognized as national holidays. Social mobility and access to modern sector jobs are neither linked to, nor restricted by, religious affiliations.

The leader of the Jesuits in Burkina Faso, a Frenchman, was detained for four days in March, apparently for delivering a sermon which the Government found offensive. He was not formally charged.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government lifted a strictly enforced curfew in August 1985. However, travelers within Burkina Faso are often stopped at police, Army, and internal customs checkpoints. Moreover, armed CDR units maintain numerous checkpoints between 1 am and 5 am. Foreign travel for business and tourism is not restricted. Exit permits, once required to limit movement of workers to the neighboring countries--particularly to the Ivory Coast, where one million or more Burkinabe continue to reside and work--are no longer required. Refugees are accepted freely in Burkina Faso and attempts are made to provide for their care in cooperation with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees.

President Thomas Sankara rules in the name of the National Council of the Revolution, the composition of which has never been disclosed. There is neither a legislative body nor any recognized political opposition group. In consultation with the National Council of the Revolution, Sankara appoints his cabinet, which currently consists of 21 posts, 4 held by military personnel and the rest by civilians, including 3 women. Cabinet ministers include individuals known to be affiliated with several apparently antagonistic groups, such as the Union of Communist Struggle and the Patriotic League for Development. The Government has not given any hint of plans for elections or a return to constitutional government. The Government is using Committees for the Defense of the Revolution to consolidate power and to allow for a limited measure of public participation. These committees are charged with various tasks, including the oversight of administrative affairs at the local level. In practice, the Government exercises tight control over the committees.

Minority ethnic groups are as likely to be represented in the inner circles of the Government as are the dominant Mossi, who comprise 50 percent of the population. Government decisions do not favor one ethnic group over another. One announced reason for the increase in administrative regions from 11 to 30 since the August 1983 coup was to improve access of minority groups to local administrative authorities.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

A government-supported organization lobbies against apartheid and other racial oppression. The Government was clearly upset by foreign criticism of its detentions following the June 1985 munitions dump explosion. The Government has made no attempt to restrict or hinder the activities of international human rights organizations. In its 1985 Report (covering 1984), Amnesty International expressed concern over the imprisonment of three prisoners of conscience for trade union activities and the reported detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government. Freedom House rated Burkina Faso as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Burkina Faso's population is 6.9 million and is growing at the rate of 2.7 percent annually. Gross national product per capita per annum was only $180 in 1983. Living standards are generally higher in the few urban centers than in the countryside. Population pressure is somewhat ameliorated by large-scale annual migrations to neighboring countries for seasonal agricultural work.

The infant mortality rate is 176 deaths per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth is 45 years. The primary causes of death are malaria, gastrointestinal infections, and parasitic diseases. Approximately 25 percent of the population has access to safe water, with a disproportionate number of those people being in urban areas. The literacy rate is estimated at 9 percent, with only 24 percent of primary school age children enrolled, 30 percent of the males and 16 percent of the females.

The labor code sets the minimum age for employment at 14, the age of most students upon completion of basic secondary school. However, the Government lacks the means to enforce adequately this provision, owing to a very low per capita income, large number of small family enterprises, and the traditional apprenticeship system. A minimum monthly wage of about $50 and a maximum work week of 48 hours are stipulated by the labor code, as are safety and health provisions within the capabilities of the country's relatively small nonagricultural sector. A system of government inspections and labor courts ensures that these provisions are applied in the industrial and commercial sectors, but they have been impossible to enforce in the dominant subsistence agriculture sector.

The role of women in Burkina Faso is still limited by the cultural orientation of a rural society. The current Government has emphasized its strong commitment to expanding opportunities for women, including educational opportunities. The Ministry of Family Progress, for example, works to promote greater participation by women in the nation's economic, social, and political life. In addition to the three women ministers in the current cabinet, women have been appointed high commissioners in several provinces and magistrates in the judicial system.

BURUNDI

The Republic of Burundi is a one-party state led by President Jean-Baptiste Bagaza, an army colonel who came to power in 1976 through a bloodless coup. The role of the military in the Government is still influential but has steadily declined in day-to-day governance as Bagaza has appointed civilians to most key government positions. The National Party for Unity and Progress (UPRONA) is the most important political institution in Burundi. As head of the party and the Government, President Bagaza has a dominant policy role. He also has certain decree powers and appoints and dismisses judges. The dominance of the minority Tutsi over the majority Hutu ethnic group is the central political and social reality of Burundi which continues today through Tutsi control of emerging political institutions and the military. However, Bagaza has appointed Hutus to all levels of government, including 5 to his 19-member cabinet, and there are about 19 Hutu representatives in the 65-member National Assembly. While far from representative of the Burundi population as a whole (85 percent Hutu, 14 percent Tutsi, and 1 percent other), this Hutu presence reflects substantial improvement in representation in the Government over past years.

The armed forces maintain law and order. In addition, there is a regular police force responsible for civil and criminal offenses and a separate force of security police responsible primarily for internal state security, including monitoring dissent. The state security police have the same powers of arrest as the regular police and are subject to the same process of judicial review of detentions.

Burundi is a very poor country with one of the highest population densities in Africa. Most Burundi earn their livelihood as subsistence farmers working small, privately owned plots. The small monetary economy is based on coffee, which accounts for 85 percent of foreign exchange. Recent gains made in food production and agriculture have been largely offset by the high population growth rate.

In the area of human rights during 1985, the Burundi Government and the Roman Catholic Church had a series of confrontations concerning appropriate hours for religious activities and the role of the Church in society. Twenty Christian clerics were imprisoned, more than 140 foreign missionaries were forced to leave Burundi because their residence permits were not renewed, and many missionaries who requested permission to come to Burundi were denied visas. Moreover, Burundi clergy were not permitted to travel to Kenya to meet with Pope John Paul II. In addition, the Government closed down all Seventh-Day Adventist churches and schools because of the refusal of Adventists to perform community work on Saturday.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There are no allegations of killings for political motives or of summary executions.

b. Disappearance

No instances of disappearance have been reported.

BURUNDI

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by law. Cruel treatment of suspects or detainees has occurred in the form of beatings at the time of arrest or interrogation. Such treatment is rare and occurs only in cases of violent crimes or resisting arrest. The Government admits that isolated instances of abuse of prisoners by prison guards or officials do occur but insists that those responsible for such abuses are punished.

Prison conditions apparently are severe due to overcrowding and lack of adequate hygiene, medical care, and food. Prisoners are segregated according to the nature of their crimes, are allowed regular family visits, and participate in rehabilitative work programs, including agricultural production. Families are encouraged, and expected, to provide supplemental food and other personal items to their relatives in prison. Due to inadequate budgets, food rations are very limited, and there have been several reports of deaths in prison from starvation. The Government admits that there is a serious problem in the prisons and it is trying to improve conditions, with the help of the the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile.

Police officers are empowered to detain suspects but must submit a written report to the Public Prosecutor's office within 24 hours. The Public Prosecutor examines the report and can either order the detainee's release or issue an arrest warrant valid for 5 days. The Public Prosecutor must state the charges before a magistrate in the presence of the detainee. The Magistrate then either releases the detainee or issues orders confirming the detention, initially for 15 days and then subsequently for 30-day periods as necessary to prepare the case for trial. Bail is set only in cases of embezzlement or similar crimes involving financial wrongdoing.

The prescribed procedures for arrest and imprisonment are not always followed. The elapsed time between an arrest and the notification of the Public Prosecutor often extends to several days, and detainees do not always appear before a magistrate within the allotted 5 days from arrest. However, a judicial review of the arrest almost always takes place. Relatives or consular representatives are made aware of arrests or detentions, generally at the time of incarceration. The general practice is to permit detainees to go to their homes prior to being brought to the place of detention. During 1985, at least six people, were detained for expression of views critical of, or hostile to, the Government and were charged with violations of civil law. They are still awaiting trial.

The Government does not exile its nationals. Citizens of other countries suspected of criminal activity or lacking proper residency documents are expelled; in 1985, for example, 64 Zairians were expelled.

Forced or compulsory labor is not permitted under current law, but most citizens are expected to perform community service on Saturdays.

BURUNDI

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary's independence is limited by the requirement to adhere to the guidance and recommendations of the party, the Government, and the President. Judges are appointed and may also be dismissed at the pleasure of the President. Nevertheless, there is a high degree of autonomy in the court's daily administration of justice, and due process is largely observed. Though court decisions cannot be overturned by the executive branch, the President has the power to pardon or reduce sentences.

Burundi has separate court systems to deal with military, civil/criminal, and state security cases. Military tribunals have jurisdiction only over military personnel. The State Security Court has jurisdiction over both civilian and military personnel, and its proceedings need not be made public. To date, this Court has not been used. Burundi law provides the right to counsel, and indigents are provided counsel by the State. Pretrial proceedings may involve lengthy investigations. The public prosecutor's office generally dismisses cases where the evidence in support of the charges is weak and only proceeds to trial when it believes guilt has been established.

During the past 5 years, the Government has taken steps to improve the judicial system, and the 1984 Party Congress recommended additional judicial reforms. New courts have been created, the number of magistrates has tripled, and training seminars and conferences have been held. Simultaneously, however, prison populations have doubled or tripled, and the courts are hampered by a lack of trained legal personnel and by heavy case loads.

There are no verified cases of purely political prisoners, although one or two such cases have been alleged. Defamation of a public figure is a civil offense, and several persons are serving short sentences (under 12 months) after convictions for this offense. There are also approximately 10 detainees being held for criticizing government restrictions on religious activities and for reportedly advocating disobedience.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy of correspondence and the inviolability of the home are guaranteed in the Constitution and respected in practice. A judicial warrant is required for a law enforcement official to enter and search a private residences.

Membership in the political party and its affiliated organizations is open to all but is not required. The State Security Office monitors political dissent through the state security police and by employing paid informers who report on discontent and dissension as well as on criminal activity.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government controls all domestic print and broadcast media. The French language daily and Kirundi language weekly are published by the Ministry of Information, which also operates the domestic radio and television stations. The media are required to support the fundamental policies of the party and Government. Some criticism of government mismanagement and policies is permitted in the printed press. Journalists are state employees and consequently would be subject to disciplinary action if their criticism went beyond what is considered tolerable. The Government rarely interferes with the distribution of foreign news publications and never interferes with radio reception from foreign sources.

Freedom of speech is limited by statute. Criticism of the party and government policies or leadership is permitted only within party meetings. Academic freedom is also limited. At the primary and secondary school level, teachers are expected to support government policies. At the university, professors come from several different countries and are permitted to lecture freely in their subject areas, conduct research, and draw independent conclusions. Censorship occurs only in the case of sexually explicit foreign film material or publications.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The express authorization of the Government is required for all political meetings. This effectively guarantees government control of all public forums and limits association for political purposes to participation in the party or its affiliated youth, labor, or women's movements.

The party controls the trade union confederation, the National Labor Union or UTB. The principal role of the UTB, to which virtually the entire salaried work force belongs, is to serve as an intermediary between workers and employers in labor matters. The UTB brings complaints against employers on behalf of its members and often forces employers to revise their practices. However, unauthorized advocacy of a strike or lockout is a criminal offense. Therefore, though they are technically permissible, there have been no strikes in recent years. The UTB participates in the International Labor Organization (ILO) and is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

The Government permits nonpolitical private associations but requires that they be registered and accorded legal recognition before they may function.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious freedom exists within defined limits, as the Government considers religious organizations subject to the same sorts of rules and restrictions which apply to secular organizations. All religious associations must receive approval from the Government to operate. The authorities must be informed in advances of religious gatherings, which are strictly limited to recognized places of worship, and religious services are authorized only after 5 p.m. Mondays through Fridays, after midday on Saturday, and all day on Sundays. The Jehovah's Witnesses sect was banned by the Government in January because its doctrine challenges certain precepts of civil authority. Consequently, members of the sect cannot openly carry out activities within the faith or aimed at conversion. There are no reports of persons imprisoned for merely adhering to the sect.

BURUNDI

The Seventh-Day Adventists' refusal to perform work of any kind on Saturday, their Sabbath, led to the closing of Adventist churches and loss of their legal status in early 1985. Adventist churches and schools were closed, and a number of students were imprisoned for a weekend. Eight pastors and teachers were detained for approximately 4 months without being charged. Adventist properties remain vacant except for one school which is now being operated by the Government.

In 1985, the Government made it clear to other Christian churches that they must confine their activities to religious and social works and stay out of political matters, which include Hutu/Tutsi relations. Twelve Burundi Catholic priests were arrested for violating restrictions on hours of worship services; all of them were released within weeks. In a related development, two priests and nine laypersons were charged in connection with a tract which criticized the Government's recent restrictions on hours of worship. The author of the tract was sentenced to 5 years in prison, and a 70-year-old priest, a former university rector and prominent religious leader, was sentenced to 4 years for "insulting the Chief of State." Three laymen were sentenced to 2 years imprisonment for distributing the tract, and three others were given nominal sentences for assisting the tract's author in his attempts to flee the country. The two others accused were acquitted for lack of evidence. Some religious symbols not on church buildings have been removed by local authorities. Since early in 1985, the Government has pursued a policy of reducing the number of missionaries, and thereby missionary influence, in Burundi by refusing applications for residence permit extensions. More than 140 missionaries were forced to depart Burundi in this way, and, though the rate of refusal slackened periodically, it is clear that the Government maintained its intention to reduce the missionary presence.

Church access to the media is curtailed by the longstanding suspension of a Catholic newspaper and of religious broadcasts. A few other missionaries were expelled for writing articles or making statements which the Government considered critical. There are, however, no barriers to the training of clergy or to maintenance of links with religious hierarchies in other countries. Religious beliefs do not exclude individuals from political participation or from social benefits.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement is generally free within Burundi, although government policies discourage urban migration. Foreign travel and emigration are relatively free. However, the Government requires exit visas as well as passports. Occasionally, the Government withholds these documents without explanation but for apparently political motives. Forty-three Catholic clerics who wanted to attend an ecclesiastical meeting in Kenya during Pope John Paul II's August visit were barred from traveling. Foreigners have also been forced to remain in Burundi for short periods without explanation.

Burundi's Government cooperates closely with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. Burundi claims to shelter 256,000 refugees, but most might be more accurately described as displaced persons. The United Nations estimates that there are approximately 60,000 refugees, primarily Tutsis of Rwandan origin who fled to Burundi in the 1960's. Many are well integrated in Burundi, although they may acquire citizenship only through marriage to a Burundi. Refugees who fled from Burundi in the early 1970's and before continue to return and have full rights as citizens. Amnesty International has been concerned about the situation of refugees and asylum seekers from Zaire. Several were allegedly forcibly repatriated in 1983, and 64 other Zairians without proper papers were expelled in February 1985.

Burundi citizens do not have the right to change their government. Political participation can take place only within the one-party structure, and voters can express dissatisfaction only by voting against incumbents. The president of the party is the sole candidate for President of the Republic. Power rests with the President and with the party's central committee. The party is open to all Burundians supporting its principles and claims a membership of about 1.4 million, about three-quarters of the adult population. The party regularly holds local and regional meetings, during which time they discuss issues and make recommendations. While there are multiple candidates for party positions, balloting is not secret.

Although the military retains influential presence in all the party organs and in the Government, its role in actual administration has declined markedly since 1979. Only 3 military officers are currently cabinet members, and military officers hold 12 of the 69 central committee seats. The Constitution provides for a National Assembly, which was seated in 1982 with a 5-year mandate, comprising 65 representatives, 52 elected by secret ballot under universal adult suffrage and the remainder are appointed. All candidates were drawn from a list preselected by provincial electoral colleges composed of party and government officials. Two candidates for each elective seat were permitted. The balloting was evidently free, as several high party and government officials failed to win seats. The Assembly is not intended to be a separate and independent power but is expected to cooperate with and complement the executive and other institutions. Over the last 3 years, the National Assembly has actively debated government policy with occasional pointed criticism.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

Burundi is a party to several United Nations instruments on human rights, and its Constitution provides for the protection of such rights. There were no reports during 1985 of requests for outside investigations of alleged human rights violations. The last visit of the ICRC took place in late 1983. The Government complied with the ICRC's standard conditions for visits to prisoners or detainees. In its 1985 report (covering 1984), Amnesty International was concerned inter alia by the restrictions imposed on religious activities and the detentions imposed on members of religious groups. Freedom House terms Burundi "not free."

BURUNDI

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Burundi is among the poorest countries of the world, with a 1983 per capita gross national product of $240. In 1978, 55 percent of the urban population was below the absolute poverty level, and the figure has changed little since then. Population density is among Africa's highest, with a population of 4.7 million (1984) inhabiting a land area of only 27,834 square kilometers. The population growth rate for 1985 is estimated at 2.8 percent. Nearly 90 percent of Burundians earn their livelihood from agriculture. The traditional feudal land tenure system has been abolished, and most farmers own the land they cultivate.

Burundi's relatively small monetary economy is based on the export of coffee, which accounts for 85 percent of foreign exchange earnings. Energy costs, high transportation costs, and fluctuations in world coffee prices have harmed the market economy. Real economic growth over the past 5 years has been outpaced by population growth.

Health care is inadequate as Burundi suffers from a shortage of personnel, facilities, and budgetary resources. Life expectancy at birth is only 47 years, and the rate of infant mortality is 115 per 1,000 live births. Although most urban dwellers have access to potable water supplies, the percentage of the rural population with access to safe year-round water is very low. Educational opportunities, despite considerable government efforts supported by donor assistance, remain below the needs of the population. Only 27 percent of adults are literate according to 1980 figures (39 percent male, 15 percent female). World Bank statistics for 1980 show primary school enrollment of 31 percent of the primary school age population (39 percent for males, 24 percent for females). Only a small fraction of those completing primary school is able to obtain places in the nation's secondary schools. An even smaller percentage of students wins places in the nation's sole university.

Worker rights are guaranteed by the Burundi Labor Code and by the National Collective Interprofessional Labor Convention. Working hours vary between 40 and 45 hours per week; Saturday afternoons, Sundays, and holidays are times of rest. Children under the age of 12 may not be employed in any capacity, nor may children under the age of 16 be engaged in dangerous or strenuous work. Minimum health and safety standards are monitored and enforced by the Ministry of Labor. Burundi has a minimum wage and has been trying to reduce the high levels of unemployment and underemployment.

Women in society hold a secondary position, although their status is undergoing considerable change from traditional patterns. The Constitution provides for legal equality. Significant improvement in the legal status of women came with the issuances of a new legal code on families which prohibits polygamy and the dowry, and allows women some control of family matters. Women still cannot inherit land and cannot work if forbidden to work by their husbands. Although fewer women than men attain an education, once it is attained women can generally find suitable employment. The Government does not discriminate against women in hiring or in respect to the jobs which are open to them. Women are represented at all levels in the political life of the country. However, their main vehicle of political expression is the Burundi women's movement which is affiliated with the party. The party remains dominated by males.

The minority Tutsi have for centuries dominated the majority Hutu. Civil strife in 1972, which culminated in government-sanctioned massacres, led to nearly 200,000 Hutus fleeing to neighboring Rwanda and Tanzania. Since the advent of the Bagaza Government in 1976, the degree of ethnic tension has been markedly reduced. Thousands of Hutu refugees have returned to Burundi. Inter-marriage has also contributed to a blurring of ethnic distinctions. The low level of economic development in rural areas affects both Tutsi and Hutu, making differences in economic status between the two groups scarcely discernible in the countryside. However, because of their longstanding dominance of the Government and access to education, the Tutsi predominate in the modern sector. The military remains under Tutsi control. Nevertheless, there is no evidence that Hutus are denied equal protection of the law.

CAMEROON

Political power in Cameroon is heavily concentrated in the presidency. President Biya ran unopposed in 1984 in what is essentially a one-party system. The President appoints all important government and party officials and makes all major decisions, although key parliamentarians in the National Assembly have some behind-the-scenes influence. Cameroon had an active multiparty system at the time of its independence. Under former President Ahidjo, all parties were gradually consolidated into the Cameroon National Union, renamed in 1985 under President Biya, the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement. Although Cameroon's 1972 Constitution provides for a democratic, multiparty system, in actuality the sole political party selects candidates for public office, who run unopposed.

During the 22 years of President Ahidjo's rule, Cameroon's diversity and the armed violence in some parts of the country were used to justify authoritarian control and harsh restrictions on civil liberties. The Ahidjo legacy still shapes President Biya's policies, despite the steps he has taken to liberalize the political system. Internal security responsibilities are shared by the National Police (Surete National), the National Intelligence service (Centre de Documentation Nationale-CND), the Ministry of Territorial Administration, Military Intelligence, and, to a lesser extent, the Presidential Security Service. The Ministry of Territorial Administration is in charge of prisons, and during the past year the National Police have assumed the dominant role in enforcing internal security laws. The CND and the military are still involved in both of those functions but to a lessening degree.

Cameroon's economy continues to thrive, and its per capita income ranks Cameroon among the middle income developing countries, though it remains plagued by many problems of underdevelopment. Growth, propelled by oil revenues, continues at a steady pace.

During 1985, the human rights environment in Cameroon reflected mixed trends. There is some increase in freedom of expression, a major change from the previous regime. At the same time there is also continued, though diminished, harassment of some groups, including the press, and in some cases imprisonment of political dissidents and student activists. A leader of the outlawed Union des Populations du Cameroun (UPC) and a radical anglophone dissident were detained for extended periods without trial. By most estimates, there are some 10 to 20 political prisoners in custody, not counting roughly 200 people who received prison terms because of participation in the 1984 coup attempt.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from

a. Political Killing

There were no confirmed reports of political killing during 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of the disappearance during 1985.

CAMEROON

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is proscribed in the criminal code, which renders evidence obtained by torture inadmissible. In addition, the penal code prohibits public servants from using force against any person. However, there were credible reports during 1985 of ill treatment, such as beatings, during police interrogation and during imprisonment. Very poor prison conditions, including overcrowding, inadequate food and sanitation, and medical attention are major problems, and Amnesty International's 1985 Annual Report said that some Cameroonian prisoners had died of malnutrition during 1984. Because government-provided food is very inadequate, prisoners have reportedly suffered from severe malnutrition unless provided food by friends or families. The Government recognizes these problems and has launched a major prison construction and renovation program, including some $2 million in additional funding for prison meals. Persons under "administrative detention" (i.e., political prisoners) are kept in special camps or prisons. Access to the administrative detention centers by families and friends is reported to be severely restricted.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Cameroonian law, a person arrested on suspicion of committing an offense may not be held for more than 48 hours without a court order. This provision is generally observed in nonpolitical cases. However, after an investigating magistrate has determined that the case should be brought to trial and has issued a warrant to that effect, there is no limitation on how long the detainee may be held in "preventive detention" pending trial. Accused persons awaiting trial constitute the great majority of persons in the prisons at Yaounde and Douala. Release on bail is infrequent.

Citizens continue to be stopped by local police who sometimes harass or threaten to detain them unless a bribe is paid, but for the most part those detained are released within 24 hours. These actions are not initiated or condoned by high government officials and have been sharply criticized by the President.

Persons may be held in administrative detention under legislation pertaining to subversion. Such detention by regional authorities is initially for 1 month, renewable twice, and may be extended up to an additional 6 months by the Minister of Territorial Administration. Generally, those arrested and placed in administrative detention do not disappear--their families are told where they are and they are eventually released, although the detention may be lengthy. Political prisoners, some 10-20 of whom are currently estimated to be in custody, are usually held under this type of detention. Under the state of emergency, which exists in portions of three provinces, authorities may also order detention for up to 1 week for persons judged "dangerous to public security." The Minister of Territorial Administration may also order detention of such persons for up to 2 months; the order is renewable without limitation. The state of emergency provisions were used rarely, if at all, during 1985.

The Government announced during the Pope's August visit to Cameroon that an amnesty would be forthcoming for "certain prisoners." Although officials indicated that political prisoners would be among them, a late September announcement of the release of 20 prisoners and the commutation of the death sentences of 13 others included no political prisoners.

Two well-known political figures were detained during 1985. The first, Fon Gorji Dinka, a radical anglophone spokesman, was imprisoned after calling upon the armed forces in an open letter to depose President Biya. Dinka was arrested on June 1 and was still in custody at the end of the year. He has apparently not been mistreated while in prison, although anglophones have complained that he received inadequate medical attention both before and after the deterioration of his health in late September. The second well-known detainee was Dr. Joseph Sende, self-proclaimed leader of the outlawed UPC faction in Cameroon. Sende was held without trial from February 7 through May 22, after he had tried unsuccessfully to gain legal recognition of the UPC and then issued a UPC "position statement" denouncing the single-party system in Cameroon as being antidemocratic. Sende was kept in a cell by himself but was apparently not tortured and was allowed visits by family members.

The Government keeps a close watch on student activism. On October 1 security forces briefly detained some 100 high school students, who had participated in a protest in Bamenda, and reportedly held some of their leaders for several weeks.

There is also an unknown number of current and former UPC members in self-imposed exile. Some of those individuals have accepted the Government's offer to return to Cameroon "as individual citizens, not as political figures." Another outlawed dissident party, the Cameroon Democratic Party (CDP), has members in self-imposed exile since the party lost its bid to be legalized in early 1984.

There are no reports of forced labor being practiced in Cameroon.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trial by a presiding magistrate is guaranteed by law, and this practice is followed with the exception of persons held under administrative detention. Public trials are also guaranteed by law, although exceptions for the public good or national security reasons are allowed. Trials which involve prominent persons or which are controversial are sometimes held in private. Magistrates in Cameroon are drawn from a corps of career civil servants and are required to have law degrees. Their decisions are generally not subject to government interference, and they are generally considered to conduct fair trials. Defendants in felony cases are provided attorneys if they cannot afford to engage their own.

Crimes involving subversion or illegal use of weapons, as well as crimes involving the military, are tried by military tribunal. Each tribunal has three members, and its presiding officer must be a magistrate. In some cases, the magistrate is a civilian, but often it is a military officer. As in civil cases, defendants are entitled to either public or private counsel.

CAMEROON

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Both invasion of the home and tampering with correspondence are violations of Cameroonian law. There are reports that police do enter homes without warrants during periodic searches for criminals in lower income neighborhoods. Surveillance of suspected political dissidents, including monitoring of mail and of telephone conversations, is also common, such as the recent surveillance of some militant anglophones. Although membership in the country's sole political party, the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement, is not mandatory, there have been credible reports that zealous local party officials have denied routine services, such as issuance of a driver's license, to persons who are not party members. The Government does not condone such actions.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution of 1972 guarantees the freedom of expression and press, but under Cameroonian law and practice these freedoms are restricted. During 1985, those restrictions were loosened slightly, but they remain extensive and are subject to Government interpretation. Informal political discussions in 1985 are much more open than they had been under former President Ahidjo, and there is no evidence anyone is punished for privately criticizing the Government. Independent newspapers continued to be available in wide variety, including 20 to 25 registered as "general information" papers during the course of the year. These newspapers have slowly increased their criticism of Cameroonian government programs, such as education, development, or censorship, and also offer limited criticism of the single party. There are still many proscribed subjects: University Professor Maurice Kamto was detained briefly for writing a critical review of a book entitled "The Social Ideas of Paul Biya". The newspaper issue which printed that article was seized by Government authorities, as were issues of other papers too sharply critical of major government or party figures. Long-standing problems with the local censor are also a major reason why one English-language newspaper, the Cameroon Times, was unable to publish for most of the year.

There has also been a slight increase in the amount of comment on internal politics in the government-controlled press and radio, although the Government affords official journalists much less latitude than it does their private counterparts. Most official journalists are civil servants, and if they are not sufficiently careful in their self-censorship, they can be transferred to less desirable jobs. Occasionally, issues of international publications are seized because they contain articles about Cameroon which the Government considers inflammatory. One example was an article during the Pope's visit which strongly criticized Cameroon's Catholic hierarchy.

Government restrictions on university lecture content and publications continue to decrease, but the Government reacts firmly to any signs of student protest as in the Bamenda incident in October.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedoms of assembly and association, while guaranteed in the Constitution, are restricted in practice and in law. The Cameroonian penal code prohibits public meetings, demonstrations, or processions without prior government approval, and organizations must register with the Government. The demonstration by anglophone high school students in Bamenda on October 1 was unauthorized. Anglophones suspected of planning or encouraging an anglophone student demonstration at the University of Yaounde have also been questioned by police, and authorities have searched the offices of some anglophone professors.

CAMEROON

The sole labor union, the Cameroon Trades Union Congress, operates within the framework of the official party, the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement, and top union leadership is chosen by the Government. The union does not play a major role in Cameroonian politics, although it has a membership of approximately 450,000 workers in a working population of more than 3 million. It pursues individual worker grievances and seeks improvements in government programs for worker safety and training.

The union participates in government-regulated negotiations with employers, but strikes are illegal. Political activity by the trade union, excepting action designed to protect economic and other interests, is prohibited. The union cannot have contact with foreign trade union organizations without government authorization. Cameroon is a member of the International Labor Organization, and rank and file workers comprise part of the Cameroonian delegation to its meetings. The union is also a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and is generally respected. Cameroon is comprised of 20 percent Muslims, 30 percent Christians, and the rest animists. Officials of the Government and party are drawn from members of all denominations. Missionaries played a major role in the development of Cameroon and continue to be active. However, the Jehovah's Witnesses, who do not acknowledge the supremacy of the state, were banned in 1970 and have periodically been targets of harassment since then. In December 1984, 89 Jehovah's Witnesses were arrested at their annual conference and held without trial until May 5, 1985. Observance of traditional religions is not discouraged by the Government, although acts of witchcraft, magic, or divination "liable to disrupt public order or tranquility or to harm person or property" are outlawed with penalties of up to 10 years imprisonment.

Independent Muslim and Christian publications exist in Cameroon, and there is no evidence that they are censored more heavily than the secular press. The exception, again, is the Jehovah's Witnesses, who are not allowed to publish or distribute their religious materials.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within the country is not restricted by law. In practice, however, police frequently stop travelers for a check of identification, tax receipts, or voting cards. Exit visas are required to leave the country and sometimes are obtainable only after long bureaucratic delays. In some cases, these delays may represent attempts by the Government to discourage or even prevent departure. The Government has also been known to refuse issuance of a passport, or to confiscate an already issued passport, in order to prevent someone from traveling abroad. Cameroonians who leave the country must deposit sums sufficient to buy a return air ticket for repatriation should they become stranded abroad. There are no restrictions on the right of voluntary repatriation. Women must obtain the permission of their husbands or fathers to leave the country.

Over the years, Cameroon has served as a safehaven for thousands of displaced persons. The Government currently acknowledges the presence of some 45,000 Chadian refugees in Cameroon, 6,000 of whom are either at the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) refugee camp in Poli or are in the process of relocating there. The rest of the Chadians have integrated into the Cameroonian economy and do not receive government assistance. Cameroon is also host to displaced persons from South Africa, Zaire, Angola, and other African nations, and there are roughly 100 Namibians who are in Cameroon as students.

Cameroon continues to be a one-party state with political power and administrative responsibility concentrated in the presidency. Following the resignation of former President Ahidjo on November 4, 1982, his constitutional successor, Prime Minister Paul Biya, took office as President. In September 1983, Biya was elected President of the Party, following Ahidjo's resignation. President Biya subsequently withstood a coup attempt from forces allegedly close to Ahidjo. While the Constitution implies the legality of other political parties, in fact, only one party is permitted--the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement (CPDM). Although the election law theoretically permits multiple candidates for the presidency, President Biya ran unopposed in the January 1984 elections and received 99.98 percent of the votes. The President appoints governors, prefects, and cabinet ministers.

Cameroon's political system is a product of the country's ethnic and linguistic diversity, which includes some 230 languages and 3 separate European heritages (French, British, and German). A careful balancing act, within the one party, takes place to maintain political cohesion. Membership in the CPDM is thus open to all religious and ethnic groups, but the party remains a centrally controlled organization. The party elite chooses the candidates for local offices as well as for the National Assembly. One candidate is chosen for each position by the party and is submitted to the electorate. The electorate has never rejected a candidate chosen by the party since the Cameroon National Union was constituted the sole legal party in 1966. The CPDM Congress in March 1985 formally adopted a program of democratization within the party and encouraged some dissidents who had formerly been excluded from the party to become members. The CPDM is also working on reforms whereby the leadership of each level of the party organization will be chosen by the members at that level, rather than selected by the hierarchy.

Externally based dissident groups including the Union des Populations du Cameroun (francophone) and the Cameroon

CAMEROON

Democratic Party (anglophone) periodically send letters or pamphlets into the country. The Government attempts to seize these documents when they arrive.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Cameroon Constitution affirms support for the freedoms guaranteed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the United Nations Charter. Under President Biya, the Government has increased the attention it pays to human rights issues, both internally as a part of President Biya's program of "democratization" and in public statements at forums such as the United Nations.

In its 1985 Report (covering 1984), Amnesty International expressed concern over prison conditions in Cameroon, citing reports of torture and malnutrition. The organization also called for the trial or release of several prisoners of conscience, as well as information on those still detained as a result of the 1984 coup attempt. The Government has not responded to those requests. Freedom House rated Cameroon "not free."

Cameroon's population is approximately 9.7 million, and is growing at a rate of 2.6 percent per year. Over 60 percent of the population still lives in rural areas, but the urban population is expanding by 10-12 percent per year. The per capita gross national product ($820 in 1983) is poorly distributed among the population.

Cameroon has one of the strongest economies among African developing countries, with a gross domestic product of $7.3 billion (1983-84), and a 6.5 percent growth rate, due primarily to oil revenues, strong and diversified agriculture, a relatively well-balanced, market-oriented economy and prudent economic policy management. The rate of inflation is officially estimated at 14 percent, but it is probably somewhat higher. The rapid growth in urban population has produced an increased need for basic urban infrastructure, and also means that continuing productivity increases in food crop agriculture are necessary if Cameroon is to continue to produce the major part of its food requirements in rural areas. Many of those living below the poverty level (40 percent in 1978) are subsistence farmers.

The average Cameroonian has a life expectancy of 54.6 years. Nationally, the infant mortality rate is officially 113 per 1,000 live births but is probably closer to 127. Chronic undernutrition affects 21 percent of the children under age 5. Despite this figure, the ratio of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 102 percent in 1981. Such practices as early weaning, as well as intestinal parasites and diarrhea, have contributed to infant and child malnutrition, despite the surplus of calories available. Malnutrition is more prevalent in rural areas. Based on a 1976 estimate, some 26 percent of the population is estimated to have access to safe drinking water; the figure for urban dwellers is 35 percent and for rural inhabitants 22 percent.

CAMEROON

The national adult literacy rate is 41.5 percent; 54.6 percent for men and 24.5 percent for women (1976). The school enrollment rate for children between the ages of 6 and 14 averages 88 percent in urban areas and 46 percent in rural areas, with female students noticeably underrepresented in rural secondary schools. School attendance rates are one-third the national average in the Muslim north, where only 22 percent of the children attend school. Girls are underprivileged, both in access to higher education and in terms of professional opportunities. Girls from the southern part of the country, although disadvantaged at the level of secondary entrance when compared with boys from the same areas, have a considerable educational lead over both girls and boys from the eastern and northern provinces.

The Cameroonian national labor code sets the minimum working age at 14, the minimum annual paid vacation at 18 days, and the legal work week at 40 hours for nonagricultural employees and up to 48 hours per week for agricultural workers. Minimum monthly wages are set by the Government for all types of jobs in both the public and private sectors. Wage rates are based on geographic zones, types of industry, and workers' qualifications and length of service. The lowest pay levels are not sufficient to support a family but, in most cases, such wages are supplemented by a second job or another family member's earnings. Workers with middle-range wages are also likely to need second incomes to support a family, especially in the high cost living areas of Yaounde and Douala. Because of Cameroon's healthy economy, opportunities do exist for workers to supplement their wage levels with second jobs. Occupational health and safety is mandated by law, based on the International Labor Organization standards. In theory, these standards are enforced by Ministry of Labor inspectors, but they lack the means for effective enforcement.

Women enjoy equal rights under the Constitution and are politically active in the party and labor union. The women's wing of the party has developed programs aimed at encouraging the economic and social productivity of Cameroonian women. Women are represented in the modern sector, although not proportionately in the upper levels of administration and in the professions. There are currently five women in President Biya's cabinet, but no women governors or prefects. Women also hold positions in the National Assembly and, as a result of the 1983 legislative elections, the percentage of women in the National Assembly increased from 10 to 14 percent.

CAPE VERDE

Cape Verde is ruled by the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV), the country's sole political party. Government ministers, in most cases, are also senior members of the party. Many of them are former leaders of the revolutionary movement to free Cape Verde from Portuguese rule. The party leadership, headed by President Aristides Pereira, rules the country. Although the PAICV is officially open to anyone wishing to join, less than 10 percent of the voting population are active party "militants." Security responsibilities are divided between the Army and the security and police forces, which operate under leadership approved by the party.

The Constitution adopted in 1980 declares the party to be "the supreme expression" of the people and designates the Popular National Assembly as the supreme organ. The Assembly, which selects the President, is elected from a single slate of candidates proposed to the electorate by the party. Elections for the third National Assembly were held on December 7, 1985.

Cape Verde's economy has suffered from an 18-year drought but has benefited from generous foreign assistance, remittances from Cape Verdean emigrants, and efficient economic management by the Government. Moreover, the country has made substantial strides in providing adequate health care, education, and other services. The Government, which is the largest nonagricultural employer, controls banking, the import of basic commodities, the airlines, the press, and the schools. Private property rights are respected, and a substantial private sector consists of shops, hotels, farms, fishing, small industries such as tuna canneries, and the professions.

The human rights situation during 1985 remained basically the same as in 1984. The Government passed a new law aimed at greater freedom of press, but the party cautioned that this right should be exercised responsibly. While little political activity takes place outside party or mass organizations, the largely apolitical population is not repressed and there is little sign of hostile opposition. The longstanding Cape Verdean tradition of emigration provides an escape valve for discontent. Within the one-party system, elections in 1985 provided an opportunity for expanded participation in the political process by all persons over 18 years of age.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1985 there were no reported instances of politically motivated killings. Cape Verde is the only country in Africa where capital punishment has been outlawed.

b. Disappearance

During 1985 there were no reported cases of disappearance.

CAPE VERDE

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although there was no evidence in 1985 of torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment being used in a generalized manner, groups of Cape Verdean emigres from time to time allege that one or another of these activities takes place. The possibility of beatings during interrogations by security officers cannot be ruled out, but there is no evidence that they are condoned by responsible government officials. Conditions in prisons are poor.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

During 1985 there were no reported instances of people being detained, punished, or tried for the expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government. There were no instances of forced exile for political or other reasons. In cases of alleged crimes against state security, persons may be detained for up to five months upon a judge's ruling without trial. There are no forced labor practices in Cape Verde.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are no known political prisoners in Cape Verde. Habeas corpus exists in Cape Verde and appears to be observed except in state security cases. Unless caught in the act, the accused must be brought before a judge within 48 hours of arrest to hear the prosecutor's evidence against him. In exceptional cases, and then only with the concurrence of a procurator or judge, the laying of formal charges may be slightly delayed, but must nonetheless take place within five days. The accused has the right to representation by counsel at such hearings and, depending on the judge's ruling, may be held in custody, released on bail, or released unconditionally. Trials are conducted by a judge, and a public prosecutor presents the case against the accused, who is defended by counsel. The Autonomous Institute for Judiciary Support, to which all private lawyers belong, exists to provide counsel in cases of need. There is no jury system. Trials are generally handled expeditiously and appeal is possible. There is also a system of popular tribunals to adjudicate minor disputes in rural areas. The "judges" are usually prominent local citizens without legal training, who are appointees of the Ministry of Justice. Their decisions can be appealed within the regular court system.

The judiciary does not have the authority to determine the constitutionality of legislation. Although, according to the Constitution, judges are independent, one former judge now living outside the country has claimed that one-party rule in practice has hampered the functioning of a truly independent judiciary. Most evidence suggests, however, that the courts protect individual rights in criminal cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution recognizes the inviolability of domicile, correspondence, and other private means of communication. In the case of a domicile, the law requires search warrants issued by a judge. There were no known cases of arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence during 1985. The Constitution also contains a provision stating that every citizen has the right and the duty to participate in the political, economic, and cultural life of the country. This provision theoretically could be used to force participation in activities against the individual's will. In practice, there is no evidence to suggest that it has been so used.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution proclaims freedom of speech and intellectual creativity, but it also stipulates that none of these rights may be exercised "contrary to national unity". While freedom of the press is not specifically guaranteed by the Constitution, a new law adopted in 1985 assures citizens the right to express their views in the press. At the same time, the political commission of the party underlined that this right should be exercised responsibly. The weekly newspaper and radio are government owned, and follow government policies. Although occasional articles critical of some aspects of government policy are printed or broadcast, this is probably done with prior government authorization. International periodicals generally circulate freely in Cape Verde, even when they contain articles critical of or unflattering to the Government, as is sometimes the case with Portuguese newspapers. International radio broadcasts are received without interference. Censorship of movies is practiced, although it is not known if the criteria are political or moral. Local radio broadcasts carry items from Western press agencies as well as from Communist countries, generally identifying sources on controversial international issues and balancing, for example, Tass reports with reports from Western sources. The Catholic Church's newspaper, which occasionally publishes moderate criticism of some aspects of life in Cape Verde, seems to be tolerated without interference. The Nazarenes and Seventh Day Adventists distribute papers published abroad.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While the Constitution specifies the rights of freedom of assembly, association, and demonstration, as a practical matter no organization opposed to government actions or policies is permitted. Private associations other than sports clubs and religious youth groups do not exist, and those few are subject to authorization. Party sponsored "mass organizations" of women and youth are prominent.

Workers in several sectors are organized into unions which are members of the National Union Confederation. Although it claims to be independent of the party, the Confederation is affiliated with the party and headed by a high ranking party member. Perhaps one-third of the active work force are nominal union members. Individual unions perform some traditional trade union functions and also act as party affiliates. The right to collective bargaining exists. If a dispute cannot be settled by the employer and the union or employees involved, the matter is referred to a labor tribunal. The right to strike is guaranteed but rarely used, even though union leadership in state enterprises has taken positions opposed to government policies on specific issues. The National Union Confederation is a participant in the International Labor Organization and is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, but has not taken positions independent of those officially sanctioned by the Government. It maintains contact and receives assistance from both Communist and non-Communist national unions abroad.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution provides for separation of church and state. Freedom of worship is respected by the Government, and members of all faiths practice their religion without harassment. Two-thirds or more of the population, probably including most government leaders, are nominally Catholic, but the dominance of Catholicism does not appear adversely to affect other faiths. Evangelical Protestants and Seventh Day Adventists make up the two other principal religious communities.

At least two faiths, the Baha'i and Christian Rationalism, which were formally banned or suppressed under the Portuguese, have been permitted to reestablish themselves since independence. There are no restrictions on religious conversion and teaching, or on contacts with coreligionists outside Cape Verde. The Catholic Church, for example, openly opposes birth control by other than the "natural family planning" method, even though other methods are advocated and supported by the Government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no extraordinary legal or administrative restrictions on either travel or residence within the country. All resident Cape Verdeans wishing to leave the country, either temporarily or permanently, must obtain exit permission from the Government. Such permission has not been denied for political reasons. Emigration has long been an important and recognized means of escape from prevailing harsh economic conditions. The Government makes a considerable effort to maintain close contact with emigre communities, and provides every opportunity for Cape Verdeans living abroad to maintain their ties with the homeland, including making provision for them to vote in elections. Repatriation is a constitutional right, and the Government does not discourage intending repatriates.

The law allows for revocation of citizenship on several grounds, including activities contrary to the interest of the country. However, there are no known cases of the Government instituting proceedings to deprive persons of citizenship. There are at most only a handful of foreign refugees in Cape Verde. In August 1985, when a Cuban family sought refuge in the American Embassy and assistance in departing to a third country, the Government not only authorized them to leave but provided protection and cooperated fully in making the departure arrangements.

The single-party monopoly of power in Cape Verde is inscribed in the Constitution. Opposition parties are not permitted, although small opposition groups exist abroad. The small group of men who actually led the struggle for independence occupy positions of leadership in both the party and the Government. The Secretary General of the party is President of the Republic; the Deputy Secretary General is Prime Minister; and the third ranking party official is President of the National Assembly. Altogether, seven of the nine members of the party's Political Commission are also Ministers; the other two manage day-to-day activities of the party. At the time of the party's second and most recent Congress in 1983, there were 5,860 members, representing about 5 percent of the total adult population, a 100 percent increase since 1975. The party membership is young (47 percent under 30 years of age), largely male (women are 14 percent of membership), disproportionately urban (50 percent in a nation which is more than two-thirds rural), and heavily bureaucratic (25 percent of the party members are civil servants or employees of state enterprises). Within this elitist party, there exists modest scope for meaningful political activity. For example, the delegates to the Second Party Congress, and the leadership itself, were elected by secret ballot with some unexpected changes in the order of precedence of the Ministers. The party leadership at that Congress also made an obvious effort to give more prominent roles to women and individuals possessing less solid revolutionary credentials.

Elections for the Third Popular Assembly were held in December 1985. The party controls the election process, but each list of candidates contained from 1 1/2 to 4 times more names than the number of deputies to be elected from a particular constituency. There are at least three stages of local consultation and the final candidates, including nonparty as well as party members, are selected by secret ballot. In the 1985 elections, 6 persons not on the party's preliminary list were chosen by the people for inclusion on the final list.

While the National Assembly is the formal supreme organ of the Government, in fact most day-to-day decisions are delegated to the Council of Ministers. The Assembly meets twice yearly in sessions at which earlier party/government decisions are ratified. Although issues are debated openly, with critical interventions reported by the media, policy decisions made by the Council of Ministers are not reversed. Nevertheless, deputies who believe the interests of their constituents are being harmed by Government policies or decisions feel free to criticize those policies or decisions, and do so.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In the past, the Government has permitted visits by private organizations to check on the condition of persons convicted for political or related offenses. There are no known instances in which the Government has been the subject of resolutions, investigations, or other actions by international human rights organizations. A few Cape Verdean emigrants living abroad have consistently made allegations of human rights violations. These charges may have influenced internal policies, given the Government's major effort to maintain close relations with the large communities of Cape Verdean emigrants around the world. There are no known human rights organizations in the country, although the lawyers' Association for the Provision of Judicial Support in effect acts as such. Amnesty International's 1985 Report does not contain an entry on Cape Verde. Freedom House rates Cape Verde as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Cape Verde has few natural resources and suffers from inadequate rainfall and other fresh water supplies. In periods of normal rainfall, only 4 of the 10 islands support significant agricultural production. The population is about 312,000 and growing at the rate of 1.9 percent a year. Over 100,000 persons farm or work in agricultural production. Per capita GNP is estimated at about $353. Over the past 150 years, recurrent droughts and high unemployment have led to massive emigration. There is a large Cape Verdean overseas population estimated at about 500,000, of whom some 300,000 live in the United States. Emigrant remittances and foreign aid account for two-thirds of the country's GNP.

The Government gives high priority to the prevention of famine, which has been averted since independence through food aid provided primarily by western countries, including a cumulative total of $60 million from the U.S. There have been no recorded deaths from starvation, though this was a serious problem during droughts prior to independence. Up to 20 percent of donated emergency food is distributed free to the old, the infirm, and others unable to work. The remainder is sold under the terms of agreements with the donors and the proceeds used for development projects such as water and soil conservation programs.

Life expectancy at birth is 62 years, with an infant mortality rate estimated at 88 per 1,000 live births, and an overall death rate in 1980 of 8 per 1000. The adult literacy rate is 37 percent. Primary school attendance (ages 7 to 12) has increased 300 percent since independence, and schooling is now available to more than 80 percent of this age group. Nonetheless, schools continue to be characterized by overcrowded classrooms and a paucity of trained teachers.

The Code of the Family, enacted in October 1981, prescribes full legal equality of men and women, including equal pay for equal work. Minimum wages are established by government decree. As of January 1, 1986, the established minimum wage for civil servants (the basis for minimum wages in all other forms of nonrural employment) is approximately $72 per month at current exchange rates. In rural areas, the daily minimum for the least skilled types of labor is about $0.83. There are 10 paid holidays per year, with supplementary "days of tolerance" for some religious festivals or other special occasions. There does not appear to be an overall safety and health code for the workplace, although there are particular regulations such as those prohibiting the employment of minors in establishments where toxic materials are present. The minimum age for employment is 14, and children under 16 are prohibited from working at night or working more than 7 hours per day. The normal work week is 44 hours over 5 1/2 days. A worker is entitled to at least one full day (24 hours) of leisure per week. These regulations seem to be respected in practice.

Racial discrimination is not a problem in Cape Verde. The vast majority of the population is of Portuguese-African ancestry. Sex discrimination exists sociologically, although banned by the Constitution. Many of the traditional, male oriented values of the Portuguese and African ancestors of today's Cape Verdeans are still part of the country's culture. Women have been customarily excluded from certain types of work and are often paid less than men for comparable work. However, the Government has included women in the labor intensive economic development projects financed by foreign grants. The Organization of Cape Verdean Women was founded in 1980, with party encouragement, to sensitize Cape Verdeans to issues affecting women.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

General Andre Dieudonne Kolingba has headed the Government of the Central African Republic since his accession to power in a bloodless coup on September 1, 1981. He holds all political power and is the final arbiter on all governmental matters. He also headed the Military Committee for National Recovery until September 21, 1985, when that Committee was dissolved to make way for a civilian government composed of 18 Ministers, 4 Secretaries of State, and 2 High Commissioners. This shift is viewed as one step in broadening the base of the Government.

The Ministry of Interior is in charge of the Central African Republic's civilian police force. These police normally man barriers on the major roads and keep records on the movement of vehicles. The presidency has its own security force. The Ministry of Defense also has a military police force, in addition to the armed forces. Kolingba's Government faced sporadic challenges from dissidents in the north along the Chadian border throughout 1985. Although the dissidents were not a major threat, Central African and Chadian military forces held a joint military sweep through the area in April in an effort to root out opposition elements. A number of villages allegedly harboring oppositionists were burned, and a number of people were arrested and brought to the capital of Bangui.

The Central African Republic is a poor, landlocked, sparsely populated country. Its inhabitants for the most part derive their livelihood from subsistence agriculture. Only about 1 percent of the population is university educated. The essentially free enterprise agrarian economy, one of the world's least monetized, has suffered from inadequately coordinated and implemented government policies, occasional drought, and a poorly trained work force. Expatriates dominate the small manufacturing and commercial sectors of the economy. In 1985, the Government made progress towards reducing fraud and corruption in the public sector and towards stimulating the economy in the agricultural and industrial sectors.

There was some improvement in the human rights situation in the Central African Republic in 1985. The Government on December 31, 1984, released 85 political prisoners who had never been brought to trial and reduced the sentences of some others. As the year 1985 progressed, however, some civilian casualties were reported in the northern fighting, and sporadic arrests of people for political reasons continued. Some of those arrested were held until proven innocent and then released; others were found guilty and sentenced; others are still held without being charged. On December 1, 1985, President Kolingba pardoned 89 political prisoners. An additional 120 persons convicted of or charged with nonpolitical offenses were also released.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no evidence of killings or summary executions for political motives by government forces. However, there may have been some civilian casualties in the military action against guerrillas in April.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence that people have been abducted, secretly arrested, or clandestinely detained, or that they disappeared as a result of government action.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Penal Code prohibits torture and provides for sanctions against persons guilty of physical abuse. Nevertheless, there are reports of beatings in prisons. In addition, there have been reports of torture by military officers of alleged dissidents or sympathizers in the northern area around Paoua. Conditions in the prisons are generally poor, and medical attention is inadequate. However, prominent political detainees have reportedly been well-treated and given special privileges, such as extra family visits.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Kolingba's Government has on occasion engaged in arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. Generally such arrests occur when allegations are made that a suspect has engaged in acts which present a threat to the regime. It is likely that some political detainees are currently being held, but it is difficult to say precisely how many are being held at any one time since they are not all kept at the main prison but may be kept in the gendarmerie or in other detention places around Bangui. Often they are held for a few days or a few months and released if no evidence is found against them. Family members, legal counsel, doctors, and ministers of the faith have, as a rule, been allowed access to prisoners. It is not uncommon for those held outside the main prison to be allowed to return home during the day or to sleep at night. Under local law, political detainees can be held without charge for as long as 2 months, but at that point detainees must either be formally charged or released. If they are charged, local judicial procedures (which are modeled on French procedures) allow for open-ended preventive detention while the public prosecutor prepares the state's case against the accused. Some political detainees are held much longer than 2 months, however, without formal charges being brought against them. In the case of common criminals, the law requires that within 96 hours they be brought before a magistrate who decides whether formal charges will be filed.

About six well-known political opponents live in exile. Several have been sentenced to death in absentia for crimes against the state. However, during December 1, 1985, National Day celebrations, President Kolingba indicated a possible willingness to move toward reconciliation with opposition elements.

The Government has been cited in the International Labor Organization (ILO) for being in violation of ILO conventions 29 and 105, for allegedly imposing compulsory labor on prisoners jailed for unauthorized political activities.

e. Denial of a Fair Public Trial

In most common criminal cases, the Government permits French-modeled legal procedures to be fairly and openly applied and the laws to be properly executed. The new constitutional decree of September 21, 1985, which is apparently prefatory to the planned future constitution, states that the judiciary "is guaranteed independence (from) the legislative and executive (power)." The President of the Republic is the guarantor of that independence in his role of "President of the Supreme Magistrative Council."

The number of political prisoners is unknown. The case of High Commissioner Francois Gueret, Secretary General of the banned political party, Movement for Democracy and Independence, has been well-publicized and is not atypical. In February 1985, he was arrested and charged with destroying administrative documents and inciting public disorder. When the State's procurer cited lack of evidence to support those charges, Gueret was charged with refusing to wear the military uniform required of high commissioners. A judicial inquiry recommended his release at the end of April. Nevertheless, he continued to be detained and was finally charged with trying to overthrow the Government. A public trial, under a special tribunal, was held, and he was convicted and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

A special tribunal comprising civilian magistrates and military advisers adjudicates political crimes. The special tribunal differs from ordinary courts in that there is no appeal process except for the possibility of presidential clemency, and in that it can try a case only after being specifically authorized by the President. Political detainees have a right to legal counsel from the start of formal procedures. President Kolingba has authorized the meeting of the special tribunal on a fairly frequent basis. Trials are open to the public and are often reported in the local media.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right to speak publicly about political developments or to criticize the Government is circumscribed although most people feel free to comment privately on the situation. The Government prohibits the distribution of tracts and literature deemed to be subversive. There are no regularly published newspapers, but those that do appear sporadically are carefully monitored. Both the radio and television are controlled by the Government.

In July 1985, the local television broadcast a roundtable on human rights to a wide audience. Roundtable participants included government officials and private individuals involved in legal matters, as well as the U.S. Ambassador.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Only assemblies of a nonpolitical nature can take place without fear of government repression.

In 1981, Kolingba suspended the General Union of Central African Workers, and no effective labor movement has existed in the country since that time. The Government tacitly approves of an apoliticized labor federation that exists mostly on paper and has no collective bargaining authority. The ILO has a case pending before it involving the Central African Republic's alleged violations of the right to freedom of association under ILO Convention 87. The Government has yet to provide the substantive information requested by the ILO committee reviewing the case. In principle, the right to strike exists, although fear of government reprisals has dampened the enthusiasm of potential strikers.

During 1985, there was a very brief student strike at the university to protest the detention of two student association leaders who had been suspended for disrupting the activities of the association. They were not detained for long, and the strike ended quickly. Also in 1985 there were, for the first time, several demonstrations in Bangui by university graduates and sympathizers who have not found employment due to the current freeze on hiring in the civil service and the paucity of jobs in the private sector. The demonstrations were peaceful, and the Government refrained from taking any repressive measures.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government does not generally interfere with religious activities. Religious organizations and missionary groups are provided religious freedom by Central African custom. No single religion predominates, nor does the Government appear to discriminate in favor of or against specific religions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

People are generally free to move about within the country, although there are road checkpoints. The right of voluntary travel and repatriation is recognized. Financial and educational constraints rather than government controls restrict most foreign travel and emigration. No case of revocation of citizenship was reported in 1985.

The country remains relatively hospitable to foreigners; the largest foreign population living either temporarily or permanently in the country is from Chad, with the vast majority relying on U.N. relief. During 1985, the number of Chadian refugees--mostly women, children, and the aged--increased to some 40,000 along the northern border. The Government is working with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) to move them to four settlements away from the border. Recent reports indicate that many of the refugees are now returning to Chad.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of
 to Change Their Government

On September 21, 1985, President Kolingba dissolved the National Committee for Recovery and appointed a civilian cabinet, an event which continued the process begun in 1984 of moving from a military government towards institutionalization of a civilian government. Kolingba took a further step towards civilian rule in December when he announced that he will name a constitutional commission in early 1986 which would be tasked with writing a new constitution or appropriately amending the constitution that was suspended in 1981. Currently, President Kolingba retains all political power, presiding over the executive branch and establishing legislation through the Council of Ministers and by presidential decree. Although in practice he allows his cabinet considerable leeway in the day-to-day activities of government administration, he makes all important policy decisions and is the final arbiter of all government matters. Since September 1, 1981, all forms of public and private assembly for political purposes have been proscribed and Kolingba has stated that he has "no intention of returning his country to the turbulent multiparty experience of the pre-1981 regime."

Preference for high government positions has generally been given to members of President Kolingba's Yakoma tribe. However, the preeminence of this group has been lessened by Kolingba's recent cabinet reshuffle. There are no women ministers, secretaries of state, or high commissioners in the Kolingba Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not welcome and is sensitive to international or nongovernmental investigation of alleged human rights abuses but does not prohibit such investigations. Representatives of Amnesty International and the International Committee of the Red Cross visit Bangui periodically. Amnesty International, in its 1985 report (covering 1984), was concerned about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience (most of whom were released at the end of 1984); about the detention without trial of other political prisoners, including some refugees; and about certain aspects of trials before the special tribunal. Freedom House rates the Central African Republic "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Central African Republic is one of the world's least developed nations. In 1985, per capita gross national product was $310, and the population of 2.8 million was growing at the rate of 3 percent a year.

The economy has suffered in the past 15 years from poor policies, inept management, and corruption, but agricultural production during 1985 was good with cotton and coffee production up substantially. Current government plans focus on strengthening the agricultural sector--and on discouraging urban migration by providing rural development--primarily through road building/maintenance programs and encouraging cash and food crop production. During 1985, in accordance with an International Monetary Fund standby agreement, the Government continued to implement austere budget measures and increase government revenues including efforts to reduce the bloated civil service and improve tax collection.

The infant mortality rate is 134 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy at birth is only 48.8 years, due to inadequate or simply nonexistent health care in most of the country. Although health care is accorded a high priority by the Government, lack of trained personnel and the inaccessibility of large parts of the country impede its delivery to much of the population. In 1978, 40 percent of the urban population and 5 percent of the rural population had access to safe water. In 1977, caloric supply as a percent of the daily requirement was 95 for the average Central African.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Almost all education in the country is government supported. Total school population is about 310,000 (primary through university levels). In 1980, about 33 percent of the adult population was literate (49 percent of the men and 19 percent of the women); undoubtedly this rate is far lower in rural areas. The Government is making a concerted effort to train more teachers and to build more schools for those living outside the capital. In 1981, primary school enrollment was 89 percent for males and 50 percent for females of primary school age.

With respect to employment and working conditions, the law forbids employment of children under 14 years of age. While it is only loosely enforced, jobs are in such demand that children in the labor force are generally limited to working as helpers in family business such as selling food products or cigarettes. Minimum wages have been established by the Government, and a social security system exists. However, much labor is performed outside the wage and social security system and probably does not meet the minimum levels set. The law sets maximum working hours for government employees and most people in the private sector at 40 hours per week. Domestic employees may work up to 56 hours. There are also general laws on health and safety standards in the workplace, but they are neither precisely defined nor actively enforced.

Women are generally accorded a lower status than men in the Central African Republic. Their work at home and in the fields prevents many of them from receiving any formal education. Polygamy is common, but the legal system and traditional practice support the rights of wives and all children of such marriages. A national women's organization exists which is supported by the Government.

There are more than 80 ethnic groups living in the Central African Republic. There is no institutionalized discrimination.

CHAD

Since 1982, Chad has been governed by a military regime led by President Hisssein Habre. Relying upon the armed forces as his power base, Mr. Habre heads a Council of Ministers which, along with an appointed National Consultative Council, comprises the executive and legislative branches of the Government. The multiethnic National Union for Independence and Revolution (UNIR) was created in 1984 to broaden Habre's political base, and in 1985 it continued to be the only legally authorized political movement. President Habre is now making a concerted effort to create a truly national government and end the complex civil war that has raged with varying intensity for over 20 years. The long conflict has produced massive dislocations of Chadians and heavy civilian and military casualties. Habre's efforts toward national reconciliation are inhibited, however, by the continued occupation of the northern 40 percent of the country (mainly desert) by over 5,000 Libyan soldiers in alliance with rebel forces headed by ex-President Goukouni Oueddei, the leader of the so-called Transitional Government of National Unity (GUNT). Furthermore, the Libyans support much of the rebel activity in central and southern Chad, which involves forces tied at least nominally to GUNT vice president Colonel Wadel Kamougue.

Although rebel activity in the South decreased during 1985, insurgent attacks against military and civilian targets still occurred sporadically and remain a constant threat. The vigorous and often indiscriminate government responses to these attacks have produced cycles of violence and human rights violations. Government soldiers and rebels alike sometimes pillage and murder, and many in the countryside continue to fear for their lives and consequently flee to neighboring countries.

Chad is desperately poor. Its Government is debt-ridden and its population of 5 million has the lowest annual per capita gross national product (GNP) in the world: less than $80. In 1985, however, the severe regional drought abated and prospects for good harvests improved. Economic and especially famine disaster was averted by the nearly $200 million of foreign assistance provided in 1985 for emergency food aid and development projects. The Chadian Government obtains most of its revenues from customs duties and an export tax on cotton. The cotton crop continues to be a favorite target of the rebels.

During the years of the most intense period in the civil war, 1979 to 1982, judicial and other civil institutions that might have protected human rights disintegrated and are only beginning to be reestablished in the nonoccupied areas. Armed conflict in the South accounted for many of the worst human rights abuses during 1985. However, the prospects for good harvests, healthier and more abundant livestock, steady reconstruction, together with war-weariness, a growing respect for President Habre's ability to govern, and increasing discord among the armed opposition, encouraged many rebels to abandon the insurgency and join with the Government. Libyan-occupied northern Chad remains closed to outside observers, and it is difficult to document human rights abuses there. The Chadian Government has accused the Libyans of forcibly deporting Chadians to labor camps and prisons in Libya, of compelling Chadian women to marry Libyan soldiers, and of imposing strict controls on virtually all civilian movement.

CHAD

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

SECTION 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

With the North firmly under Libyan military occupation, the fighting in 1985 was mostly between the Government and rebels in southern Chad. As a carry-over from 1984, when the insurgency in the south was much worse, de facto martial law continues in some southern provinces. Southerners suspected of supporting rebel commandos ("CODOS") against the Government have been victimized by the often poorly trained and disciplined government soldiers.

There were many examples of both government and rebel violence in 1985: In February, in villages near Danamadji (Moyen Chari Province), government troops killed 50 civilians in an attempt to avenge the deaths of 12 National Armed Forces (FANT) soldiers at the hands of "CODOS". In April, presidential guards reportedly killed 17 villagers in Gondey. Early in the year, government forces executed 55 Democratic Revolutionary Council (CDR) rebels and suspected rebel sympathizers in the town of Mongo (Guera Province) without proper trial. In May, a seismic testing crew discovered 17 bodies in a stream bed west of Bebedjia (Logone Oriental Province). It was not determined if these were victims of government troops or "CODOS". In mid-June, "CODO" rebels pillaged two villages outside of Mongo and killed one farmer. In late July, government troops rounded up and killed approximately 60 civilians in the village of Ngalo (Moyen Chari), many of them suspected of complicity with the rebels. President Habre, reportedly outraged, ordered that the two troop commanders, ostensibly the instigators of the massacre, be executed in the same village. "CODO" rebels killed the subprefect of Baibokoum in August, possibly in retaliation for the Ngalo massacre. Also in August, presidential guards killed five men and one child in Dogoininga. Dissension between Libyan and GUNT forces in Faya Largeau during September resulted in well over 60 deaths with many wounded. In late October, "CODO" rebels attacked a group of nomadic herders outside of Beinamar (Logone Occidental) and killed about 80 people. In November, "CODOS" burned the cotton crop of the Canton of Tchagara (Logone Occidental) and mutilated the Canton chief by cutting off his ears.

Innocent victims also suffered as a result of FANT military operations against "CODO" rebels along the border with the Central African Republic (CAR). Chadian government troops reportedly invaded refugee camps in the CAR in late January, killing some 30 suspected rebels and sympathizers once they had taken them back into Chad. In anti-"CODO" operations in southern Moyen Chari, many civilians were killed by FANT troops in Maro subprefecture. The office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the CAR reported that, as a result of these border operations, Chadians seeking refuge in the CAR increased by 25 percent in February and March. It was also reported that in December government troops entered northern Cameroon and attacked a group of Chadian refugees, injuring 35 or more persons.

CHAD

According to Amnesty International, in its 1985 report (covering 1984), most reported disappearances and extrajudicial executions took place during the operations in southern Chad, and many occurred in the fall of 1984 at the hands of government forces. In 1985, there were again reports of disappearances, attributable to both government and opposition forces, but the total number seems to have dropped from 1984. Many Chadians have fled to neighboring countries to escape the fighting and the drought (see 2d below).

There was a hostage-taking incident in February in which three American oil company employees were kidnapped by rebel commandos near Sarh (Moyen Chari). One of the hostages was almost immediately released; the other two were freed unharmed a few days later when government troops swept the rebel hideout. Another incident involving the abduction by rebels of two American oil company employees in southern Chad (Logone Oriental Province) occurred in late November. The hostages escaped unharmed in early December while government troops searching the area were engaged in combat with their rebel captors.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Many incidents of torture and degrading treatment reportedly occurred in 1985 in connection with the fighting. In the countryside, government forces have been accused of arson and of humiliation of persons thought to be sympathetic to rebel forces. There are occasional reports that rebels in southern Chad have maimed peasants who plant certain crops, primarily cotton, the most important source of revenue for the Government. One form of punishment is said to be the amputation of hands.

Chadian prisoners of war from the National Transitional Unity Government (GUNT) forces are known to be held in N'Djamena and in the provinces. These POW's, several hundred in number, are not known to be singled out for mistreatment. In some instances, they may fare better than other prisoners to the extent that the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is able to provide medical care and food for them. The ICRC has not been authorized access to the estimated 20 Libyan POW's being held by Chadian authorities nor to any political detainees.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In unoccupied Chad the judicial system and criminal code have evolved primarily from the body of law inherited from the former colonial power, France. In theory, this law incorporates safeguards against arbitrary arrest and specifies detainee rights, including the right to counsel and to be informed promptly of charges. However, in practice, civil strife over 20 years has severely disrupted the legal system, especially the operation of the courts. The Government and many opposing factions have felt few legal constraints in prosecuting military actions. De facto martial law remains in effect in a number of southern provinces and Islamic law reportedly is used exclusively in the Libyan-occupied North. In particular, there are no legal safeguards in either area for persons thought to be endangering the security of the State.

CHAD

Amnesty International has expressed concern in its 1985 report about the detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government as well as similar detention without trial of political opponents of GUNT. The Government contends that detainees are not prisoners of conscience, but prisoners-of-war captured in combat or counterinsurgency operations. Few, if any, of them have been charged with treason or espionage before the judiciary.

Nevertheless, the Government released many political detainees in 1985, especially in the spring, for policy reasons, i.e., to encourage national reconciliation. About 450 persons were freed during a three month period starting in early March.

The Chadian Government continues to report that there are large-scale deportations of Chadians from the northern portion of the country to Libya for indoctrination, assimilation, forced labor, or military service in the Islamic Legion. The most well-known case of detention in the North was that of Acheikh ibn Oumar, leader of the Democratic Revolutionary Council (CDR), one of the factions previously aligned with ex-president Goukouni's GUNT forces. He was seized in November 1984 and imprisoned until his release in November 1985.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) has been critical of Chad in the past for the use of forced labor and in 1985 sent a delegation to consult with Chadian officials on several outdated labor laws which do not meet ILO norms, including the ILO's conventions on forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Despite the civil war and Libyan occupation in the North, the Government since 1982 has been giving attention to rebuilding the judicial system in the more secure areas, notably in towns under government control. There are very few trained legal people in Chad, but the Government continued in 1985 when possible to appoint additional judges and investigating magistrates to handle regular civil and criminal cases. In February, the Council of Ministers established a special court of justice, inaugurated by the President in April, to try cases involving embezzlement of public funds and abuse of public office. Notwithstanding this progress, under the existing legal system the judiciary remains dependent on the chief executive.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under Chadian law, homes may be searched only during the day and under authority of a warrant. In practice, however, there are many instances where this law has not been respected in the present civil strife. Private property has been seized and utilized as desired by soldiers, deserters, and bandits in all parts of Chad.

In Libyan-occupied northern Chad there reportedly have been forced resettlements of Chadians and forced marriages between Chadian women and Libyan soldiers/colonizers.

CHAD

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Temporary detention is a likely penalty for publishing or spreading information considered contrary to the Government's interests. The Government owns most media (radio stations, a mimeographed daily news bulletin, and the weekly UNIR magazine). Chadian journalists are employees of the Government and practice self-censorship. Chadian law enforcement officials are known to "discourage" Chadians from listening to Radio Bardai, the rebel radio station in the North, which is actually located in Libya. Private groups (religious and otherwise) publish nonpolitical information freely, and ideologically hostile foreign magazines and newspapers are sometimes on sale in the capital. Since late July, however, the distribution and sale of the Paris-based journal Afrique-Asie has been banned because of its persistent criticism of the Chadian Government. This is the first instance of an outright government ban since 1982. In 1985, the Government instituted the censorship of video cassettes, along with the control and licensing of video clubs and their commercial outlets.

Freedoms of speech, press, and assembly are tightly controlled in the Libyan-occupied North where the use of French, one of the two official languages of Chad, has been largely proscribed.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In government-controlled Chad, there is no forced membership in any political organization. However, voluntary membership is legally limited to the various components of the sole authorized movement, the National Union for Independence and Revolution (UNIR), which has endeavored throughout 1985 to strengthen and extend its organization.

Chad's labor laws have provisions for freedom of association for workers, for confederation of unions, and for the right to bargain collectively. The right to strike exists only after arbitration at three levels and two ministries (Labor and Justice) fails. There are two labor union confederations in Chad, both of which are only marginally effective and in large part controlled by the Government. These unions are too weak and the economy too undeveloped for organized labor to be a significant political force.

In Libyan-occupied northern Chad, the free assembly of indigenous Chadians is severely limited, but details are lacking.

c. Freedom of Religion

Government-controlled Chad professes to be a secular state. Islam, Christianity, and other religions are freely practiced, despite historical pressures favoring Islam in much of the country. Both Islamic and Christian holidays are official government holidays. More than 50 percent of the population is Muslim. In the South, Christian missionaries are occasionally accused of sympathizing with "CODO" insurgents, but this suspicion is fading, and missionaries continue to enter the country, proselytize, and provide assistance to local populations. There is no evidence that being a non-Muslim subjects one to government disfavor.

CHAD

In Libyan-occupied northern Chad, only the Muslim religion may be practiced openly.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel in Chad continues to be circumscribed by the presence of hostile forces north of the 16th parallel and persistent areas of instability in the South. There are few places, in fact, where there is no possibility of encounters with official or quasi-official roadblocks, highwaymen, or opposition forces. Because of the recent severe drought and persisting civil strife, thousands of Chadians have fled to neighboring countries, most notably some 100,000 to Sudan and 50,000 to the Central African Republic. Although the agricultural situation improved in 1985, large numbers of these displaced persons were reluctant to return to conditions of possible deprivation, physical injury, and worse. The Government encourages the return of these displaced populations, except to Libyan-occupied northern Chad. The prefects of the eastern and southern provinces of Ouaddai and Moyen Chari are working with relief agencies to establish assistance programs to promote the repatriation of these persons under secure and manageable conditions. Expatriates in Chad are prevented from traveling in certain regions of the South because of insecure conditions. Units from relief organizations require military escort in some areas.

International travel is permitted. Chadians may obtain regular passports for a fee of about $45, provided they have been cleared by Chad's internal security services, a process which normally takes less than a week.

The movement of Chadians in the occupied north is reported to be tightly controlled and severely restricted.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The present political system does not allow for change of government by the people. Chad has been in a state of civil strife since 1965, with various factions, and as many as 11 different armies, contending for control of the country. France and Libya are the key outside powers involved in Chad. Their 1984 agreement for withdrawal of all foreign troops from the country was honored by France and Zaire but violated by Libya, whose troops continue to occupy northern Chad.

Since June 1982, Chad has been governed by President Hissain Habre, who heads a French-style Council of Ministers complemented by an appointed National Consultative Council (CNC) (protolegislature). Both councils are carefully balanced with a view toward ethnic and regional harmony. The source of President Habre's authority is the allegiance he commands from most of the armed forces, the security services, and the country's only authorized political movement, the National Union for Independence and Revolution (UNIR). The movement was created in 1984 as a means to increase Habre's base of support and to provide some political participation to the populace. UNIR's by-laws mandate the popular election of lower-level officials, but, as yet, no elections have been scheduled. At present, laws, decrees, and ordinances are proposed by the President and the Council of Ministers and "discussed" by the CNC prior to promulgation.

CHAD

In the occupied northern zone, Chadians must establish Libyan-style "People's Committees." The leadership of the rebel Transitional Government of National Unity (GUNT) is Chadian, headed by former president Goukouni Oueddei. The GUNT was initially made up of representatives of several political factions, such as the Democratic Revolutionary Council, but GUNT support was eroded in 1985 by disillusionment with Libyan control and by Habre's increasingly successful efforts at national reconciliation. The GUNT is supported by Col. Qadhafi and, in effect, serves as a front for the Libyan occupation of northern Chad.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Amnesty International expressed its concern in 1984 to the Chadian Government about the disappearance or extrajudicial execution of hundreds of people detained at the hands of the armed forces and about the detention without trial of suspected government opponents. On invitation, Amnesty International sent a three-man team to meet with government officials in March and April to discuss its list of detainees. Many of those listed were prisoners-of-war, and others could not be identified. Names of only two political detainees remained unresolved at the end of the visit, and the Government promised to investigate these cases and to respond systematically to further inquiries. The Amnesty International team did not travel to the South or to the occupied North. Some of Amnesty International's concerns, as expressed in its 1985 report, are also covered above in Section 1b and 1d. Freedom House rates Chad as "not free."

In April 1985, the Government accounted in detail for five Chadians whose fate had been queried by the Commission on Human Rights of the Archdiocese of St. Louis, Missouri.

As noted above, the Chadian Government permits the ICRC to visit many prisoners-of-war, but does not permit ICRC visits to political detainees. The Libyans do not permit ICRC visits to Chadian prisoners-of-war in the North, although the ICRC is continuing its efforts to negotiate with the GUNT for such visits.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Chad's population of 5 million is growing at the high rate of 3.8 percent annually and its people continue to rank among the world's most underprivileged. The economy is largely subsistence agriculture and herding, with cotton and animal products the only significant exports. Per capita GNP is estimated to be less than $80 per annum. After over 20 years of civil strife, Libyan/rebel occupation of the vast desert North, years of drought and increasing desertification, Chad's economic and social condition is precarious. Timely international disaster relief efforts, an encouraging rainy season, and reduced military action have combined in 1985 to improve conditions somewhat. Fully a third of the Government's budget goes to the military and most of the rest to pay the salaries of civil servants. Without a direct budget subsidy from France and other foreign assistance, the Government could not operate.

CHAD

According to World Bank data for 1985, life expectancy at birth is 44 years, and infant mortality is 140 per 1,000 live births. Only 30 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water in 1980, the last year for which reliable data are available. There are no more than 50 Chadian physicians in the entire country, complemented by about 70 foreign physicians affiliated with nongovernmental organizations. The typical Chadian consumed only about 75 percent of the recommended caloric requirement in 1977, a year considered good by current standards. Approximately 20 percent of the population is functionally literate. About one-third of the primary school age population is enrolled in school. Female primary school enrollment is 18 percent of all school age children versus 50 percent for males of the same age group.

The minimum age for employment of children is 14. Chad, however, is predominately a labor-intensive agrarian society, so exceptions abound. The current minimum wage is approximately $22 per month. Nonagricultural work is limited to 40 hours per week with overtime to be paid for any excess. Agricultural work is limited to 2,400 hours a year. All workers must have at least 24 consecutive hours of rest each week, usually Sunday. Occupational health and safety are provided for by law and ministerial decree.

In the public domain, women are generally subordinate to men. Women contribute greatly to Chad's agricultural productivity in virtually all aspects of farming. They also engage in commerce ranging from simple market stalls to the ownership of some larger businesses. Women constituted 10 percent of the 1985 freshman class of Chad's national school for livestock extension agents. The titular members of agriculture cooperatives, however, still tend to be men. Some women serve voluntarily in the armed forces, although they are thus far excluded from officer training programs. In 1984, a Ministry of Social and Women's Affairs was created, headed by a woman minister, who is also one of the 15 members of the executive bureau of UNIR's central committee. UNIR also has an active women's organization. Many women and their children continue to be left without adequate means of support, with their husbands missing or dead in the civil strife, or away from home looking for work.

Economic and demographic data pertaining to Libyan-occupied northern Chad are not available. Reports indicate that sizable quantities of livestock have been taken to Libya from northern Chad without proper compensation to their Chadian owners, and that Libyans use food distribution to keep the local populations under control.

COMOROS

The Comoros unilaterally declared its independence from France in 1975. The first president, Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane, was overthrown almost immediately but regained power in 1978 when mercenaries ousted the increasingly repressive and xenophobic "socialist" regime of Ali Soilih. Abdallah was reelected in 1984, in an election boycotted by the opposition. In recent years, including 1985, constitutional amendments have strengthened the President's position, notably by giving him the right to appoint the governors and by establishing a single legal political instrument, the United Progress Party. A March coup attempt by some two dozen Comoran soldiers resulted in their arrest and that of a number of civilians identified with the communist-dominated Democratic Front.

Comoran security forces consist of the Presidential Guard, the strongest military unit in the country, the Gendarmerie, and the Army. The Presidential Guard is led and trained by a mercenary force, which, in the aftermath of the March coup plot, is being expanded. French technical assistance is provided to the small Comoran Army and the Gendarmerie.

Agriculture dominates economic activity, but with a population of 450,000, likely to double by the year 2000, the Comoros are fully utilizing their arable land. Farming on small landholdings, subsistence fishing, and petty commerce provide a livelihood for most of the population. Revenues from the export of copra, vanilla, essence of ylang-ylang, and cloves offset only a part of the cost of necessary imports. There are few industries, inadequate port facilities, and limited highway and communications infrastructure. The Comoros are part of the Francophone Africa Monetary Zone. Government expenses far exceed revenues, and the country depends heavily on France for budgetary support and technical assistance.

The human rights situation in the Comoros in 1985 was affected by the March coup attempt and other alleged plots against the Government. The authorities reportedly subjected many of the 200 persons arrested in March to cruel treatment, including beatings, and kept 80 alleged participants in isolation for long periods before trial. At the same time, the trial process, while criticized as too extended, seemed generally fair to outside observers and ended with the conviction of 77 persons (18 of whom were pardoned in December, 1985).

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From

a. Political Killing

There were no confirmed reports of political killings in 1985. However, there were allegations that as many as four individuals, accused of complicity in the March coup plot, may have died during initial interrogation by the security forces.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance in 1985.

COMOROS

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The March 1985 attempt to assassinate the mercenary officers in the Presidential Guard, as well as certain senior members of the Abdallah regime, led to the arrest of about 200 military and civilian personnel and to the extended detention of about 80 persons. Unconfirmed but credible reports indicated that members of the "Democratic Front" were initially subjected to degrading treatment, including beatings and electric shocks, to extract information implicating other alleged party members in the coup attempt.

Except for the treatment given the alleged coup conspirators, penal discipline is generally lax; prisoners are usually released daily for prayers, and work and families provide their meals.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no concept of habeas corpus in the Comoros. However, detainees do have the right to a judicial hearing on the legality of their detention. The 80 persons held without bail for 8 months were confined in isolation to a military camp under rudimentary conditions awaiting trial in November. About 200 persons in total were arrested following the March coup plot, but most were subsequently released. In addition, there were several others detained during 1985 and charged with plotting the armed overthrow of the Government, including the arrest of some 20 persons, mostly military, in November and December. However, except for these 20 persons, all were subsequently released without trial. Eight individuals associated with the Ali Soilih regime, who had been convicted in 1980, were pardoned in 1985.

There is no evidence of forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The 1978 Constitution provides for the equality of all citizens before the law and the right of all accused to a defense counsel. The judiciary is independent and trials are public. The Comoran legal system mixes Islamic law with an inherited French legal code. A new consolidated code is slowly being drafted. Most disputes are settled by village elders or by a civil court of first instance.

President Abdallah ordered the establishment of a special court of appointed members to try the alleged coup conspirators, based on a 1960 decree as amended in October 1985. Human rights observers protested the lengthy procedural delays but were impressed by the tenor of the trial process itself, which ended in November with the conviction of 77 of the 78 defendants. Sentences ranged from 10 months to life imprisonment. President Abdallah subsequently pardoned 18 of the 77 convicted.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of home and property and this is respected in practice.

COMOROS

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of expression, thought, and conscience, the only local news medium is the government-controlled radio station, which is self-censoring and features progovernment coverage of domestic events. No independent local news publications exist. In 1985, clandestine tracts critical of the regime increased in number and sharpened their attacks and prompted several arrests and the confiscation of printing equipment. A monthly newspaper begun in 1985 features government views on local developments. Foreign journals and newspapers are available, as are books from abroad. Comorans discuss and criticize their government and its leading personalities in private.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution states that freedom of association and freedom to form unions are guaranteed, as well as the right to strike. In practice these rights are partially circumscribed. Since 1982, the only legal political activity is that which takes place under the auspices of the United Progress Party, although in practice social conventions such as the traditional lavish, extended Comoran weddings serve as vehicles for intense political activity. Anniversaries of the death of former political figures and funerals of prominent Comorans also sometimes carry overt political overtones. A September commemoration of the 1975 death of one of President Abdallah's political opponents attracted a large attendance.

Although the right to strike is guaranteed and trade unions are legal, the wage labor force is small and no trade unions exist. The increasing scarcity of jobs is also a restraint on labor complaints, and the Government's inability to pay wages and salaries on schedule sometimes results in work slowdowns, increased absenteeism, and informal peaceful protests to Comoran authorities.

c. Freedom of Religion

An overwhelming majority of the population is Muslim. The Constitution holds Islam to be the "wellspring of the principles and rules which guide the state and its institutions." However, the Government upholds non-Muslims' right to practice their faith. There are churches for the diminutive Protestant and Catholic populations. Christian missionaries work in local hospitals and schools, but they are not allowed to proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement in and out of and within the Comoros for citizens and foreigners is not restricted. A Comoran community abroad, concentrated in France, opposes the Government, but in 1985 there was no evidence that those returning to the Comoros were subjected to government reprisals.

A 28-month long xenophobic and increasingly irrational regime between 1975 and 1978 saw the destruction of all the country's civil records, intermittent persecution of traditionally prominent families, and a violent assault on closely held traditional values. That experience caused many Comorans to fear radical change. The restoration in 1978 of President Abdallah, who represents a combination of traditional power broker politics and a commitment to moderately paced change, ended that phase.

Standing unopposed when the opposition boycotted the election, President Abdallah was overwhelmingly reelected with 99 percent of the vote in September 1984. A French-based opponent was reportedly denied listing on the ballot on technical grounds. The vote total may have been partially inflated by questionable electoral practices. In 1985, Abdallah faced growing opposition exemplified by the March coup attempt. Many of the leaders of the illegal Democratic Alliance, the major opposition political force to Abdallah, remain in detention. Abdallah has had to rely heavily on mercenary support and the personal loyalty of the Presidential Guard. His position is buttressed both by tradition and by his own personal wealth.

Abdallah consolidated ministerial portfolios into four "super Ministries" in January 1985 and in September replaced the leading "notables" in the Cabinet with "technicians," citing the notables' "disloyalty" as reason for the change. Those who were replaced have subsequently undertaken a "constitutional" effort to depose Abdallah. The 38-member Comoran National Assembly supported the President's various initiatives throughout 1985.

The Comoros historically represent the southernmost extension of Arab influence on the Indian Ocean littoral. The constitutional deference to Islam formalizes the deeply held commitment of most Comorans to an Islamic world view. The Comoros Government claims the island of Mayotte as part of the country. A referendum on the status of Mayotte, scheduled for 1984, was postponed by the French Government. No new date has been set. In 1977, 96 percent of the voters in Mayotte opted in favor of retaining ties to France. The Comoran Government has alleged electoral coercion of Mayotte and has pressed France to acknowledge Comoran sovereignty without a plebiscite.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The March coup prompted a visit by several international human rights groups who were critical of the extended detention of alleged coup plotters without legal action. However, they generally considered the trial process to have been fairly conducted. Their attempts to verify reports of beatings of alleged coup plotters were circumscribed by the Government. Amnesty International did not include the Comoros in its 1985 Report (covering 1984). Freedom House rated the Comoros "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Economic prospects for the Comoros remain dim. The population of 450,000 is growing at rate of 2.9 percent per year. All arable land is already under cultivation; erosion and deforestation have reached devastating proportions. There are no evident prospects for industrialization. Markets for the

COMOROS

Comoros' tropical cash crops are fragile and dwindling. The per capita GNP of $339 (1982) may decrease further as exports decline and the population grows.

Thus far, an abundance of tropical fruits and fish has kept serious malnutrition at bay. In 1977, calorie levels met 89 percent of minimum needs, but child malnutrition is growing. Major food commodities such as rice must be imported. The need for long-term international help in the form of food aid and technical assistance for crop diversification appears unavoidable. Combined with rising unemployment for Comoran youth and very limited prospects for growth in the industrial or service sectors, the Comoros faces intensifying unemployment and continued severe fiscal and balance of payments crises. A steadily deteriorating health situation, aggravated by endemic malaria, exacerbates Comorans' difficulties.

Young children are employed in household chores but not in the public or commercial sectors; the absence of a minimum age law for employment does not in practice encourage child labor abuse because jobs for adolescents and young adults are scarce and wages for workers of all ages are very low. There is little industrialization or factory activity. There are regulations on occupational safety and health, but in the absence of any significant industrial sector they are not being enforced. There is a minimum wage for government employees. Hours of work in any category rarely exceed 35 hours per week.

Within Comoran society, men have the dominant role. The society respects authority based on inheritance, age, and wealth or religious leadership. At traditional ceremonies and social gatherings, the sexes are separated. However, women are neither veiled nor limited to minor civil service jobs. The Constitution guarantees the equality of citizens regardless of race, sex, or religion. Suffrage is universal, although the opinions of husbands and fathers exercise a formidable influence over women's voting habits. Women have the right to participate in the political process, but tradition has thus far discouraged the exercise of that right.

CONGO

The People's Republic of the Congo is officially a Marxist-Leninist state and is governed by an elite group of party, cabinet, and military officials through the single legal party, the Congolese Labor Party (PCT). The president of the party, currently Colonel Denis Sassou-Nguesso, serves as President of the Republic and Chief of State. The President nominates the 13-member political bureau, the key policy-making group, which is approved by the 75-member central committee. Within the central committee, members from the northern regions of the country are in the majority and hold the balance of power, even though they represent a minority of the population. The military and security services are also firmly under the control of the northerners, and they ultimately hold the key to power in the Congo. The need to maintain consensus among the political leaders representing traditionally conflicting areas provides a check on arbitrary policies.

The security apparatus, which is under the direction of the presidency, is headed by the state security organization (DSGE) and is patterned after those in Eastern Europe. Its principal objective is to protect the State, i.e., to watch for any possible political dissident activity. There are also party core groups in all ministries, labor organizations, mass organizations, and urban areas (arrondissements) which monitor activities of coworkers and neighbors. In addition to the DSGE, there are the regular police forces whose discipline is generally improving with continuing Eastern European and Cuban training.

With its small population (1.8 million) and relatively high per capita income (about $1,230), the Congo is one of Africa's more prosperous countries. The economy is based predominantly on petroleum, which accounts for about 90 percent of export earnings. Beginning in 1979, the Congo experienced a period of high economic growth and began the implementation of a five year plan (starting in 1982) with heavy investment in infrastructure. With the decline in oil prices, and the lack of any significant increase in other sectors, notably forestry and sugar, the debt burden has climbed to over 50 percent of the gross national product (GNP), and the Congo is entering a period of austerity.

The human rights situation in the Congo changed little in 1985. No organized opposition to the Government is permitted. In November, the Congo experienced the first open unrest since President Sassou took power. High school students rioted in Brazzaville to protest a new government policy on college scholarships. The military put down the rioting, killing four students and severely wounding at least seven. The DSGE has been criticized by Amnesty International for use of torture. While not politically free, the Congolese go about their daily lives with a minimum of government or police interference. Terrorism is not a problem and the crime rate is relatively low. Contacts between Congolese and foreigners are possible, and the Congolese, while refraining from direct political criticism of the Government, discuss frankly economic and social problems. The right to own private property is respected. There is a tendency toward a more open society with expanded contacts with the West.

During 1985, there were no reported cases of killing for political motives.

b. Disappearance

During 1985, there were no reported cases of disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The practice of beating suspects at police stations and the state security offices in the course of interrogations is not uncommon. Neither is it uncommon for the public or the police to beat thieves caught redhanded. There was one reported case recently of a thief being beaten and then dying from having a hot iron applied to his genitals. Such extreme measures, however, are not common.

Instances of torture of political prisoners, who are held incommunicado, have been reported and usually involve electroshock and suspension by ropes from the ceiling accompanied by beating. These reports are considered reliable. Use of such methods is usually restricted to those accused of crimes against the State. (See 1e below)

Prison conditions in general are poor, and there is a lack of adequate food, hygiene, and medical care.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Whereas the Constitution guarantees protection against arbitrary indictment, arrest, and detention, in practice a warrant is not required to make arrests. There is a habeas corpus provision, but it does not apply in cases involving the security of the State. Individuals detained for nonpolitical offenses are entitled to an attorney and are judged by a generally impartial judiciary. Given the slow pace of administrative processing, despite the Government's steps to increase the number of magistrates and to improve the processing of cases, persons awaiting trial are often detained for considerable periods. There is no independent bar association. All lawyers are under the general authority of the Government (procureur general). In criminal cases, lawyers are provided by the Government for those who do not have money to pay for their own defense.

The charging of a detainee usually depends upon the seriousness of the crime and the economic situation of the family. For lesser crimes, the person is usually taken to jail, where he may be beaten, and is then held for a few days until he obtains his release on bail or on his own recognizance pending a trial, which may or may not ever take place. An individual accused of a serious crime (murder, rape, etc.) is held in prison until the trial which may be months or even years later. At the time of trial, the defendant has the right to a lawyer. Both detainees and prisoners may be visited by family or friends who bear the responsibility of providing food, medicines, etc.

CONGO

There is no known forced labor in the Congo.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for a Supreme Court which is in practice an arm of the Executive rather than an independent body. By law, the right to a fair and public trial exists in all cases, but some detainees have been held for long periods without trial. The legal system is not insulated from political interference. However, it is not uncommon to have a higher court reverse the verdict in the event of irregularities.

The amended Constitution provides for nonprofessional judges to be elected to all courts below the Supreme Court. The stated purpose of this change was to "popularize justice," i.e., provide a role for tribal or regional peers to influence the formal judicial process. According to the law, any Congolese citizen may now become a judge but can adjudicate cases only in collaboration with trained judges. Each nomination must be approved by the party. Within the constraints noted above, the judicial process is relatively fair and open for those accused of common crime.

According to the Congolese Government, there are no political prisoners in the Congo. The persons cited by Amnesty International as political prisoners being held incommunicado were allegedly associated with two acts of terrorism (bombings) in mid-1983. They have never been brought to trial. There is one known French political prisoner, also allegedly associated with the bombings, being held incommunicado at his home. The only known purely political prisoner is Thystere Tchicaya, the former number two figure in the party, reportedly arrested for his opposition to President Sassou. He is believed to be under house arrest and is not permitted any contact with the outside world.

Political prisoners are held incommunicado, and it is reasonable to assume that torture has been used to extract any information desired by the police that is not freely given. However, it should be noted that political prisoners held incommunicado in the past have since been liberated and are now leading normal lives with no apparent ill effects. Some have even managed to regain their earlier status and are serving as government ministers.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is little interference by the Government with privacy, family, home, or correspondence. Individuals are not forced to participate in the party or its organs. In general, so long as the individual does not engage in any activity in opposition to the Government, he is not oppressed or harassed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are restricted, despite guarantees in the Constitution. The State owns and controls the media (except for one weekly religious newspaper). The Government allows some domestic criticism of policies and programs judged not to be politically sensitive, but it does not allow its ultimate authority to be challenged. Journalists may raise issues and concerns only within general guidelines laid down by the party. The party is selective in the kinds of news and information it permits Congolese journalists to publish from various outside sources of information. Television viewers have access to Zairian media programs. While the Government controls the local press, foreign journalists are permitted to move freely about the country. The state censorship board reviews the content of newspapers, movies, books, and records. Publications are subject to censorship if they contain critical articles. For example, one issue of a church newspaper was seized and burned as a result of some mild criticism of the Third Party Congress, and a warning to the church was later published in the party's official organ.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to peaceful assembly is limited by the State's perceived self-interest. Political meetings are permitted for only the party and its organizations. Government permission is not required for groups to assemble for religious and social purposes but is required for use of official facilities. Government authorization is needed to start a formal club or organization.

Given its past active political role, the labor movement is closely scrutinized and controlled by the Government and party. The labor code adopted in March 1975 is quite liberal, if taken at face value. The right of association is guaranteed, though there is only one umbrella union, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation (CTUC), which is an appendage of the party. The party approves the national leadership of the CTUC. It is prohibited from striking, although wildcat strikes do occur with relative impunity. The Trade Union Confederation is represented in every ministry and state-owned enterprise and serves on mandatory boards which include a union representative along with a member of the administration and the party. Known as the "determinant trilogy," this structure is responsible for ensuring that the three major points of view are represented in the decisionmaking process and serves as the Congo's form of collective bargaining. The local unions within the Confederation have been able to persuade the Government to provide workers with increased benefits. So long as political subjects are avoided, there is a certain degree of democratic give and take. However, no group is allowed to form an independent, alternative union outside the party, which led to a complaint to the International Labor Organization (ILO) that the Congo was not observing the Convention on Freedom of Association (no. 87). The Confederation maintains relations with recognized international organizations such as the ILO.

c. Freedom of Religion

In theory, freedom of religion is guaranteed by law. In practice, party members are prohibited from practicing any religion. Religious organizations (churches, the Salvation Army, etc.) must obtain the Government's permission to work in the Congo. Jehovah's Witnesses, for example, are not permitted in the Congo, allegedly because Witnesses do not recognize the authority of the State. With the aforementioned exceptions, the party does not normally interfere in religious affairs. The Catholic Church, the largest congregation, maintains a seminary for the training of its clergy and has missions all over the country. Masses are held in the various local languages as well as in French. The Catholic Church publishes the only independent newspaper, La Semaine Africaine. Catholic and other missionaries are active in running private missions and clinics and providing other social services for the handicapped, etc. While some of these services are joint ventures between church and government, many of the former services provided by churches have been abolished, and the Government is officially atheist. Christmas Day is called Children's Day.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government exercises limited control over the internal movement of its citizens through identification card checks. There are control points in Brazzaville manned by soldiers who occasionally open fire on people who fail to follow their instructions or who inadvertently drive into restricted zones at night. Congolese citizens who wish to travel abroad require exit authorization from the Office of State Security. For average citizens this is a fairly routine process. However, those who are suspected of traveling for political motives encounter some difficulty. Government employees traveling abroad must obtain permission from the appropriate government office. Passports must be returned to the Office of State Security after the traveler's return from abroad.

The Government exercises tight control over travel by foreigners to the Congo. Most visas are for one entry only, exit visas are required, and those desiring to travel into the interior must obtain permission from the appropriate ministry. There have been no known instances of Congolese being refused the right to return to their country. Citizenship may be lost under conditions established in the nationality code. For example, citizenship may be lost by taking citizenship in another country or because of a conviction for espionage. There are no known cases of a native-born Congolese being denied citizenship as a punishment.

The Congo is the home of about 1,200 exiles and refugees, mostly from surrounding Central African states. While refugees are subject to surveillance and occasional harassment by the Congolese Government, there were no cases of forcible repatriation in 1985. The Congo is a signatory of the U.N. Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, and a representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is resident in Brazzaville.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Congo is governed by an elite group of party and cabinet officials. The center of power is the 13-man political bureau, chosen by the President but approved by the 75 member central committee. While the President is the most powerful single individual, his authority is limited by his need to maintain a consensus in the political bureau. The balance of power in the political bureau and in the central committee is held by northerners to the detriment of the far more numerous southerners. Military officers occupy key positions among the ruling group and help ensure its continuation in power. The Congolese people do not have the right to change their government through democratic processes. Opportunities for political involvement by Congolese citizens are limited to the Marxist-Leninist Congolese Labor Party, including the national, regional, and local assemblies and the "mass" organizations. No other political parties are permitted to operate. Party membership, which presently numbers approximately 8,700 out of a total population of 1.92 million is highly controlled on the basis of loyalty and political performance.

CONGO

While the Third Party Congress in 1984 declared the National Assembly the supreme organ of state, the national, regional, and local assemblies are "elected" from single-party approved lists. Representatives of the National Assembly are chosen from all walks of life, including traditional leaders, peasants, and workers. The Assembly has some impact on social and economic issues, and assemblies at the local and regional levels may discuss issues before the decisions are made at the national level.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no human rights organizations in the Congo. Amnesty International in its 1985 report was concerned about the long-term detention without trial and torture of political prisoners. Freedom House rated the Congo "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of 1.8 million is growing at the rate of 3.1 percent per annum. Per capita GNP is high for Africa, about $1,230, and due mainly to oil production. There is a marked disparity between urban and rural standards of living which results in heavy migration from the countryside. It is estimated that the average per capita GNP of rural Congolese is less than one-twelfth that of their urban counterparts. The Congo has a mixed economic system, with approximately 80 percent of the economy in the hands of the private sector--predominantly foreign-owned and -operated.

Improvements in health and nutrition have resulted in an increase in the average life expectancy to over 63 years. The infant mortality rate (1985) is 110 per 1,000 live births. The fertility of the soil, abundance of indigenous fruits, vegetables, and fish, and the reliability of water sources around the country have all fostered a naturally hospitable environment for the sparse population. Safe water is available in urban areas for about 46 percent of the population, compared to only 8 percent in the countryside. The Congolese diet generally meets caloric intake requirements, but protein intake is generally insufficient. Adequate health care remains spotty in urban areas and is almost nonexistent in rural areas.

The Congolese have tried to maintain the educational system left to them by the French, and have a historically high literacy rate (variously estimated at between 50 and 80 percent of the adult population). The emphasis on education is heavy, and many children who do not finish school return as adults to continue their studies. The current number enrolled in primary school as a percentage of age group is not available, but as early as 1965 was 114 percent (male 134 percent, female 94 percent). The percentage of students in secondary education has jumped from 10 percent in 1965 to 69 percent in 1982. Urban migration, however, has resulted in serious overcrowding of facilities and a loss in the quality of teaching. The Congo sends large numbers of students abroad, predominantly to Cuba and Eastern Europe due to the availability of scholarships.

Working conditions for Congolese are generally good. These include a minimum working age of 16 (in the modern sector), a maximum 40-hour workweek, at least one day of rest per week, family benefits and medical aid, but no social security and a minimum hourly wage of 34 cents for city employees and 29 cents for agricultural workers. Domestic workers must be paid at least $60 monthly. There is a code of occupational safety and health, though it is probably honored only in the breach. Revenues from taxation and royalties on oil production allow the Government to hire large numbers of Congolese for various government organs or state corporation administrations. Consequently, compared to other Africans, many Congolese have a generally high standard of working conditions and social benefits.

Under the Constitution, women have the same rights as men in the private, political, and social domains, and for equal work they are entitled to the same social benefits. There is a large disparity in practice, however, between salaries for men and women, and women are relegated to a secondary role in the modern sectors of society. In traditional society, women are still the chief decisionmakers. Five women are members of the central committee, and one is Minister of Basic Education and Literacy, the only woman in the 27-member cabinet.

DJIBOUTI

Djibouti, a small resource-poor nation located at the southern end of the Red Sea, is a constitutional republic with a one-party system which has been led by President Hassan Gouled Aptidon since independence from France in 1977. By an unwritten arrangement, the President is a member of the politically dominant ethnic Somalis (Issa) while the Prime Minister is from the substantial minority Afar. There is also a sizable Arab community, mainly Yemenis, who have a prominent role in commerce. Cabinet positions are divided among the two dominant groups, but in reality the Issas control the civil service and the armed forces. Djibouti has a 65-member elected National Assembly. Since 1981, as part of the political balancing act, there is a single political party, the Rassemblement Populaire Pour Le Progres (RPP). An opposition party, the Mouvement Populaire De Liberation (MPL), was outlawed in 1981, following community violence.

Djibouti's armed forces consist of a small army supplemented by a smaller navy and air wing. Located between two relatively giant neighbors on the Horn--both of whom have tribal affinities and potential irredentist claims--Djibouti has a vital, additional layer of security in a 1977 mutual defense agreement with France which ensures the continued presence of 5,000 French troops.

Djibouti's economy rests on the activities of a large foreign expatriate community, the maritime and commercial activities of the Port of Djibouti, the airport, and the operation of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railroad. Recent economic stagnation has been compounded by the influx since the Ogaden War (1977-79) with Ethiopia of refugees, economic migrants, and victims of drought and famine, especially from Ethiopia. These large movements of peoples clearly have placed a heavy burden on the Djiboutian economy, notwithstanding the assistance of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and other relief agencies. In addition to approximately 16,000 registered refugees, there are unknown numbers (estimates run from 20,000 to 60,000) of illegal immigrants eking out an existence on the margins of the Djiboutian economy.

There was little change in the human rights situation in Djibouti in 1985, although of the 18 alleged members of the MPL arrested on returning to Djibouti from Ethiopia in December 1984, all were released in 1985. Despite one-party rule, the openness of the society creates an atmosphere in which most citizens feel free to pursue their livelihood without fear of government interference. Free enterprise is encouraged in Djibouti's service-oriented economy, and the right of private property and freedom of movement are generally respected. The legal system is still in its formative stages. On any topic not yet covered by Djiboutian legislation, the Napoleonic code, a product of the French colonial period, and, to an extent, the Islamic Shari'a generally apply. Women play a secondary role in public life.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There are no known incidents of killing for apparent political motives since Djibouti became independent in 1977.

DJIBOUTI

b. Disappearance

There were no allegations of disappearance in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In the ethnically polarized environment of Djibouti, there are occasional allegations of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. For example, Amnesty International's 1985 Report (covering 1984) mentioned one charge from 1983 and expressed concern over the alleged torture of nine persons suspected of belonging to the outlawed MPL. The nine had been detained in 1983 after returning from exile in Ethiopia. The Minister of Justice informed Amnesty International that the nine had been charged with offenses against state security, that normal judicial procedures had been followed, and that none of them had been tortured.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In November 1984, the Government announced the release of the nine Afar political prisoners. In December 1984, 18 more Afars were reportedly arrested for crossing the border from Ethiopia. These were allegedly former members of the MPL who were returning to Djibouti under the amnesty declared by the President. All were released in 1985.

The current system of justice is a mixture of French and Islamic law. This mixture results in a hybrid legal system, based partly on the French Penal Code and partly on Issa tribal common law. The principle of habeas corpus does not exist. However on March 19, 1985, the Government issued a new decree limiting detention of all persons to 48 hours. At such time, the individual must be charged by the examining magistrate. Moreover, the prisoner is entitled to legal counsel and must be so informed. Although bail and personal recognizance are provided for, a judge may choose to hold any prisoner, who is charged without bail. Prosecutors are required, and generally do, file charges in an expedient fashion. Prison conditions are minimally adequate. Family members and counsel are permitted access to prisoners, and public health and medical services supervise health conditions in a generally competent manner. There is no forced labor in Djibouti.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Both the State Security Court, established to deal with crimes against the security of the state, and ordinary civil and criminal courts permit family members and counsel, though not the general public, to attend trials. The judiciary has remained largely independent of military and executive pressures.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Decree Law No. 8 of June 1980 states that government authorities "may not enter or remain in the domicile of a private individual without his consent and without a legal order," except, among other circumstances, when it is necessary to facilitate the prosecution of persons accused of crimes and when the public order is seriously disturbed. There are reports of noncompliance with this statute.

DJIBOUTI

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

All Djiboutian media are government-owned and support the Government and its policies. Radio/TV Djibouti claims to receive only limited guidance from senior political levels on handling news it presents to the public. There is occasional criticism of the shortcomings of local institutions, some associated with key political and religious figures, and of corrupt and inefficient practices in the bureaucracy, but not of the central Government itself. There are occasional confiscations of foreign publications which contain commentary critical of the Government. The media usually do not carry stories of violence, crime, or ethnic disturbances.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings require a permit which may be denied for security reasons. The Government permits free association outside the political realm, and there are several independent social, religious, cultural, and commercial organizations.

The right of labor to organize and strike exists, but only a small portion of the work force is unionized. Moreover, the Government has organized the single national labor federation, the Union Generale de Travailleurs Djiboutien (UGTD), and keeps it under its control, and through it, also controls the individual unions. Unions freely maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields. Temporary stoppages, usually protesting working conditions or dismissals, sometimes occur. Most large enterprises have affiliates of the UGTD. Employees are not required to join these unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

Over 96 percent of the population is Muslim, but freedom of religious practice, publication, and association with coreligionists outside the country is unfettered for all religions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Djiboutians travel freely within and outside their country. Passports are generally freely available. There are no exchange controls. Djibouti has had a steady inflow of refugees, economic migrants, and famine victims in the past decade. As many as 40,000 displaced persons, mainly from Ethiopia, fled to Djibouti during the height (1977-79) of the armed conflict in the Ogaden region. Most of the refugees have received assistance from the international community in the refugee camps of Dikhil and Ali Sabieh. Several thousand more have spontaneously settled in the capital city. Refugees in the camps are restricted to them and are not able to move freely.

On November 21, 1984, Djibouti, Ethiopia and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) decided to terminate as of December 31, 1984, the large scale repatriation program begun in 1983. Refugees wishing to return to Ethiopia after that date are processed case-by-case. According to the UNHCR, by December 1984 a total of 32,859 persons had been registered as repatriates from Djibouti of whom 14,281 had returned to Ethiopia in UNHCR organized rail moves, and 19,578 had returned on their own.

The Government has increasingly taken a firm stand in returning Ethiopians who do not qualify for refugee status. In August 1984, following a series of roundups, Djibouti deported several hundred persons to Ethiopia because, according to the Government, the deportees were illegal aliens whose presence had created tensions with native Djiboutians. Many of these tensions stem from ethnic difficulties involving Afar resentment at alleged discrimination in treatment of Afar versus Issa drought victims.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Djibouti is a one-party state whose leaders and candidates for Parliament are chosen by the leadership of the party, the Rassemblement Populaire pour le Progres (RPP). There is active competition within the party lists. The one-party system was instituted in 1981, and the Government subsequently detained leaders of the previous opposition party and dissidents allegedly attempting to encourage ethnic strife. Traditionally, the Djiboutian Government includes the ruling cabinet representatives of all the nation's important ethnic groups. However, some Afars complain that the country is run by and for the Issas, who dominate the Government, the armed forces, and the single party. Others complain that tribal and ethnic considerations inhibit appointment of competent administrators. While citizens are encouraged to become involved in politics and to vote, the party leadership, through a 14-member political bureau, carefully controls and directs all political activity and in 1982 selected the single slate of candidates for the National Assembly elections. There is no democratic or nonviolent means for citizens of Djibouti to change their Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

On at least six occasions since independence, most recently in August 1984, there have been foreign press and other reports alleging human rights violations by the Government. The Government has generally responded to such charges either by permitting an investigation, as by the UNHCR and Amnesty International in 1981, or by denial as mentioned in 1c above. It expelled in December 1983 two members of an international fact-finding team sponsored by Cultural Survival, a nonprofit human rights organization, who were investigating reports of involuntary repatriation of refugees. Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report, expressed continuing concern about allegations of torture of detainees and the situation of Ethiopian refugees. Freedom House rated Djibouti "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Djibouti is one of the world's poorest developing countries in terms of natural resources. Practically all commodities are imported. Its port is its primary asset along with an aging railway line to Addis Ababa. Djibouti's economy also depends heavily on a large French military and expatriate presence (over 10,000) and outside donor support, mainly from France and Saudi Arabia. Recently, the potential for a fishing industry has been identified as well as for geothermal resources. While statistical data is either unavailable or conjectural, the per capita gross national product is estimated at between $310 and $450 per annum. A 1980 French study estimated that 47 percent of the population earned less than $130 annually. Almost one-third of the population lives a nomad's life of bare subsistence in the rural hinterlands of the republic. Djibouti's population is estimated at approximately 320,000 for a land surface of 9,000 square miles.

The level of unemployment has been high since independence in 1977. In 1980, the International Monetary Fund reported that over 50 percent of job seekers could not find work. In 1982, unemployment was estimated at 45 percent and underemployment at 33 percent of the work force. Since 1983, several factors have exacerbated this trend: the high growth rate (2.5 percent) of the population; the influx of refugees and displaced persons; and the decline in French assistance and spending.

The harsh, arid, blast furnace-like environment is a cause of low life expectancy in Djibouti. 1983 estimates put this figure at 48.1 years. Use of the khat plant is a very serious economic and social problem. According to a recent World Health Organization study, it is estimated that as many as 90 percent of the men and 10 percent of the women use this drug--which, produced in neighboring Ethiopia, is consumed legally in Djibouti. Although an important source of taxes for the Government, khat represents both a serious drain of foreign exchange reserves (an estimated $15 million in 1985) and a drain on the regular users' disposable income (estimates run as high as 70 percent of monthly salary).

Water is a scarce commodity and of poor quality in most of the country. There are no surface water sources. The Government has made efforts to truck water to remote areas of the country. Latest estimates (1980) indicate that about 45 percent of the population receives safe water (50 percent in urban areas, 20 percent in rural areas).

According to a 1980 World Bank report, the adult literacy rate (in the French language) was 17 percent. Primary school enrollment for 1984-85 was approximately 21,300, an increase of some 320 percent since independence. The high school enrollment increased from 3,000 to 9,000 over this period. This increase, with a concomitant rise in the number and quality of educational facilities, reflects the priority the Djiboutian Government gives to education.

The country's nominal minimum wage is about $100 per month, although very few local workers are paid at this rate. The minimum age for employment of children is 14 and the standard of a 40-hour workweek is observed. Employers normally contribute an amount equal to 18 percent of each employee's salary to the Government's generous pension and medical insurance programs. Retirement is normally at 80 percent of salary after 15 years of employment with a minimum age of 50.

Women in Djibouti enjoy a higher public status than in some other Islamic countries, but women's rights and family planning are not high priorities. Nomadic traditions involving female genital mutilation (particularly excision and infibulation) are quite prevalent in Djibouti. The President has recognized the key role of women in the small trade sector, and there is an active, local women's organization.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Equatorial Guinea is a former Spanish colony in Central West Africa, composed of a continental province, Rio Muni, and the island provinces of Bioko and Annobon. Under the Constitution of 1982, the President, Teodoro Obiang Mbasogo, has extensive powers, including naming and dismissing cabinet ministers and making decree laws. Since the overthrow in 1979 of the brutal 11-year Macias regime, civil order has been restored and the terror that characterized the former dictatorship has ended. Despite these important changes, the National Assembly, while theoretically the lawmaking branch of government, is in fact powerless to take any action not sanctioned by the President or his Council of Ministers. No political parties have yet been allowed to form. The present leadership is constrained by the necessity of operating within a consensus of top government and tribal leaders.

The previous Macias regime drove the once prosperous economy, based on cocoa, coffee, and wood, close to bankruptcy. The present Government has since been burdened with high deficits, persistent inflation, heavy debt service, and falling world prices for its products. Under these circumstances, the Government has focused on economic reform, and in 1985 it took two important steps. It entered the West African Franc Zone (CFA) on January 1, 1985; this move immediately ensured convertibility to the French franc and imposed much-needed financial discipline on the Government, including reduced opportunities for embezzlement. In July, the Government was able to reschedule its major foreign debts and enter into a standby agreement with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) after extensive negotiations.

The human rights situation in 1985 did not improve. While there were no reports of the kinds of crimes committed by the former regime (notably government-sanctioned kidnaping, torture, and murder), allegations continue of government officials abusing their authority for personal gain. Ordinary citizens are still harassed by the police and subjected to arbitrary arrest, and discrimination continues against minority groups and migrant workers. An important confrontation with Nigeria developed in 1985 over the issue of forced labor. Reportedly 500 Nigerian farm workers in Equatorial Guinea were stripped of their passports and forced to work on the country's cocoa plantations. The Nigerian Government sent four ships, including two gun boats, to repatriate the Nigerian workers. Approximately 48 Nigerians did return to Nigeria by boat but others remained, and it is still unclear if the Nigerians had in fact been forcibly detained.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

According to the Government, one political prisoner, sentenced to death in 1983 after being tried and found guilty for plotting to assassinate the President, officially remains in jail, but it is believed that he has died in prison. Confirmation of his status has not been possible. No information is available on the fate of 26 others tried on lesser charges in the 1983 coup attempt.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

b. Disappearance

There was one unconfirmed report of the arrest and possible disappearance of a military officer as a result of a disturbance in summer 1985 during a Presidential visit. With this exception, there were no reports of unexplained disappearance or abduction during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Police methods are harsh and often include beatings of prisoners, either to extract information or to punish offenders for insolence or disrespect. Reports abound of police harassment of people on trumped-up charges and the beating of those who refuse to pay bribes. These abuses are commonly believed to be officially ignored to give an underpaid and occasionally unpaid police force a means to supplement its income. Arbitrary beatings by police of politically powerless people, such as expatriate Nigerian and Cameroonian workers and certain indigenous groups like the Bubi, are believed to be common. Mistreatment of prisoners is officially condemned, but there seems little political will to end these abuses. Conditions in prisons are reported to be extremely poor.

In one incident, a Spanish citizen died while in custody prior to extradition to Spain. The Government claimed that he died of injuries after jumping from a moving vehicle enroute to the Malabo Airport. It was also alleged that this person was denied access to adequate medical treatment by the local authorities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Despite a habeas corpus provision in the Constitution, there are no effective legal protections dealing with the right of a person in detention to be charged or released within a certain period of time, to be informed of charges, to have access to a lawyer, or to be freed on bail. The executive branch has been able to act without any fear of judicial interference.

Reports of incidents of arbitrary arrest are widespread, including reports from various expatriate groups in France, Spain, Cameroon, and Gabon. When arrested, the ordinary Guinean frequently finds that his options are to stay in jail or to pay the police to win his freedom. There are no known instances of any person being exiled in 1985.

As noted above, the issue of forced labor escalated to an international incident in 1985. While the situation is much improved since 1979, the Government still periodically rounds up "vagrants" and illegal aliens and puts them to work, often on plantations. The purpose of the law is allegedly to require citizens to choose between this forced work or returning to their villages and finding useful employment there. In the case of illegal aliens, the choice is between working in a particular work project or leaving the country. These roundups appear to be a means of obtaining free labor and are often linked to preparation for important national days or to the arrival of visiting dignitaries.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The exact number of political prisoners is unknown but is believed to be small. The Government does not admit to holding any political prisoners. Amnesty International expressed concern in its 1984 report that the 26 persons tried for plotting to kill the President did not receive fair trials. The Government claims that all of these cases have been tried, with the majority of the accused having received sentences varying from 5 to 10 years.

It is not possible to know how frequently people are denied trials since the system forces many detainees to deal directly with the arresting authorities and to resort to bribes to gain their freedom. The current court system, which often uses local customary law, is a combination of traditional, civil, and military justice and operates in an ad hoc manner for lack of established procedures and experienced judicial personnel. Equatorial Guinea's few lawyers work for the Government and consequently are unable to challenge government and judicial actions effectively. Most trials are brief. In cases of petty theft or civil dispute, all parties are brought before a judge for trial. In civil and criminal cases, the judge often sets a fine instead of imprisonment. In political cases involving senior officials, exclusion from public office and exile to traditional villages are common means of punishment.

The Ministry of Justice has made little progress in establishing a legal system. There were no major court cases during 1985 which could serve to test the independence of the judicial system. There is a Supreme Court, but its role is unclear. At the higher levels, the courts appear to be competent, professional, and honest, but courts at this level frequently do not get the opportunity to act because they are preempted by action of the executive branch.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There are reports of arbitrary interference with privacy and the home. Many people believe that telephone conversations, but not correspondence, are routinely monitored. Search warrants are not often used, even though prescribed in the Constitution. The politically powerless often appear to be at the mercy of arbitrary police practices.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Citizens dare not utter public dissent on political or economic matters, but criticism is frequently heard in private conversations. What few media exist in Equatorial Guinea are government-owned and -operated and do not criticize the Government. Equatorial Guinea's single newspaper did not publish in 1985. The radio and television stations transmit official government notices, imported entertainment, sports, and religious programs. There is no prohibition on receiving foreign publications or periodicals but, primarily for economic reasons, there are no such publications for sale anywhere in the country.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While theoretically protected by the Constitution, public political opposition or assembly is not tolerated in practice. Membership in any type of opposition organization would, at a minimum, result in the loss of official employment and exclusion from the ruling circles from which many benefits and privileges are derived. Nonpolitical groups, such as professional organizations and sports groups, do exist but must receive government permission to operate. Some such groups receive government backing.

There have been no attempts to form any type of labor union, not even a civil service union. There is no formal industrial sector in Equatorial Guinea. Many employers are required to select their work force from government agencies on terms and contracts acceptable to the Government, thereby depriving workers of the possibility of bargaining for themselves, either individually or collectively.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is freedom of religion in Equatorial Guinea. No religion is favored, but 90 percent of the population is Catholic. Religious publishing is permitted. Missionaries of several faiths are active and have government permission for their activities. Proselytization is permitted, and there does not appear to be any discrimination against persons on the basis of their faith. However, at the beginning of 1986 there were reports that the Government had acted to close down the meeting houses of Jehovah's Witnesses.

It was reported in 1985 that the Ministry of Agriculture appropriated property belonging to a seminary, without recourse to legal process or notice to the property owner.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no explicit restrictions on Equatorial Guineans with respect to travel within the country. However, unemployed persons face forced labor on plantations or civic projects and then forced return to their place of origin. Travel abroad is limited by economic considerations. Also, there are often delays in the issuance of exit visas, but those delays do not seem to be politically motivated. There were no known Guinean political refugees departing the country in 1985, but a large number of refugees and displaced persons from the former regime continue to reside in Spain, France, Cameroon, and Gabon. Many of them criticize the current Government as being tribally based and undemocratic, but the poor state of the economy is probably another reason that they remain abroad. The Government has repeatedly indicated that all Guineans are welcome to return without fear of persecution but has made it clear that returnees may not engage in political activities outside the sanctioned system.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Citizens do not have the right to change their government through democratic means. President Obiang took power in the military coup of 1979 which toppled the Macias regime. He became President in 1982 following a plebiscite which ratified a new Constitution. While the plebiscite involved only approval or disapproval of the Constitution, which established a 7-year term of office for the President, Obiang declared the referendum was a mandate to rule and declared himself President.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Under the Constitution, a partially elected, partially appointed National Assembly was chosen. While the Assembly includes members of minority groups, it is powerless to take any action not sanctioned by the President or his Council of Ministers, members of which can be appointed or dismissed by the President. Under the Constitution, the President also has the power to suspend virtually any and all rights if he decides a threat to national security or other emergency exists.

The Government is concerned with internal security--there have been two coup attempts in recent years--and maintains tight control over political activity and the military. The government leaders are considering the introduction of a one-party state as a step in expanding and guiding political participation.

There are two political structures, governmental and tribal. While high government officials frequently carry a similar tribal status, there is significant tribal influence outside government as well. The Fang ethnic group, which comprises more than 70 percent of the population, and in particular the Esangui branch, dominates the Government and the military. The Bubi tribe comprises a small percentage of the population, but historically it has been the majority on the island of Bioko where the capital is located. Bubis do not enjoy full equality or equal protection under law and lack effective representation, including jobs, in government. While the Prime Minister is a Bubi, his function is mainly ceremonial, and the National Assembly has little effective power.

Women play only a minor role in political life. The two highest positions held by women are the mayorship of the mainland town of Akurenam and the Vice Minister of Labor.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has succeeded in distancing itself from the savagery of the previous regime. The authorities are forthcoming in discussing human rights issues with international organizations but would be unlikely to permit a close investigation of the human rights scene in Equatorial Guinea. There are no local human rights groups in the country. Amnesty International did not include an entry on Equatorial Guinea in its 1985 Report due to the lack of information. Freedom House rated Equatorial Guinea as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION:

According to 1985 World Bank data, the population of Equatorial Guinea is 350,000 and is growing at the rate of 2.6 percent annually. Per capita gross national product is variously estimated at between $100-200 annually, one of the lowest in the world. The average Guinean lives at the subsistence level, although members of the government bureaucracy in the larger towns have a higher standard of living. The Government is the largest employer in the country.

The economy improved modestly in 1985, in part due to the Government's decision to join the CFA franc zone. Cocoa production, the mainstay of the economy, also seems to be increasing, although precise data are not available, and many production obstacles remain, e.g., the lack of labor incentives and the uneven application of laws affecting property rights. Foreign aid flows into the country are substantial, averaging over $30 million annually.

Life expectancy at birth is estimated at 44 years and the country's infant mortality rate is 132 per 1,000 live births. Official World Bank estimates put the country's literacy rate at 37 percent. The primary school attendance ratio of eligible children is 79 percent (male 88 percent, female 71 percent). The school system is generally poor, and teachers are largely unqualified and poorly educated. Many of the best schools are run by Spanish missionaries. There are only two high schools in the country (Bata and Malabo) and no institution of higher education.

Most salaried employment is with the Government. Government workers do not exceed a 48 hour week. Salaries are frequently not paid or are only partially paid, and government workers must supplement their incomes through second jobs. The minimum age for employment is 16, but there is no enforcement of this law in rural areas and children of various ages work, as necessary, to help support their families. There are no vigorously enforced minimum work standards.

The law states that both sexes and all tribal groups are equal and entitled to the same rights and privileges. For a variety of reasons, some historical and cultural, and others economic, women are accorded a lower status than men and have a correspondingly lower influence in the society and government. Men often take several wives. Social tradition, and the fact that women produce most of the basic staple food items, keeps most women engaged in agricultural or domestic work.

ETHIOPIA

Ethiopia is ruled by Chairman Mengistu Haile-Mariam and a small group of associates who exercise power through arbitrary arrest and intimidation. Mengistu's position and continuation in power derive from his successful domination of military rivals in the years following the fall of Emperor Haile Selassie. Mengistu holds the top post of Secretary-General in the Workers Party of Ethiopia, which was formally established on September 6, 1984. The stated goal of the party is to transform the country into a Marxist-Leninist state. Marxist-Leninist ideology is pervasive in the press, throughout the educational system, in the "kebele" (urban neighborhood association) network, and increasingly in the military and workplace.

Ethiopia deploys the largest standing army in Africa south of the Sahara, numbering over 250,000 soldiers. It uses this power to pursue military solutions to the armed insurgencies of varying intensities directed against the Government. Ethiopia also supports rebel movements against its neighbors, Sudan and Somalia, ostensibly in retaliation for their alleged support of Ethiopia's internal opponents. The Government has an extensive security apparatus which uses a comprehensive system of surveillance and informers to strengthen its control over the population.

Ethiopia's economic problems are considerable and growing in scope, in important part due to the imposition on independent farmers of a system of collectivized agriculture. One of the worst droughts in Ethiopia in a century reached a climax in 1985. Approximately 7.5 million persons were directly affected by the drought, and food shortages and record high food prices affected the entire population. Although much of Ethiopia had near-normal rains in 1985, lack of seeds, plow oxen, and human laborers caused by 3 years of drought greatly reduced plantings. The 1986 harvest will remain well below Ethiopia's already insufficient average production.

Ethiopia's record on human rights is deplorable, and 1985 saw no improvement. The country remains without civil or political freedoms and without institutions or laws to protect its citizens' human rights. The Provisional Military Government of Socialist Ethiopia (PMGSE) maintains complete control over the media, labor, education, internal and external movements of Ethiopian citizens, and all political processes. Mengistu has never held a general election of any kind to legitimize himself or his Workers' Party of Ethiopia (WPE). Persons expressing opposition to the regime or suspected of not supporting it are routinely arrested by security police and subjected to torture in varying degrees; some executions have been reported as well. The individual citizen may be detained at any time without explanation and may be held indefinitely without trial.

Bombing and shelling of suspected guerrilla positions in populated areas by Ethiopian forces, together with frequent infighting between rival factions within the dissident groups, continued to produce civilian casualties and dislocations in the contested areas. Second to the suffering brought on by the widespread fighting, the most alarming abuse of human rights in 1985 was the Government's massive resettlement program, which, after the initial movements, was carried out involuntarily with considerable loss in human lives. In support of its resettlement effort, the Government closed all institutions of higher learning for 2 months and transported virtually the entire academic population of 21,496 students, teachers, and administrators to resettlement areas to perform manual labor, often in abysmal conditions. Thousands of party cadres have also been required to work in resettlement areas, some for more than 8 months at a time. In 1985, the Ethiopian Government repeatedly denounced the airlift of Ethiopian refugee Jews from Sudan to Israel even as it continued severely to restrict the right of all its citizens to emigrate freely.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

From time to time during 1985 there were reports of summary executions. In the insurgent areas, political killings by both government forces and the contending factions continued. Guerrilla forces used assassination, sniping, and the mining of roadways as tactics against the Government while the Government continued to execute captured combatants and to bomb civilian population centers. Both government and rebel forces are believed to have destroyed crops and homes in their opponents' areas.

As in previous years, there were in 1985 documented cases of Ethiopians being abducted without charge by plainclothes security police and held incommunicado for extended periods. Families are not notified of their relatives' arrest or, if they are, are frequently not informed of their whereabouts. Prisoners have also disappeared from their jail cells, never to be seen again. Six Ethiopian employees of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, headquartered in Addis Ababa, and abducted several years ago by Ethiopian police, were finally released in 1985. Amnesty International in its 1985 report (covering 1984) expressed concern over the regime's continued failure to account for some 15 political prisoners who disappeared in 1979. Rebel forces have also occasionally taken civilian prisoners, including foreign nationals. These prisoners are generally not detained indefinitely but are required to travel on foot for up to 6 weeks before being released in Sudan.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture, including severe beatings, crushing of bones of the hand, and the use of electric shocks, is reportedly practiced in cases involving insurgent combatants and on those engaged in activities such as statements or writings against the Government. Amnesty International states that torture is often practiced on Ethiopian prisoners interrogated at the central revolutionary investigation department ("third police station") in the capital and is routinely used in other parts of the country, such as Nazareth, to interrogate prisoners about opposition organizations, especially those engaged in armed conflict against the Government.

ETHIOPIA

In Ethiopia's main prison, called central investigations, as many as 30 prisoners are assigned to a single room. They share mattresses by sleeping head to foot. Blankets are not issued. Four such rooms share one toilet. Since the rooms are in the basement, there is no natural light or fresh air, and a light is on at all times. Food is minimal: three pieces of bread and two cups of tea per day. Blankets and additional food is the responsibility of the inmates' families. Visitors to the prison never actually see the inmates but must send items and messages through trustees. Inmates are allowed out of their cells for 3 hours each day.

Interrogations can be scheduled at any time, but beatings are usually administered between 5 p.m. and 8 p.m. The inmate population is mixed between political prisoners and criminals, and it is the political prisoners (mostly Eritreans and Tigreans) who receive the majority of the beatings. Older prisoners are usually not beaten but are suspended (by ropes attached to wrists or under arms) for long periods without food or water. Fatalities occur from the beatings. The prison clinic dispenses medicine except to political prisoners, who are left to recover or not without medication.

Conditions in one of the main detention centers in the capital, where members of the royal family and other political prisoners are held, are said to be relatively good. Occupational and academic training is available, and books and magazines are provided. Families and friends are allowed to visit with some frequency. Former prisoners held at the Gebi Palace Prison, below Mengistu's offices, have reported that they were relatively well treated, though their quarters were crowded and damp, and brief visits by family members were allowed only once a year. Those held at Gebi Palace are mostly high-ranking officials from the former government. However, the son of one of the imprisoned royal family members reported that his mother and five other women relatives of Haile Selassie are kept in small cells, are not allowed out for exercise or fresh air, and are not given access to basic medical care.

Ethiopians suspected of antigovernment actions or sentiments are subject to arrest or detention without charge or judicial review. Remarks considered critical or derisive of the Government, failure to attend mandatory political or kebele meetings, suspicion of association or sympathy with organizations opposed to the Government and, in the case of Ethiopian women, suspicion of sexual liaison with foreign visitors are all common justifications for arbitrary arrest and detention. In most cases, political detainees are held incommunicado, at least initially and sometimes for the length of their term of incarceration. The term of confinement for a suspect held without legal charge is subject to the whims of the incarcerators who can be from any level of government, from the Politburo down to the local kebele. Prisoners have been held without charge for periods of up to 9 years.

In February 1984, the Government announced that it had been holding 18 persons in detention since December 1983 for "distributing antirevolutionary pamphlets." There is uncertainty regarding the fate of these detainees as only 1 of the 18 was known for certain to be alive in early 1985. In politically sensitive arrests, the Government generally prefers to operate in secret, taking the suspect from home at night. However, arbitrary arrest is not limited to the politically suspect. Even people with no record of political activity or political affiliations are arrested and detained for months or longer with no explanation given. In September 1985, the Government announced its customary amnesty to coincide with national day celebrations. The names of the 88 political detainees (described as young and without influence) and the 689 common criminals released were not revealed. The royal family members still imprisoned were not released.

The Government uses both convict and forced kebele labor. Prisoners are used in various construction projects, such as road building and forestation. Kebele dwellers, young and old, male and female, are obligated to "volunteer" their services for work programs upon the demand of kebele officials.

There is no discernible separation between the executive branch and the judiciary. Courts are subject to political control and are responsive to the requests and directions of Ethiopia's leadership. Ordinary criminal and civil cases are more generally based upon the submission of evidence in a public setting. Minor cases are tried at the kebele level, while more serious criminal accusations are tried in courts where the accused has access to court-appointed lawyers.

Ethiopian political prisoners generally do not receive trials, public or otherwise. No guarantee of a public trial with counsel exists, nor is the accused permitted to present witnesses or evidence in his or her defense. Political trials are almost always held in secret with only the verdict (if even that) publicly announced. Prisoners who are cleared of charges or whose terms have been completed are not always released from prisons.

There are conflicting reports about the current number of political prisoners, which is virtually impossible to estimate accurately. If the total includes those taken prisoner as a result of ethnic insurgencies, it could well number in the thousands. Amnesty International believes thousands are still being held without trial or charges.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Warrants are not required for entry into or search of offices or private homes in Ethiopia. As a result, forced entry is commonly used by the police and security forces, although the level of this activity is currently much lower than during the "Red Terror" period of 1977-78. However, surveillance of individuals, both visual or through listening devices, has increased and continues with no legal strictures.

All mail is subject to monitoring by the Government. Ethiopian citizens can be called in at any time for questioning by authorities and for mandatory kebele meetings, political rallies, or marches. Refusal to appear for any of the above may result in imprisonment without hearing. Every Ethiopian lives under the watchful eye of local kebele or rural dwellers' association officials. These officials monitor visitors received, items brought in and out of houses, any meetings, and adherence to local curfews. They are also empowered to arrest anyone whom they deem guilty of illegal or suspicious conduct. Ethiopian citizens are often forced to join "mass" organizations, including, reportedly, the party.

In November 1984, the Government began a massive and forced resettlement of famine victims, especially from the northern regions to other parts of the country. To date, this program has involved the removal, transport, and resettlement of over 500,000 persons, and resettlement of 1 million more is planned. Many of these persons have been forcibly rounded up in their villages, at relief camps, and at feeding sites and confined under armed guard at "transit camps." From these camps, they have been transported by Soviet-supplied aircraft in extremely crowded conditions to airbases, usually near Addis Ababa, and then transported overland in trucks and buses under armed guard to resettlement sites. These sites are located in primitive wilderness areas totally lacking in basic health, sanitation, and other essential services. Those resettled are compelled to perform long hours of hard labor clearing and cultivating the land while receiving only minimal shelter and food rations. Many families are separated through the resettlement process.

Reputable research into the resettlement program has uncovered what the researchers called "a consistent pattern of murder and severe PMGSE human rights abuses". Several persons who subsequently escaped from the resettlement sites claimed to have witnessed murder or to have been the victims of beatings, imprisonment, deprivation, and what they considered enslavement in a regimented work environment where mortality rates were exceedingly high. The resettlement program also diverts badly needed transport and logistical support and supplies from the famine relief effort.

In addition, there is another large program underway, called villagization, which moves people off their farms and into newly prepared villages. The old homes are either moved to new sites or destroyed so people will not return. The purpose of the program appears to be better political control. The program appears to be detrimental to food production and coercive in nature.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no freedom of speech or press in Ethiopia. The Government owns and operates all information media and exercises censorship through editorial boards and the Ministry of Culture. Expression of political opinion which is unauthorized or at variance with the official government line can result in imprisonment. Political, economic, and social policies in Ethiopia are formulated at top levels of government, then disseminated and monitored through the government-controlled media and government-organized citizens' groups, i.e., women, youth, worker, and peasant associations, kebeles, and military commissariats.

In particular, the Government closely monitors the pronouncements of public officials, academics, and clergy. Some instructors and professors in secondary schools and at the university have resisted the politicization of education. Academic freedom, although circumscribed, especially in the political and social sciences, still finds limited expression at the university. Private secondary schools, where affluent Ethiopians can send their children, are mostly free of political orientation. Many, including people in the Government, seek to send their children abroad for education.

Books and magazines can be confiscated if deemed opposed to the revolution. Foreign magazines and newspapers are not readily available. Foreign radio broadcasts are widely listened to in Ethiopia. There is no evidence of overt attempts by the Government to interfere with radio reception.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Assembly of any sort not previously approved by the Government is strictly forbidden under penalty of arrest. In contrast, attendance at government-backed rallies, meetings, and parades is mandatory and enforceable by arrest and detention. Ethiopians are cautious in their associations with one another and with foreigners. There is a pervasive system of informers and surveillance. Frequent association with foreigners can result in questioning, arrest, and detention. Professional associations such as the Rotary and Lions are allowed to operate, though their membership and activities are presumably monitored by the Government.

Workers are not permitted to organize independently in Ethiopia, and labor-management negotiations are not allowed. Strikes and slowdowns are strictly forbidden. The only labor organization allowed to operate is the government-controlled All-Ethiopia Trade Union (ATEU). The ATEU, one of Ethiopia's "mass organizations," is basically a political group utilized by the Government to implement its policies, expand party control within the workplace, and prevent work stoppages. A number of ATEU's top leaders have been trained in Eastern Europe, and the organization has close ties with Soviet and East European labor organizations. The 1985 report of the International Labor Organization (ILO) Committee of Experts criticizes the mandatory single trade union structure in Ethiopia and repeats its request that freedom of association be extended to rural workers and public servants.

With the overthrow of the Haile Selassie regime, the Ethiopian Orthodox ("Coptic") Church lost its favored position, along with its lands and most of its property. The Government allows the Orthodox Church and the Muslim religion (each claims to make up about 50 percent of Ethiopia's population) freedom of worship and proselytism. However, the Orthodox Church has government-appointed officials within its administration to ensure its conformity.

Orthodox and Muslim holidays are recognized by the Government, and officials of both religions are allowed to exercise jurisdiction over civil matters such as marriages. There is, however, a continuing effort to deemphasize the presence and importance of religion in Ethiopian life, e.g., references to any deity are expunged from dialogue in television programs and movies, and are forbidden in government statements or publications. Nevertheless, in 1985 there was a notable resurgence in religious observances and church attendance, deemed by many to be a popular response to the regime's efforts to curb religion.

ETHIOPIA

In May 1985, the state-appointed administrator of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church attempted to remove certain religious artifacts from a church in Addis Ababa. An angry mob of worshipers prevented the removal, killing a state-sponsored priest and a deacon in the melee.

Other religions, particularly protestant evangelical organizations, have found their activities sharply curtailed by the Government, through the closure of churches, the seizure and nationalization of property and facilities, and harassment and surveillance. At least one organization's congregation, its leader imprisoned since 1977, now assembles in secret "safe areas" for worship and other church-related meetings. The Government gives permits to foreign missionaries to enter and work in Ethiopia in limited numbers, although usually as development specialists, not as missionaries. Amnesty International's 1985 report notes that over 40 officials of the Ethiopian Evangelical Mekan Yesus church had been detained, with 17 still imprisoned at the end of 1984 for their nonviolent beliefs.

There has been considerable illegal emigration by Ethiopian Jews (Falashas) during 1985, continuing a trend started in previous years. Legal emigration of this group is greatly restricted. The Government reacted angrily to the humanitarian airlifting of thousands of Ethiopian refugee Jews from Sudan to Israel, denouncing it as "kidnapping." Access by foreign Jewish and Israeli visitors to Falasha villages in the Gondar region was erratic and shut off for much of 1985. Frictions continue to mark government relations with the Ethiopian Jewish community, resulting from government efforts to prevent emigration, to restrict Hebrew instruction, and to force Marxist-Leninist indoctrination. Although Ethiopian Jews live in areas of insurgency (Tigre, Gondar) where they are frequently caught in military crossfire, stories of "genocidal" actions by Ethiopian authorities or of highly brutal behavior toward Falashas appear to be unfounded.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Restrictions on freedom of travel within Ethiopia exist as a result of the insurgencies (several areas, mainly in the northern administrative zones, are closed to travel for security reasons). Moreover, permission is required for Ethiopian citizens to change their places of residence, and persons considered politically suspect may even be forbidden to travel outside their home areas.

Travel abroad by Ethiopians is heavily restricted by the Government. A passport application can be denied for failure to attend the mandatory Sunday morning political meeting or to "volunteer" for kebele work activities. It is not unusual for bribes to be solicited when an application is received. During 1985, as in the past, issuance of external travel permits to Ethiopians was occasionally shut off with no warning, then suddenly renewed shortly thereafter.

Emigration is highly restricted except in special circumstances such as marriage to or adoption by a foreign national, although some emigration has been allowed on the basis of family reunification. Leaving Ethiopia without authorization is regarded by the Government as a serious offense punishable by 5 to 25 years' imprisonment or, in exceptional cases, reportedly by death. There is nonetheless considerable illegal emigration, undertaken either under the subterfuge of travel abroad for business or to visit relatives, or by arduous treks overland and surreptitious crossing of the border.

The Government recognizes the right of voluntary repatriation, and its proclamation of mass amnesty for those Ethiopians living abroad (numbering more than 1 million) remains in effect. The Government does not forcibly repatriate refugees from other countries. There are approximately 180,000 Sudanese resident in Ethiopia, some of whom are genuine refugees, others of whom are persons displaced by drought and insurgency in Southern Sudan.

The drought/famine and civil strife severely affected many areas in Ethiopia and displaced a large number of persons who crossed over into neighboring countries, especially Sudan, in search of food. With the return of near-normal rains in 1985, many of these displaced persons voluntarily returned to their homes. Eyewitnesses reported that groups of such displaced persons and others transporting relief supplies have at times been strafed by the Ethiopian Air Force, although this may result from a misidentification of those crossing the border as rebel troops. There were approximately 500,000 Ethiopians in camps in Eastern Sudan at the end of 1985. There is no evidence that the Government discriminates against these persons upon their return to Ethiopia.

Ethiopian citizens have no legal right or means to change their Government. All power to determine policy in Ethiopia resides in the upper echelons of government, led by Chairman Mengistu and a small group of former military officers. Political and economic policies are dictated to the population. The Provisional Military Government of Socialist Ethiopia invariably claims to be speaking on behalf of the whole Ethiopian people. The Workers' Party of Ethiopia purports to offer Ethiopian citizens a means of participation in government, but its role is to ensure that all government ministries, mass organizations, and nationalized businesses remain faithful to Marxist-Leninist principles. Kebeles and peasants' associations, which are the primary party/government control mechanisms at the local level, control housing allocation, basic food rationing, political indoctrination, and implement other government policies, such as registering youths for national military service.

The highest government echelons are no longer dominated by the Amhara ethnic group but include many Oromos and some Eritreans and Tigreans. Almost all senior government and political figures are of Christian origin although the population is 50 percent Muslim. Women are very poorly represented at the top echelons of government. Only one woman, a vice minister, holds a senior position.

Plans are currently underway to adopt a new constitution which, according to reports from the party congress in March 1985, would provide for the creation of a People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia and representation by "nationality" or ethnic group in national and regional parliaments. The extent of autonomy that will be permitted groups such as the Eritreans, Tigreans, and Oromos is not clear. Until that key issue is resolved to the satisfaction of the population, antigovernment insurgencies will continue.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There is no governmental or private body to investigate alleged human rights violations. The Government opposes any attempt by international and nongovernmental organizations to investigate such allegations. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in Addis Ababa are not allowed to visit political prisoners, though they are allowed to visit prisoners of war from the 1977-78 war with Somalia. Moreover, the ICRC does not have access to prisoners taken in fighting with insurgent groups or to prisoners held by Ethiopian-backed rebel groups opposing the Governments of Sudan and Somalia. In December 1985, Ethiopia expelled a private French relief organization, Doctors Without Borders, for alleged criticism of the forced resettlement program. Some of Amnesty International's concerns, as expressed in its 1985 report, are included in 1.b., 1.c., and 2.c. above. Freedom House rated Ethiopia as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ethiopia's first census indicated that its diverse population reached 42,266,000 in 1985 and is growing, according to 1984 World Bank data, at more than 2.7 percent per year. Approximately 85 percent of the population lives in rural areas, and the majority resides over half a day's walk from an all-weather road. Ethiopia's per capita income in 1983 was about $120, one of the lowest in the world. Of the more than 40 different ethnic groups, the Ahmara, Tigreans, and Oromo make up more than three-fourths of the population.

According to the World Bank, gross domestic product grew at an average rate of 2.3 percent during the decade ending in 1982/83. However, the economy is currently suffering not only from the drought and civil strife (military expenditures take 25 percent of the budget) but also from ideological constraints, notably in the PMGSE efforts to impose upon its nation of small, independent farmers a system of inefficient collectivized agriculture and state farms, especially in the resettlement areas. The PMGSE also imposes artificially low official market prices on the sale of basic foodstuffs and forces farmers to sell at these prices. Lacking essential incentives to produce, Ethiopia's farmers have tended to reduce their production to that amount needed for their families. At the same time, industrial production is stagnating due to overcentralization (there is government ownership of almost all industrial facilities), shortages in spare parts (due to chronic foreign exchange problems), a lack of capital investment, and managerial inefficiency.

In February 1985, the Government announced an austerity program which has further slowed economic activity. Imports have again been reduced, gasoline rationed, and a special drought emergency tax of 1 month's salary per annum imposed on all wage earners earning over $25 per month. While consumer prices have soared, wages have not risen in 10 years. The rate of underemployment plus unemployment in Ethiopia's cities and villages is reportedly around 50 percent.

ETHIOPIA

The Government has attempted to increase health and educational services to the peasantry and urban poor. Currently, the infant mortality rate is 167 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy at birth is 48 years. The caloric supply as a percentage of requirements was 79 percent in 1977, the last year for which statistics are available, and may have dropped since then due to drought and civil strife. There is 1 doctor per 75,000 persons and 1 nurse per 5,320 persons. Infectious disease is rampant, including leprosy, tuberculosis, and trachoma. Only 14.5 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water in 1980. Even in urban areas, where 82 percent have access to safe water, lines at water pumps are common, and open ditches are used as sewers.

The World Bank cited a 12.8 percent literacy rate in 1974, and while recent Bank data are not available, the Government claims the literacy rate rose to 54 percent in 1985. This growth is related to the Government's efforts to expand access to educational facilities, especially for the rural and urban poor. The primary school enrollment ratio reportedly increased from 19 to 37 percent between 1973 and 1981, (male 46 percent, female 27 percent in 1981). The Government has invested considerable effort in adult literacy campaigns and rewards those who volunteer to teach in them with travel permits and other highly prized privileges. University enrollment has expanded considerably, to approximately 12,000 day students and over 8,000 extension students. Ethnic Oromo students have been given opportunities for advanced studies that were largely unavailable under the previous regime.

While consumer prices have soared, wages have not risen in 10 years. Wage earners at the bottom of the pay scale can no longer be said to earn a salary that provides a decent living for a worker and family.

The minimum age for nonfarm labor is 14 and seems to be respected. The maximum legal work week in Ethiopia is 48 hours, which is generally respected in practice. "Voluntary" work campaigns at places of employment are growing increasingly common. Workers "volunteer" to work extra hours and weekends, so that factory or office quotas can be achieved, but receive no pay for these hours. Although the right of workers to an annual vacation is guaranteed by law, in practice government workers are usually not allowed such time off. Employers in private industry, however, are obliged by the Government to respect this law. Health and safety codes for the workplace are rudimentary and remain unenforced.

Various U.N. studies indicate Ethiopian women are subject to many disadvantages, encountering inter alia cultural and traditional biases, marriages imposed at a very young age, hard and time-consuming labor in rural areas, and inadequate employment opportunities and decent wages in urban areas. Village leadership is invariably male, and all clergy are male. However, women in the central Ethiopian cultures (Oromo, Amhara, Tigre) enjoy economic rights equal to those of men. They may inherit, sell, or buy property and engage in business. Women have a subservient status within the home, and child marriages remain common in some rural areas despite opposition by the Government. Female circumcision is practiced in the northern parts of the country, although the Government has stated its opposition to this practice. The Revolutionary Ethiopian Women's Association, a "mass organization" created in 1980, has the proclaimed goal of improving the status of women.

GABON

Gabon has a single-party political system in which effective political power is concentrated in the Presidency. That office has been held since 1967 by President Omar Bongo, who is also head of the party. A March 1983 amendment to the party constitution restricts candidacy in future presidential elections to the "Secretary General-Founder of the Democratic Party of Gabon," thus reserving presidential candidacy for President Bongo. In practice, presidential power is limited by the complexity of government and the diffusion of power through 60 cabinet-level officials led by a Prime Minister. A 120-member National Assembly is elected from slates chosen by the single party and meets regularly, but it has little real power.

Although still a developing country, Gabon has the highest per capita income ($4,000) in Sub-Saharan Africa due to its significant petroleum and mineral resources and its small population. Economic performance has also benefited from long-standing government policies supporting private enterprise and encouraging foreign investment. While income distribution is skewed in favor of the modern urban sector as opposed to the traditional, agricultural sector, most Gabonese have benefited in some measure from the country's strong economy.

The country's 1961 Constitution guarantees protection of the individual and respect for the integrity of the person, and, with isolated exceptions, these rights are generally respected in practice. Political rights, however, are not guaranteed under the Constitution, and active political opposition to the sole legal party is not permitted. Public criticism of particular government actions and policies is allowed and occurs with some regularity within the context of the single party, although direct attacks on the President are prohibited. There is no evidence of systematic police or other repression of the population. Gabon released the last of its political prisoners in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known political killings or summary executions.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of abductions or hostage-taking by government or any other groups. The authorities are sometimes slow to advise the families of accused criminals or detainees who are arrested, but there has been no evidence of attempts to suppress news of an arrest.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The political opposition group, the Movement for National Recovery (MORENA), based in Paris, has alleged that several people detained in the Libreville prison on political charges have been mistreated or kept in degrading conditions. Amnesty International's 1985 report mentioned allegations that some prisoners, both criminal and political, had been ill-treated. There were other reports, however, that virtually all prisoners had been allowed family visits. Family members reported no serious mistreatment. Police are believed to be rough but not brutal in their treatment of suspected criminals. Prison conditions are harsh.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In Gabon, "acts against the security of the state" and "actions against the Chief of State," which can include advocating a multiparty system, are punishable crimes. Alleged members of the MORENA opposition group were detained for several months before being brought to trial and sentenced in 1982 and 1983. All MORENA prisoners have now been released. There have been no reports of detention without trial of persons accused of violations of criminal law. Gabonese law, amended in September 1983 and ratified by the National Assembly early in 1984, provides guarantees against arbitrary detention according to clearly articulated judicial procedure which is observed in practice. Previously, there were no legal protections against arbitrary detention.

Forced labor is not used as a means of political coercion or racial or social discrimination. Some prison sentences for serious crimes include hard labor as part of the sentence during incarceration.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A legal system based upon French law, customary law, and the 1961 Constitution, which gives the President a powerful role, functions fairly effectively. The right to a fair public trial is guaranteed by the Gabonese Constitution and has generally been respected in practice in criminal cases. In security/political cases, however, there have been more controversy and inconsistency. The 1982 trial of the 29 alleged members of MORENA took place in public with representatives of the international press and Amnesty International present, while the 1983 trial of 4 political dissidents took place in camera. The charges leveled against the accused were basically the same in both cases, namely, printing and distributing antigovernment tracts and encouraging the Government of France to use its influence in Gabon to bring about a multiparty political system. In 1985, a military officer was tried publicly and convicted by a special military tribunal for plotting to overthrow the Government. He was executed after the Gabonese Supreme Court and the President declined his appeal. By the end of 1985, all known political prisoners had been released, and no others are known to be held.

The Gabonese court system is modeled on the French judicial system. Trial courts hear questions of fact and law in civil, commercial, social, criminal and administrative cases. A second level of appeals courts is divided into two general appellate courts, with a separate appeals court for criminal cases. Gabon's highest judicial body, the supreme court, is divided into four chambers. There are also three exceptional courts: a military tribunal which handles all military offenses, a state security court, and a special criminal court which deals with fraud and embezzlement of public funds by officials.

The judiciary is implicitly susceptible to executive influence, since Gabon's Constitution gives the President the authority to appoint, transfer, and dismiss judicial officials.

GABON

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The various police and security units monitor dissident political activity, including dissident telephone conversations, but interference in the daily life of the populace is relatively rare.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are certain limits on these rights in Gabon. No direct public criticism of President Bongo is permitted, and no advocacy of a multiparty political system by the media or individuals is tolerated. The country's single daily newspaper, which is government-owned, regularly prints columns attacking alleged inefficiency or corruption in various government offices. Foreign magazines and newspapers, notably French publications and magazines printed elsewhere in Africa, which sometimes criticize the President and the one-party system, generally circulate freely in Gabon, although occasionally particular issues of publications are seized by the police and a few publications are banned. Journalists are considered to be state employees and are expected to expound on themes as directed by the Government. The policies of the Government are sometimes debated in public forums. The President sometimes holds press conferences and his ministers have submitted to lively direct questioning on television on a broad range of domestic policy issues such as education, public housing, and transportation.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political activity outside the Democratic Party of Gabon is illegal. The Government does not interfere in the affairs of nonpolitical organizations. In some sectors, for example, sports clubs and social service organizations have been formed. Many are national programs under government auspices, but diverse private groups and events sponsored by private companies also exist.

Labor unions may organize but are legally required to be affiliated to the government-sponsored Gabonese Labor Confederation, which is closely tied to the governing political structure and is the sole legal labor federation. The Labor Code (1978) and the General Convention of Labor (1982) govern general working conditions and benefits for all sectors. Unions in each sector negotiate with management over specific pay scales, working conditions, and benefits applicable to their industry. Each year, representatives of labor, management, and government meet to agree on the minimum wage, which is determined within guidelines provided by the Government. Under Gabonese law, all strikes are illegal which occur before remedies prescribed under the Gabonese Labor Code have been exhausted. Nevertheless, petroleum and transportation workers have successfully organized strikes and job actions in 1985 and in previous years over wages and working conditions. The Gabonese Labor Confederation is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

It is estimated that over half of Gabon's 80,000 salaried private sector workers are unionized. Government employees are not permitted to belong to unions. Agreements reached between labor and management in each sector also apply to nonunion and expatriate labor. According to the 1978 labor code, workers may individually or collectively take complaints of code violations to arbitration and may appeal to labor and national courts. These provisions are observed in practice.

The Gabonese Constitution guarantees religious freedom and tolerance. Proselytizing has sometimes been discouraged, and in 1985 four small syncretistic sects were banned because of alleged tolerance of antigovernment activities. Nonetheless, Christian, Muslim, and animist religions all flourish in Gabon, and public worship is unrestricted. A number of different religious groups operate schools. There is no political or economic discrimination because of religious preference.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement within the country, foreign travel, and return to Gabon are normally not restricted by the Government. Government employees, however, must obtain permission to travel abroad, and private citizens must obtain exit permits. Since mid-1983, the Government has slightly tightened restrictions on the entry and resettlement of displaced persons, but many individuals who have a "well-founded fear of persecution" in their country of origin have been given permission to stay in Gabon; they come from a variety of countries, including those with which Gabon has friendly bilateral relations. There have been no reported cases of involuntary repatriation, and those refugees who wish to repatriate voluntarily are allowed to do so.

Gabon is governed by a centralized, single-party regime in which President Omar Bongo exercises most political power. Major political and economic decisions are made by the President, usually in consultation with cabinet-level officials. This group of 60 includes representatives of all the country's major ethnic, geographic, and political groups. Gabon's varied interest groups are thus given access to political patronage. The Fang, an ethnic group comprising about 35 percent of the population, feel themselves to be underrepresented. Fear of Fang dominance by the remaining 65 percent has contributed to the President's political control. The need to maintain the balance of interests represents, therefore, the major check on presidential power. The very size and complexity of the government structure is another significant factor. Opposition political parties are not permitted. Membership in the single political party is open to all Gabonese but is not required. Elections below the presidential level are sometimes contested, but all candidates must be approved by the Democratic Party of Gabon.

Although no women are found among the top 40 full government ministers, 4 women occupy cabinet level positions as secretaries of state, and 9 others occupy junior minister positions. Women are particularly active in the judiciary and occupy 13 seats in the National Assembly.

GABON

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

President Bongo has invited representatives of Amnesty International and other human rights organizations to visit Gabon. An Amnesty International representative from Senegal was present in 1982 for the major human rights-related event in recent years, the public trial of the MORENA dissidents. In 1985, informal contacts were undertaken with several international human rights organizations for frank discussion on the human rights situation in Gabon. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees functions in Gabon under the aegis of the United Nations Development Program. Some of Amnesty International's current concerns are noted in Sections 1c and 1e above. Freedom House rated Gabon "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Gabon is a developing country, although its petroleum and mineral resources and small population of only one million enable it to have one of the highest per capita incomes in Africa--about $4,000 in 1983. The population growth rate is 2.8 percent per annum. Gabon has enjoyed substantial economic growth over the past 10 years, helped in part by the Government's policy of supporting private enterprise and encouraging foreign investment. However, economic growth has stagnated over the last 4 years due to the depressed state of world markets for Gabon's principal exports.

In spite of its good economic record, Gabon faces the problem of trying to integrate the modern sector of the economy with the traditional sector based on semisubsistence agriculture. Income distribution is skewed in favor of the roughly 50 percent of the population who live in the modern urban sector. The Government is attempting to ensure further economic growth and a more equitable distribution of national income through a program of investment in education, social services, infrastructure, and agriculture. Access to the Government's social programs is open to all Gabonese citizens on a nondiscriminatory basis. The right of both men and women to hold private property is spelled out in the Constitution and is fully protected in practice.

According to the World Bank, life expectancy at birth rose from 40 years in 1970 to 51 years in 1985. Estimates of infant mortality have varied widely. The World Bank statistics for 1985 of 159 deaths per 1,000 live births indicates a slight decrease during the past several years. The majority of the population has access to maternity clinics and basic health facilities. A World Bank estimate of the ratio of available caloric supply to nutritional requirements was 115 percent in 1977. There has been no evidence of significant malnutrition due to inadequate food supplies, but lack of knowledge of good nutritional and health care practices for children in the traditional sector remains a problem. It is estimated that about 75 percent of the urban population has access to safe drinking water. The World Bank in 1981 gave the primary school enrollment ratio as 106 percent (109 for males and 103 for females). The Government has made school attendance compulsory and nearly all primary school-age children are believed to be attending school.

Labor legislation provides broad protection to workers. The minimum wage for unskilled labor since April, 1985 is about $162 per month for Gabonese and $125 per month for foreigners, the highest in Sub-Saharan Africa, with the exception of South Africa. Due to labor shortages, most salaries are much higher. There is little unemployment among Gabonese wishing to enter the wage economy, although some unemployment exists among recent baccalaureate and university graduates.

GABON

No one below the age of 16 may work without the authorization of the Ministries of Labor, Public Health, and Education. This permission is rarely granted. Any work in excess of 40 hours per week must be compensated with overtime pay, and the work week must include a minimum rest of 48 consecutive hours. Pregnant women have the right to 14 weeks of leave during pregnancy, including 6 immediately before delivery. The labor code describes enforcement of occupational health and safety standards, which are established by decree of the Minister of Health.

Women enjoy full legal rights in Gabon, although their influence and overall participation in government is limited by cultural factors. The Gabonese legal system contains many statutes providing specific rights and protection to women, but many are undoubtedly unaware of these provisions. In recent years, women have begun to play an increasing role in the economic, political, and cultural life of the country, particularly in the urban areas. The Government and party have become more sensitized to women's issues, and government and party institutions are actively promoting women's rights. The Ministry of Women's Affairs 1984 budget shows an increase of about 600 percent since 1983. Under the Ministry's auspices, a National Commission for the Promotion of Women was created in 1984 and has recently completed a study on the needs of Gabon's women. It acknowledged that the rural sector lags behind the urban in the promotion and protection of women's rights and encouraged efforts underway to help rural women organize agricultural cooperatives and government programs in basic health care, nutrition, and adult literacy. These programs are largely directed at women. A new journal published by the Ministry of Women's Affairs gives extensive coverage to women in the military and the professions. The party's women's union is active in organizing women's cultural presentations throughout the country.

THE GAMBIA

A former British colony on the West African Coast, The Gambia is a parliamentary democracy with an elected President. Until the bloody coup attempted in 1981, The Gambia had a history of political stability under the leadership of its first and current President, Sir Dawda Jawara. His ruling People's Progressive Party has dominated the House of Representatives since independence in 1965, but the leading opposition party and independent candidates are also represented and actively participate in the political process. A state of emergency imposed after the July 1981 coup attempt was lifted in February 1985.

Given impetus by the coup and formalized by the Confederation Treaty of 1981 establishing Senegambia, the process of confederation with Senegal continued during 1985, albeit slowly. Important steps were taken during the year to implement the protocols on defense and security. The Gambia gendarmerie has been organized under a Senegalese officer, and the first company trained by British officers has now been integrated with Senegalese troops into a confederal battalion.

The Gambia's population of 725,000 (1984 census) consists largely of subsistence farmers growing rice and groundnuts (peanuts), the country's primary export crop. Drought has affected production of both groundnuts and rice. In 1984, the Government signed a standby agreement with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to provide badly needed balance of payments and budgetary support, but has had to accept stringent spending and import limitations. Due to a shortage of food experienced early in 1985, many groundnut farmers planted food crops, thus further depleting the Government's anticipated revenues from groundnuts.

With the lifting of the state of emergency in 1985, the human rights climate improved further as The Gambia increasingly returned to normalcy after the shock of the 1981 coup. The coup attempt had been led by leftist elements and supported by a large part of the police field force. It resulted in the deaths of over 800 people. Of the persons eventually brought to trial, 55 were acquitted. An independent judiciary, open courts, established trial procedures, and an appeal process ensured that the accused received a fair trial and due process. There is only one outstanding case arising from the events of July 1981: one of the leaders of the attempted coup was finally apprehended as he was returning home from a four-year, self-imposed exile. His treason trial began in August but has been postponed repeatedly as the courts sought additional evidence.

There have been no instances of political killings in The Gambia in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There is no known record or allegation of abduction or secret detention by any element of the Government or by any other group.

THE GAMBIA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The constitutional prohibition against torture is observed in practice. No allegations of torture have been noted in 1985.

The Constitution also contains prohibitions against cruel, inhuman, and degrading punishment. Persons familiar with the operation of the legal system believe that courts are alert to any allegation of mistreatment in prisons. These sources also acknowledge, however, that there may be lapses in supervision resulting in individual instances of mistreatment of prisoners. The Government allows prison visits by representatives of the local Red Cross and by close family members.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Based on British legal practice, there are well developed constitutional and legal procedures governing the arrest, detention, and bringing to trial of persons accused of crimes. Under these procedures, a detained person must be brought to trial within one week. This waiting period, however, can be extended twice, making 21 days the maximum period of detention before trial.

Under the Emergency Act of 1981, the Government could order the detention of any person who was considered to have been involved in acts prejudicial to public safety for up to 14 days without a detention order but with right to legal counsel. The Emergency Act was lifted in February 1985.

It is important to note that the Government scrupulously observed its own laws in handling the 1091 persons detained after the coup attempt and reportedly released numerous detainees against whom strong evidence was in hand and who may still pose a potential danger to the State.

The Labor Administration Act prohibits forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

To date, 62 persons have been sentenced to death--after lengthy public trials observing due process of law--for crimes committed in connection with the 1981 coup attempt. The cases have now gone through appeal and, in each case brought to the President, executive clemency has been granted. No executions have taken place.

Three kinds of law operate in The Gambia: general, Shari'a, and customary law. Shari'a, governing Muslims, is observed in marriage and divorce proceedings. Customary law covers marriage, inheritance, divorce, land tenure and utilization, local tribal government, and all other civil and social relations originating in the traditional religious and tribal situation of the country. General law, based on English statutes and modified to suit the Gambian context, governs criminal cases and trials and most organized business practices. If there were a conflict between general law and Shari'a, general law would prevail.

The Constitution guarantees criminal defendants rights traditional in the English system, such as the right to a public trial, the presumption of innocence, and the right to be informed promptly of offense charged. If an accused person is released on bail, the individual need not come to trial until the investigation is completed, and there apparently is no maximum time limit for investigations. Appeals normally proceed from the Supreme (trial) Court to the Court of Appeals, the country's highest tribunal. Under the Emergency Act, the court system in this tiny nation was overwhelmed with the large number of detainees. Consequently, the Government established a special division of the Supreme Court, which included judges and prosecuting and defense attorneys from neighboring English-speaking countries which have the same basic legal system as The Gambia. This unusual step was taken because of a shortage of trained legal personnel in The Gambia, to avoid overwhelming the regular judicial process, and to demonstrate publicly the Government's concern for impartiality.

There are currently no political prisoners in The Gambia. One of the coup leaders of 1981 was arrested in 1985, tried, and sentenced to death. It is expected that execution clemency will be granted as it has been in all other cases arising out of the 1981 coup attempt.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides guarantees, which are respected in practice, against arbitrary search of person and property. The Constitution permits the voluntary submission by the suspect to a search or a mandatory search if the search is reasonably required in the interests of national defense or other public interest. Under the criminal code, search warrants are issued by magistrates upon application by the police, based on probable cause. There are a number of police and military check points in and around Banjul. Drivers are stopped and vehicles searched from time to time.

The rights of family are of extreme importance in this conservative Muslim society. Marriage, the raising of children, and religious instruction are regulated by a combination of personal preference and ethnic and religious tradition. The Government does not intrude in family matters except to protect public safety and morality. There is no effort to censor or control personal correspondence or communications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides guarantees of press freedom. In practical terms The Gambia, with its small, mainly rural, largely illiterate, and multilingual population does not support an active press. There are no daily newspapers. There is a government weekly paper and several intermittently published, mimeographed news sheets. There is a government radio station and also one private commercial station, which broadcasts largely music programs. There is no television in The Gambia, although Senegalese stations can be received. The Government dominates the media through Radio Gambia, but there have been no reported instances of government interference with the commercial radio station. The Government does not attempt to censor published materials whether they originate within or outside the country. Magazines and some newspapers from outside the country are available at a few outlets in the capital. The Emergency Act, with its broad powers of detention, had an inhibiting effect on criticism of the Government by independent news sheets.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no restrictions on freedom of association and assembly in the Constitution. According to available information, no permits for meetings have been denied, but the authorities require meetings to be open to the public.

Trade unions are small and fragmented and remain a minor element in Gambian economic and political life. Less than 20 percent of the workforce is engaged in the industry, commerce, and service sectors, where unions normally are active. The Government has agreed that the general confederation, the Gambian Workers Union, may resume its functions provided it is reregistered. It had been deregistered after an illegal strike in the late 1970's. The union alleges that obstacles have been put in its way when it has sought to reregister, while the Government claims that the union is free to do so at any time. Apparently full union activity remains conditional on filing several reports and rectifying what the government alleges are financial irregularities. Other unions continue to function under basic labor and trade union legislation. Union members have freedom of movement to attend meetings outside the country. The Labor Administration Act specifies that workers are guaranteed freedom of association and the right to organize and to bargain collectively.

The constitutional guarantees of freedom of conscience, thought, and religion are observed in practice. The state is secular though Muslims constitute over 90 percent of the population. The schools provide instruction in the Koran for Muslim students. Christians, both Catholic and Protestant, freely practice their religion. There is a small Baha'i community in Banjul. Missionaries are permitted to carry on their various mission-related activities. No evidence of discrimination in employment, education, or in other areas of Gambian life on the grounds of religion has been reported.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees freedom of movement subject to conditions protecting public safety, health, and morals. There is no restriction on freedom of emigration or freedom of return. Internally, police and military checkpoints exist in and around Banjul. There is no evidence that police harass travelers.

Because of historic and ethnic ties with the people of Senegal, Guinea-Bissau, Guinea, and Mali, people tend to move unregulated across borders, which are poorly marked and difficult to police. Under the Confederation Treaty of 1981, neither Gambians nor Senegalese need passports or visas to travel to the other country. Early in 1985, some 600 Gambians were among the vast number of illegal aliens expelled by Nigeria. Their return has had no noticeable impact. With the change of regime in Guinea (Conakry) there is evidence that many Guineans formerly resident in The Gambia are returning to Guinea.

THE GAMBIA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Government is elected by citizens 18 years of age and older; the chief executive official (the President) and the members of the legislature (House of Representatives) are popularly elected, as are the district councils and the chiefs who exercise traditional authority in the villages and compounds. A functioning multiparty system exists in The Gambia, even though the People's Progressive Party has been in power since independence. The principal opposition party, the National Convention Party, contests national and district elections. Other opposition parties contest the Presidency and other offices on a selected basis. Independents have run for and won legislative seats. There have not been any serious allegations of election fraud, but the opposition believed the 1983 district elections would be fixed and chose to boycott rather than contest the elections. The government party currently holds 35 of 43 seats in the House of Representatives, and the opposition is not able to defeat or modify significant legislation. Nevertheless, debate is open, and accepted parliamentary procedures are observed.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government permits visits of international human rights organizations to observe the conditions of the detainees and the trial process. There have been no requests by such organizations for investigation of alleged human rights abuses in The Gambia during the past year. Amnesty International's main concerns, as expressed in its 1985 report (covering 1984), were largely overtaken by events in 1984 and 1985, e.g., commutation of death sentences for persons involved in the 1984 coup. Freedom House rates The Gambia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Gambia is a poor, largely agricultural nation with a population of 751,000 people (1985). Almost 83 percent of the people live in rural areas. The population growth rate is 3.5 percent a year. Per capita gross national product (1984) is $360 a year.

The Gambia depends on one major crop, groundnuts, for foreign exchange; this is subject to the vagaries of weather and world market conditions. There is also considerable unofficial entrepot activity across Gambia's porous borders. The population consists mostly of subsistence farmers who are not able to satisfy The Gambia's food requirements. As a result, the Government has relied heavily on external food assistance in recent years and on foreign assistance to fund a 5-year development plan which emphasizes crop diversification and greater agricultural productivity. The Government's ability to absorb and administer the assistance has been hampered by a lack of facilities and trained personnel.

Life expectancy at birth is 40 years (1985); and the infant mortality rate is a high 191 per 1,000 live births. Access to safe water is limited almost exclusively to the few urban areas (85 percent in 1980). Rural population access to safe water was only three percent in 1970. The ratio of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 93 percent in 1977. The adult literacy rate is 20 percent (1984).

THE GAMBIA

Approximately 51 percent (1983) of eligible children attend primary school (males 64 percent, females 37 percent). The new Gambia College provides postsecondary training leading to certificates in teaching, agriculture, and nursing, but there is no university-level institution in The Gambia.

The minimum age for employment is 18, at which age a prospective employee is authorized a labor card. The prohibition on child labor does not apply to customary chores on family farms. Minimum wages and hours of work are determined by the Joint Industrial Council, pursuant to the Labor Administration Act, which has representation from employees, employers, and government. Occupational safety and health are covered by the Factory Act under which the Minister of Labor is given authority to regulate factory health and safety, accident prevention, and dangerous trades and to appoint inspectors to ensure compliance.

Most people are Muslim and live in villages. While individual initiative and choice are valued, rights and privileges are generally perceived to reside in the group rather than in the individual. Though they are changing, traditional values remain strong. Education of women is on the rise, and women participate increasingly in the professions and in political life. Marriages are still often arranged, but there is growing freedom of personal choice. Family planning, focused on the health and welfare of mother and child, remains controversial but is gaining acceptance. There is a Women's Bureau in the Office of the President which actively promotes debate on women's issues.

GHANA

Ghana is governed by the Provisional National Defense Council (PNDC) under the Chairmanship of Flight Lieutenant Jerry Rawlings, who seized power from the previous elected Government on December 31, 1981. Under the Establishment Proclamation issued January 11, 1982, the Council exercises "all powers of government." In practice, government policy is developed by Chairman Rawlings assisted by a number of close advisers, both inside and outside government. The Council was recently expanded to 10 members and now includes, aside from the chairman (the lone survivor of the 7 original members), 2 recently added military officers and 7 civilians (including 2 women and 1 ex-military). A Cabinet composed of the secretaries (ministers) of various departments conducts the day-to-day activity of the Government. A network of Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR) is designed as a channel to transmit government policies to the citizen and citizen concerns to the Government.

Despite a period of violence and confrontation in 1982, the Government has been generally successful in its efforts to defend itself against violent overthrow without adopting draconian controls over the population. Nevertheless, outspoken criticism of the Government has occasionally resulted in detention of the critic, creating an atmosphere conducive to self-censorship. Most coup attempts have come primarily from members and former members of the armed forces. At least two dissident incidents were reported in 1984.

In 1983, the Government adopted an exceptionally austere economic recovery program in an effort to redress a quarter century of economic mismanagement and political instability, which caused Ghana to decline from one of Africa's most promising states to a condition of economic collapse and poverty. Remedial measures have included a more than 1,000 percent devaluation, severe structural readjustments, and an emphasis on spending for rural rather than urban projects. Conducted in concert with the International Monetary Fund, the 3-year recovery program has begun to have a positive effect and has attracted support from foreign donors, including the United States and international financial institutions. The economic growth rate is expected to make a third consecutive positive showing in 1985. Pre-1983 triple digit inflation has been reduced to under 20 percent.

On the whole, some positive trends in human rights, which were first identified in the second half of 1983, continued during 1985. However, there are no elections to national governing bodies and no legal means by which citizens can freely and peacefully change their laws, officials, or form of government. The most noticeable improvement in human rights has been the restoration of civil order after an initial 18 months of revolutionary excess in 1982 and 1983. Discipline has been restored in the uniformed services and the police, as well as among military political cadres. The courts have been allowed to continue to operate relatively free of executive interference. The principal impediment to the free exercise of human rights remains the absence of constitutionally sanctioned protection of those rights. The potential for arbitrary deprivation of liberty is demonstrated by continuing instances of incarceration without formal charges. A system of public tribunals, which parallels the regular courts, failed to enforce procedural safeguards adequate enough to constitute acceptable due process. Although the Government is studying means of restoring a democratic system, there is still no guarantee of elections nor are there any current plans to provide for a relaxation of government control of the main national newspapers and broadcast news.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No killing was reported in which there was evidence of political motivation or governmental instigation.

b. Disappearance

No disappearance traceable to government action or to nongovernmental or opposition forces was reported in 1985, for the second successive year.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Twice during 1985, the Government acknowledged that some members of the armed forces beat persons detained by them. In one of the cases the victim later died, apparently of injuries sustained while in custody. In neither case was anyone reported to have been disciplined. In another case, however, a soldier was convicted and later executed for crimes committed against civilians. No other allegations of torture or cruel treatment were reported in 1985. During the year, six people were executed upon conviction by tribunals of offenses that were essentially of an economic, "white collar", anticorruption nature. The Government has continued to improve prison conditions and alleviate crowding. Service organizations and family members are permitted to provide for prisoners, and there are regular church services.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Ghanaian security forces occasionally take persons into custody, sometimes late at night, secretly, with or without a warrant, and hold them incommunicado for months. Some of those so detained are said by government officials to have committed crimes, although the only "offense" of which they are known to be "guilty" is the expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government. When the Ghana Bar Association has attempted to free some of these persons through writs of habeas corpus, the PNDC has either stood aside and permitted their release or has interposed ex post facto preventive custody orders barring their release and citing national security considerations as justification.

Except for these persons, detentions are normally performed according to due process of law and subject to a functioning bail system. The criminal code requires that an arrested person be brought before a court within 48 hours. Some writs of habeas corpus continued to be granted in 1985, but habeas corpus is limited by a 1984 law which prevents any court from inquiring into the grounds for the detention of any Ghanaian detained under PNDC Law 2 (the law setting up a national investigation committee, and giving that committee power to investigate virtually any allegation referred to it by the PNDC).

Although the Government does not announce detentions or releases, it appears that the number of prisoners in detention without due process fluctuated in 1985. A March amnesty of 202 prisoners included 2 former ministers; and on January 9, 1986, the last former minister being detained was released on bail. In the latter half of 1985, at least 5, and perhaps as many as 20, persons were arbitrarily detained, though 7 of these detainees were released in late November. Among the detainees were at least two who had been released in 1984, after a previous period of detention. Including some of those just incarcerated, a list of uncharged detainees published in a weekly newspaper in August contained 17 names. However, a government official claimed, also in August, that there were no political prisoners since those in detention were guilty of crimes (although they had not yet been tried). Amnesty International has adopted as a "prisoner of conscience" a Ghanaian who was sentenced by a public tribunal to 16 years in prison for complicity in a November 1982 coup attempt.

Ghana prohibits forced labor, except in terms of military draft and labor following court conviction.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Traditional legal safeguards remain available in the established court system, which includes High Courts, Appeals Courts, and a Supreme Court headed by a Chief Justice. In 1982, the Government also established a new set of judicial bodies which parallels the older court system. These organs include the Office of Revenue Commissioners, the National Investigations Committee, the Special Military Tribunal, and the Public Tribunals Board, as well as Public Tribunals, which exist at the national and regional levels and are planned for districts and communities. In 1985, a National Appeals Tribunal came into existence to hear appeals from the Public Tribunals. The Government's announced purpose in establishing the tribunals was to provide justice more quickly to more people with less corruption. Critics contend that the tribunal system still depends largely on judges with little or no legal experience, that it shortcuts legal safeguards in an effort to speed proceedings, and that it creates opportunities for corruption because of ambiguities concerning the jurisdictions of the tribunals and that of the courts. In 1985, the Government also approved the creation of a legal aid program, but it is still in the preimplementation stage.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A person in Ghana is, for the most part, free of interference by the State in his or her private conduct. For example, membership in organizations such as the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution is voluntary. The monitoring of telephones and mail occurs rarely, if at all. Forced entry into homes has been reported in connection with security investigations. Informers exist but informer systems, so far as is known, do not. There is no forced resettlement of populations, no interference with the right to marry or to have children, and no effort to prevent parents from teaching their children religious practices, either at home or by public means.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The freedoms of speech and the press guaranteed by the 1979 Constitution stand abrogated, but the PNDC chairman has publicly encouraged people to speak out on community concerns. The Government owns the radio and television stations, as well as the two principal daily newspapers. Several privately owned newspapers have been relatively bold in their news coverage and editorial comment. Nevertheless, in early 1985 one private weekly suspended publication for several issues under government orders; the editor and the publisher of another weekly were beaten for publishing an erroneous story (although the Government subsequently apologized); the publisher of another weekly was imprisoned in July without charges and released in November; and the Government has occasionally limited supplies of newsprint available to the independent press. In December, the Government banned publication of the Catholic Standard, a church newspaper known for its independent stand on human rights and other issues. The press generally avoids criticism of the revolution or of Chairman Rawlings and focuses instead on uncovering instances of waste, fraud, and mismanagement, even when they involve relatively high-level officials. Academic freedom tends to be respected. Private organizations voice occasional dissent from official policies.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Individuals are generally free to join together formally or informally to promote nonviolent causes, but restrictions remain on association for the purpose of protesting government policies. Political meetings are banned. Permits are required for public meetings but are routinely given except when the meeting has an overtly political purpose.

In 1985, the Trades Union Congress (TUC) continued to be led by officials freely elected in December 1983. The TUC is associated with the International Labor Organization and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity which has its headquarters in Accra. The right to strike is recognized in law and in practice in Ghana. Ghanaian trade unions freely engage in collective bargaining with both private sector and state-owned enterprises, though in the latter category there is indication that the Government has recently used brief detention and threats against union leaders to force agreement on an issue involving a state-owned enterprise.

There is no state favored religion and no restriction on the exercise of religion or on contacts with others of the same faith. Most Ghanaians, including senior government officials, are practicing members of a religious group. Foreign missionary groups operate freely throughout the country. In 1985, the PNDC chairman publicly criticized the leaders of one of the major religious denominations for disciplining two priests. His criticism has been echoed in sometimes virulent attacks on the church in government-owned newspapers, especially for alleged political misuse of the pulpit.

GHANA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

People are free to move from one part of the country to another without special permission. Since 1983, diplomats have been required to give 48 hours notice before traveling outside the greater Accra region. Roadblocks continue to exist for the prevention of smuggling but are less obtrusive than in 1984.

As members of the Economic Community of West African States, Ghanaians are free to travel for up to 90 days in West Africa. Ghanaians are generally free to exercise this right, and nationals of other member states are free to travel to Ghana. The major restraint on travel by Ghanaians is the lack of foreign exchange. Ghanaians are also free to emigrate or to be repatriated from other countries. If they are considered a security threat, then special permission must be obtained. In 1985, approximately 100,000 Ghanaians returned home, having been expelled by Nigeria. Passports are prized, and their issuance is frequently long delayed.

In August 1985, the Government deported four expatriates, three of whom had either lived in Ghana many years or had Ghanaian spouses and children. None of the four was given a hearing.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The PNDC under Chairman Rawlings exercises total executive, legislative, judicial, and administrative power in Ghana (PNDC Law 42). There are no elections to governing organs and no current procedure by which citizens can freely and peacefully change their laws, officials, or form of government. However, Chairman Rawlings' appointments to the PNDC continue to reflect a variety of views. A panel to design new democratic structures to replace Ghana's existing provisional system is currently at work, but has yet to publish any of its deliberations or a timetable. It has, however, published some papers presented to it by various experts. Efforts to give substance to the revolutionary slogan, "power to the people," include elections for leadership positions at the local level to the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR). These efforts are supposed to culminate in July 1986 with a national CDR conference. Thus far, indications suggest that these CDR elections have been relatively free and open. No claim is made by the Ghana Government, however, that these Committees are meant to take the place of either elected local or national governing bodies.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government continued to permit international organizations to send representatives to Ghana to inquire into the human rights situation. A representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross continued regular prison visits and the Ghana chapter of Amnesty International held another conference on humanitarian law. Though Ghanaian officials received members of foreign diplomatic missions for intensive discussions of human rights, the Government is sensitive to any implication that its decisions on human rights can be affected by external or internal pressures. Internal bodies concerned with human rights tend to be objective but not especially vocal or effective in their reporting. Nevertheless, various independent groups and organizations have worked for and sometimes succeeded in gaining the release of some persons from custody. Official human rights matters are handled by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, although inquiries may be answered at various levels, including cabinet secretaries. Amnesty International in its 1985 Report was concerned about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience and the detention without trial of people held on political grounds. It noted that a number of people, apparently suspected of trying to overthrow the Government in 1984, were reportedly executed by the security forces without trial. Freedom House rated Ghana "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ghana is a developing country with a population of 12.8 million. The population growth rate is 3.1 percent (1985). The per capita gross national product was estimated at $310 in 1983. Ghana has a mixed economy. The Government owns enterprises in the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing sectors; most productive agricultural enterprises, including those in the key cocoa sector, are owned by small farmers. The Government maintains a monopoly over the purchase and export of cocoa, coffee, shea nuts, and cotton. The private trading sector is also substantial, but the Government has favored the state-owned companies in national procurement and distribution.

Ghana's austere economic recovery program has met its targets and is supported by the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and primary Western donors, including the U.S.. The recovery program features a devaluation of Ghana's currency by over 1,000 percent; establishment of producer and export incentives, including increased prices to cocoa and coffee farmers; the gradual elimination of subsidies on utilities and petroleum products; budgetary stringency; and an emphasis upon improving the standard of living in rural areas. The recovery program is showing signs of success. Real gross domestic product, measured in local currency, grew at an estimated 0.7 percent rate in 1983, 7.6 percent in 1984, and an estimated 5 percent in 1985. Triple digit inflation fell to approximately 40 percent in 1984 and to an estimated 20 percent in 1985. The Government's work with the international community in 1983-84 to overcome a major drought and food crisis succeeded so well that in 1985 Ghana was able to export surplus maize to Burkina Faso and Mali.

Life expectancy at birth is 58.9 years, and the infant mortality rate in 1985 was estimated at 97 per 1,000 live births. In 1980, 47 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water (72 percent of the urban population). A renewed emphasis is now being placed on creating and improving wells in rural areas, particularly in the northern regions. In 1970, the adult literacy rate was estimated to be 30.2 percent, with the male rate at 43.1 and the female at 18.4 percent. The difference can be partly attributed to a traditional preference for educating male over female children. Current literacy rates are not available, but 1982 primary school enrollment ratios indicated improvement in access to education, with a primary school enrollment ratio of 76 percent, (85 percent for boys and 66 percent for girls).

Working conditions in Ghana are governed by labor legislation which specifically prohibits forced labor, sets a minimum age for the employment of minors (15), and prohibits night work and certain types of hazardous employment for those under 18 years of age. Government directives also establish a minimum wage and, through both directives and union contracts, the normal hours of work are defined in terms of a 40 hour week. Labor legislation also provides for labor inspectors and gives them the power to order the alteration or closing of any work site "to avert any threat to the health or safety of the workers."

Women's rights in business, the civil service, and the home have long been well established and respected. Two women are among the 10 members of the ruling PNDC. There is one female cabinet member and at least six women are in subcabinet positions. Although women in urban centers and those who have entered modern society encounter little bias in most endeavors, role pressures do exist. Women in the rural agricultural sector remain subject to the constraints associated with traditional male-dominant mores, in spite of efforts by the Government and more enlightened elements in the society to curtail such practices. In the past year, the Government has promulgated four laws which will overturn many of the customary traditional and colonial laws which discriminate against women. The four laws cover head of family accountability, intestate succession, customary divorce registrations, and the administration of estates.

GUINEA

Since coming to power in a bloodless coup on April 3, 1984, the ruling Military Committee for National Redress (CMRN), headed by President Lansana Conte, has sought to portray itself as the antithesis of the previous regime led by Ahmed Sekou Toure. Its positive approach on human rights practices has in fact provided the CMRN with much of its legitimacy so far. While this approach is represented more in the relaxation of authoritarian controls than in the establishment of functioning due process or political participation, the Government's actions and attitudes in 1985 created an atmosphere in which human rights considerations were commanding greater attention. President Conte and his CMRN associates weathered a major coup attempt on July 4, 1985, by ex-prime minister Colonel Diarra Traore and his supporters who claimed the Government had failed to meet the serious economic crisis.

The Government has identified economic recovery as its number one priority and has indicated that national-level political development must wait. Meanwhile, the Government has created special tribunals--one military and the other civilian--to try those persons who have been charged with crimes against the internal and external security of the State. No trials have yet been announced under these courts, and rumors of secret executions of some members of the Sekou Toure regime and of the 1985 coup plotters continue to circulate despite government denials. The Government has yet to announce any plans to allow for the formation of political parties or an eventual transfer of power to civilians.

The economic situation, which the CMRN inherited and is trying to improve, is bleak. Despite abundant natural wealth, Guinea, after 26 years of centralized and corrupt rule, continues to be an extreme example of poverty and underdevelopment. Its agriculture, mostly at the subsistence level, provides a livelihood for over 80 percent of the population. The modern sector consists of a few mining operations, which produce nearly all of Guinea's foreign exchange, and various uneconomic state-owned enterprises, most of which are now slated for immediate privatization. With assistance from the International Monetary Fund (IMF), World Bank, and other donors, Guinea has embarked upon a plan to restructure the entire economy, including inducements to foreign investment and incentives for food production.

Government respect for human rights in 1985 continued to show improvement over the dismal record of the past quarter century. During Independence Day ceremonies on October 2, President Conte was given an award for justice and liberty from the International Committee for Justice and Liberty. In accepting the award, Conte pledged further improvement.

According to the Government, 19 people were killed and 220 wounded on the night of July 4, 1985, during the exchange of fire between rebellious elements loyal to the former prime minister and forces remaining faithful to President Lansana Conte. The casualties reportedly included innocent bystanders. Despite considerable local sentiment in favor of summarily executing Traore and his followers, the Government asserts that no such executions have taken place. In his July 7 speech, President Conte threatened summary justice for Traore and the others, but he also appealed to world opinion to intercede on the plotters' behalf "before it is too late." His appeal was answered immediately with interventions by several Western and African governments as well as by international human rights organizations and private observers, requesting the Government to ensure due process of law for those accused of coup plotting. On August 13, the Government announced the formation of two courts of justice--one military and the other civilian--charged with dispensing justice respectively to soldiers and civilians accused of crimes against the security of the state. However, there has been no indication that these courts have carried out their mandates.

While the state security apparatus of the Ahmed Sekou Toure regime has been largely dismantled, some of its practices linger on. As a result, many people who are arrested seem to disappear, since information about their arrest is not usually released. These practices, combined with poor communication facilities, leave relatives of detainees uninformed when arrests take place, although eventually there is usually a delayed official acknowledgment of arrest or detention. Politically motivated abductions and disappearances no longer take place.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Since coming to power in April 1984, the Government has repeatedly condemned the cruel and inhumane practices of the Toure government. However, most police and Gendarmerie officers are poorly educated, trained, equipped, paid, and supervised, and rough handling of prisoners occurs. The prisons are squalid and unsanitary.

For the common criminal suspect, due to shortcomings of law enforcement forces, there may be a considerable incidence of minor abuse. Newspaper accounts and editorials have complained of police arrogance and injustice, and the Government continues to express concern over enforcement of police codes of conduct. Though the same types of abuses occurred during the previous regime, the motivation was more commonly political, and the consequences more severe for detainees. The fact that most Guineans no longer fear arrest for expressing political views denotes substantial improvement.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

From April 1984 to the end of 1985, former leaders of the Sekou Toure government, some Toure family members, and a few military officers have been detained without any known judicial process. At least until the July coup attempt, they were reportedly confined in the outlying city of Kindia and provided a satisfactory diet, medications when necessary, and occasional family visits. In May, 30 of these detainees were released along with 41 military officers who had been arrested in connection with a coup plot alleged to have been planned in late 1984. However, some of these persons were rearrested in the aftermath of the July 4, 1985, coup attempt. Ten of those rearrested were set free without public notice in September.

Since July 1985, the whereabouts and prisons conditions of the Toure regime prisoners and of the 1985 coup suspects are not known. There is still no indication of the number and/or identities of those arrested for their alleged part in the coup attempt of July 4. The whole process of arrest, interrogation, and release, or further detention of the coup suspects has become shrouded in secrecy. There have been reports that some of these arrests were arbitrary. Most of those detained, however, were released between July 5 and 20, 1985.

Compulsory labor is prohibited and not practiced in Guinea.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Guinea is still in the early stage of establishing an independent judicial system, which on paper includes internationally accepted safeguards for the accused and guarantees of due process. While judges are no longer appointed on the basis of ideology, they are poorly paid and inexperienced. With the establishment on August 13 of special tribunals to hear cases of crimes against state security, the public has been given notice that those accused of such crimes will be accorded due process. Fair trials have long been promised for the earlier group of political prisoners (i.e. those detained for their alleged excesses as officials of the Sekou Toure regime). Their cases remain under investigation and are proceeding slowly, with no publicity so far.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The current regime stresses the inviolability of the home, but there are, as yet, no specific legal or constitutional safeguards. There are no safeguards for privacy, and the mail and telephones of foreigners are likely to be monitored. The CMRN seem, however, less willing to abuse its police powers than its predecessor. In the fall, the Government publicly reprimanded law enforcement officials who were overzealous in enforcing a nighttime curfew against loiterers by arbitrary arrests and abusive acts.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite the changed climate, after 26 years of totalitarian rule, many Guineans remain hesitant to speak their minds on sensitive issues. A tradition of self-censorship limits personal criticism of government leaders, but constructive criticism of the implementation of government policies is accepted without fear of retribution. The Government's attitude toward freedom of the press is still unclear. The only newspaper available in Guinea, Horoya, is government-owned and published three times weekly. It contains virtually no criticism of the CMRN and little hard news on domestic affairs. An irregularly issued news magazine, Fonike, began to be published by the Government in November with in-depth articles on domestic issues, in which the opinions expressed did not necessarily follow official statements. The Government operates radio and television stations which, although similarly uncritical of the CMRN, carry more substantial news concerning Guinean national events. In contrast to the situation under the previous regime, foreign books and magazines are now available, albeit in limited supply.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government permits all public meetings except those of a political nature. The most common form of voluntary association is trade-related. An example is the loosely organized Conakry Merchants Association, a group which met and debated economic policy with President Conte in July. By presidential decree, Conte granted permission to form the government-sponsored Chamber of Commerce. For the first time since 1958, service organizations, such as the Rotary, are also permitted to hold meetings.

In January, the National Confederation of Guinean Labor (CNTG) held nationwide elections which indicates movement toward a genuinely autonomous labor organization. Each of the nation's 17 trade unions elected its own officers, who in turn elected a CNTG executive board. These elections were reportedly free and fair, as suggested by the considerable turnover in union leadership. Membership in trade unions is now voluntary.

The CNTG, continually short of money, has sought assistance from all fraternal trade union movements. The CNTG maintains relations with recognized regional and international bodies and regularly sends representatives to their meetings. Guinea's delegates to the International Labor Organization (ILO) indicated Guinea's willingness to comply with international labor conventions but noted that progress on the labor scene in Guinea would hinge upon the outcome of the nation's economic recovery and development programs.

A draft of the new labor code guarantees the right to strike, but the code had not yet been promulgated in 1985.

c. Freedom of Religion

Most of the population is Muslim, but some are Christians or animists. Guinea has no official religion but often identifies itself with the Islamic world and is a member of the Islamic Conference. All religions have the right to establish places of worship and maintain links with coreligionists in other countries. The Government, which includes a Ministry of Religious Affairs, has declared both Muslim and Christian holy days as public holidays. It also subsidized Muslim and Christian pilgrimages in 1985.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Occasionally there is petty harassment by police at roadside checkpoints in an effort to augment salaries. All citizens and foreign residents are required to carry identity cards. In early 1985, the Government reinstated the previous government's practice of requiring all foreigners to have a laissez passer for travel into the interior. Although this regulation is still in effect, it is not strictly enforced.

GUINEA

Most of the estimated 1.5 million Guineans who fled overseas during the Sekou Toure era have not yet returned, although free to do so. They appear to be awaiting the results of the economic reform program. Foreign travel involves considerable red tape for the prospective traveler; however, there are no unusual restrictions. Many Guineans with relatives abroad are now free to travel to neighboring countries. Foreigners are subject to passport/visa controls for entry into nor for exit from the country.

Since independence, Guinea has had no democratic tradition, and there has been no provision for political parties or formal opposition to the regime in power. After wholesale cabinet changes and recent adjustments made in the wake of the July 4 coup attempt, Guinea's legislative and executive powers rest in the 17-member Military Committee for National Redress (CMRN), led by President Conte. CMRN members also fill ministerial portfolios. The cabinet, however, was reshuffled on December 22, 1985, with the result that 19 of the 31 ministers are civilians. The CMRN has also appointed officials at the local and intermediate levels of government. Recognizing the potential in the country for ethnic cleavages, the CMRN has attempted to strike a reasonable balance among the major groupings as they are represented in the Government. The CMRN provides some limited avenues of dissent through public meetings in Conakry and by sending its members up country to hold town meetings in the various provincial capitals.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The CMRN has gone out of its way to stress its new approach on human rights, which included, in 1984, a much publicized Amnesty International visit to Guinea. In January 1985, Guinea received an official visitor from the Frankfurt-based International League of Human Rights, who subsequently was quoted as describing the new Government as open-minded and respectful of human rights. Amnesty International, in its 1985 report, details the positive changes that took place in 1984. Freedom House rates Guinea as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guinea's population is approximately 5.6 million (1985) and continues to grow at a rate of at least 2.4 percent per year while food crop production is expanding at a rate of only 1.7 percent annually. Its per capita gross national product reached $300 in 1983. About 80 percent of the labor force is employed in subsistence agriculture. Traders, artisans, government and quasi-government (state enterprises and joint ventures) employees make up the urban labor force. A government-subsidized rationing system has been abolished and commodities, particularly rice and fuel, are being sold at prices approaching free market levels.

Since it assumed power in April 1984, the CMRN has committed itself to a major economic liberalization program. The Government, with the technical assistance of the United Nations, has adopted an Interim National Development Plan for the period 1985-87 to direct limited resources to priority projects which support, among other things, small farmer agriculture. It has also negotiated with the World Bank and the IMF for financial assistance to introduce major fiscal and monetary reforms which will encourage foreign investment and private enterprise. In 1985, President Conte closed the six nationalized banks and announced the establishment of three private banks. A new foreign exchange system more accurately reflecting the value of the local currency was established.

In 1985, the life expectancy at birth was 37.3 years and the infant mortality rate 158 per 1,000 live births. The calorie supply is estimated at 80 percent of requirements. According to 1980 statistics, only 17 percent of the population has access to safe water (69 percent of the urban and only 2 percent of the rural population). The literacy rate is about 20 percent in French. Primary school enrollment of eligible children was 30 percent in 1980 (females 20 percent, males 38 percent). In May, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs created a nonprofit private family planning organization, l'Association Guineenne Pour Le Bien-Etre Familiale, to promote family planning and maternal and child health care.

There is no minimum age for employment. By accepted practice, children under the age of 17 are not usually employed outside the family. An exception is in the area of subsistence agriculture where farming is traditionally a family affair. There is no formal labor code, but one is being drafted. Actual working conditions in Guinea are more a function of the country's level of economic development than of enforcement or nonenforcement of labor statutes.

Women in Guinea enjoy a special status which has grown out of the political role they played in the preindependence period. The Sekou Toure regime stressed the role of women in the economy and society and in Guinea's political life, a legacy which continues under the current Government. The Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare is headed by a woman doctor and contains an active office of women's affairs. The majority of students enrolled in the national college of medicine are women. Market women wield substantial influence, as was demonstrated by the catalytic role they played in changing the economic policies of the Toure regime.

GUINEA-BISSAU

Despite a return to a form of constitutional government in 1984, effective political power in Guinea-Bissau remains concentrated in the hands of the Council of State and President Joao Bernardo Vieira, who currently serves as Head of State, Head of Government, Armed Forces Commander-in-Chief, and Secretary-General of the only legal party, The African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde. The Council of State includes five military men and four former members of the now defunct Revolutionary Council. All Council members are also members of the party's political and/or central committee.

Opposition political activity is not permitted. Under the May 1984 Constitution, the party is "the guiding political force of Guinea-Bissau society and the state." Elections at the district, regional, and national level, such as the 1984 election of the 150-member National Assembly, are controlled by the party. The armed forces remain the dominant element in state security and in the new Constitution are responsible for the maintenance of internal security and public order.

Guinea-Bissau's colonial heritage and statist economic, financial, and commercial policies have severely restricted growth and the exploitation of natural resources. All economic activity is supervised by the Government through a system of state-owned business and commercial entities. There is a small private retail sector. Direct foreign grant assistance is required to cover a large portion of the Government's current operating budget.

The human rights situation in Guinea-Bissau changed little in 1985. The one-party state limits the political freedom of Guinea-Bissauans, and there is little visible civilian opposition to the Government. However, First Vice President Paulo Correia, Secretary of State for Culture and Sports Joao da Silva, and an undetermined number of military personnel were arrested in November for allegedly plotting to overthrow the Government of President Vieira. Efforts to reduce the degree of arbitrariness in the system continued following the return in 1984 to a Constitution which stresses the equality of all citizens before the law, as well as freedom of thought, assembly, association and religion. The integrity of the individual is normally respected, except in cases involving alleged national security offenses. The alleged plotters arrested in November remain imprisoned, with the exception of Secretary of State da Silva, who was reportedly killed while attempting to escape.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

There were no cases of government-ordered or -sanctioned assassinations in 1985, nor were there any terrorist incidents.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of disappearance in 1985.

GUINEA-BISSAU

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reported cases of torture in 1985. The May 1984 Constitution prohibits such treatment. Prison conditions are poor and unsanitary. Interrogation methods are, at times, harsh, involving intimidation and, occasionally, solitary confinement. Medical treatment, medicines, and food for prisoners are in short supply. Military security and police officials are poorly trained. According to some observers, severe beatings routinely accompany arrests.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests in Guinea-Bissau are frequently arbitrary. There is no published civil or criminal code. Habeas corpus (as a carry over from the Portuguese penal code) does exist in practice in urban areas but is not generally observed in rural areas where traditional law prevails. In national security cases, arrests and detentions frequently take place without normal safeguards. Bail procedures do not appear to exist. There were no known cases of government-imposed exile in 1985. The new Constitution, however, does recognize the state's right to expel and extradite Guinea-Bissauan citizens "in some cases." There is no forced or compulsory labor in Guinea-Bissau.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In rural areas, nonpolitical offenders in other than the most important criminal and civil cases are often tried outside the formal court system, under traditional law. The private practice of law is prohibited. Defendants are assigned legal assistance from the Ministry of Justice when available. The judiciary is not independent. Regional military courts have jurisdiction over military, militia, and security personnel on military missions. The civilian court system is essentially a continuation of that which existed under Portuguese colonial rule. The Supreme Court is the highest civilian court of appeal and has jurisdiction over serious crimes, such as acts against state security, attempts against the lives of party members, treason, and piracy. It also serves as an appeals court for the regional military courts. The interval between arrest and trial may be lengthy. The creation of special tribunals is constitutionally prohibited except for military courts established to deal with military offenses. An undetermined number of individuals remain in prison following the November 1985 coup plot arrests and have yet to be tried; and two members of the Government led by President Luis Cabral, which was overthrown in 1980, continue under house arrest.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of domicile, person, and correspondence. These rights are not always respected in the case of serious crimes or matters involving state security, where the observance of legal protections such as the need for search warrants and the definition of who can issue and serve them are considered less important than results. In the absence of an independent judiciary and a published criminal code, there is no established or guaranteed protection against intrusion by the State into the private lives of individuals. International and domestic mail and other forms of communications are considered insecure.

GUINEA-BISSAU

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government owns and controls the information media in Guinea-Bissau. Independent reporting or editorial comment on domestic and international affairs does not exist. There are no independent journals or newspapers. No expression of political opposition to the party or the Government is permitted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All organizations and associations in Guinea-Bissau are integral parts of the State or the party.

The national labor union is a "mass action" organ of the party. It claims 20,000 members. It is forbidden to organize public employees, a prohibition dating from colonial days. Strikes, while not technically illegal, have not occurred, and the vast majority of salaried workers are employees of the State. There are no nongovernmental or nonparty associations affiliated with international bodies. The national union is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no religious discrimination and religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed. The majority of the population is animist, but other religious groups exist and their worship is unimpeded. Conversion is permitted. Religious missions operate secular activities throughout the country. Parochial schools, for example, operate openly. The adherence to a particular faith appears to be neither an advantage nor a disadvantage to individuals in their secular activities. Muslims account for approximately 30 percent of the active religious community, and they are permitted to make pilgrimages to Mecca.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no routine restrictions on movement within the country. Police roadblocks are often on the main highways, and travel is restricted when smuggling of agricultural products is suspected. Guinea-Bissauan nationals and many foreign expatriate workers must obtain exit permits to travel abroad. The principal constraints on foreign travel are economic. There are no known bars to emigration. Since the country's borders are not rigidly controlled, there is a considerable unauthorized cross-border movement. There are no significant refugee groups in Guinea-Bissau. The Government is generally sympathetic to the principle of asylum. Guinea-Bissau is a signatory to the UN Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees. There were no known repatriation problems in 1985.

Guinea-Bissau is governed by a small elite group of party leaders and military authorities, led by President Joao

GUINEA-BISSAU

Bernardo Vieira. The Republic of Guinea-Bissau returned to a form of constitutional government in 1984. The armed forces-dominated Revolutionary Council, which had ruled the country since the 1980 coup d'etat, was abolished. Following legislative elections controlled by the country's only legal political party, the 150 member National Popular Assembly reconvened for the first time since 1980. The Assembly approved a new Constitution, elected General Vieira to a five-year term as President of the Council of State, and chose the other members of that Council. By the terms of the 1984 Constitution, all political activity must take place within the party/state structure. The 1984 electoral slates at the district, regional, and national levels were party-prepared lists. Write-in or opposition candidates were not permitted. The President, members of the Council of State, and National Popular Assembly deputies are elected to five-year terms. There are provisions for revision of the Constitution and national referendums. In rural areas, popular criticism of regional government authorities has forced the Government to replace some officials. No single ethnic group dominates party-government positions. There are no female Ministers, but the President of the National Assembly and the Mayor of Bissau are both women.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Guinea-Bissau has not been active in international or regional human rights bodies, and it has no record of sustained involvement with outside bodies concerned with human rights.

In July 1985, the regional International Committee of the Red Cross delegate visited Guinea-Bissau. Amnesty International in its 1985 Report expressed concern about the house arrest of former political leaders. Freedom House rated Guinea-Bissau as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guinea-Bissau is among the least developed countries in the world. The current population is estimated at 858,000, with a population growth rate of 1.9 percent. The average family size is 5.3 persons. Of a labor force of approximately 450,000, only 25,000 are salaried wage earners. Most of these are civil servants. Per capita gross national product is estimated at $170 a year.

Although the country is extremely fertile, less than one-half of the arable land is currently under cultivation. Guinea-Bissau's principal natural resources include fish, lumber, some minerals and, possibly, petroleum. The economy is dominated by traditional subsistence production of agricultural commodities. The rural and modern sectors operate, to a large extent, independently of one another. Foreign economic assistance to Guinea-Bissau is substantial, averaging $60-80 million annually.

Life expectancy at birth is 38 years, and the infant mortality rate is approximately 137 per 1,000 live births. At most, 10 percent of the population has access to safe water. Eighty-seven percent of the population lives in communal villages (Tabancas), which are the country's basic economic and social unit. The remaining 13 percent of the population is concentrated largely in and around the capital city of Bissau. The Government estimates that there is 1 hospital bed for every 650 inhabitants and 1 doctor per 10,000 inhabitants. Adult literacy is estimated at 19 percent. Primary school enrollment of eligible children is estimated at 55 percent.

The new Constitution is silent on labor issues, including the question of a minimum age for the employment of children. Guinea-Bissau presently has several European technicians, funded by the World Bank, reviewing and updating the laws covering workers' rights inherited from the Portuguese colonial regime. Detailed regulations covering such matters as vacation rights and job-related disabilities are on the books. Enforcement, however, is uneven. Since there are no independent unions, lawyers, or judges, workers must depend completely on the Government to protect their rights.

Official discrimination against women in the modern sector of society does not exist. In the rural sector, however, traditional male-dominant sociological practices prevail. The party and Government actively encourage the participation of women in society, public life, and development. The National Women's Movement, a party organization, is active nationally and women hold some senior government and party positions. By statute, party organizations must have a stated proportion of women office holders.

IVORY COAST

Ivory Coast, a former French colony until independence in 1960, is a civilian one-party state. Power is concentrated in the Democratic Party of Ivory Coast and its long-time leader, President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, now 80 years old. Although the freedom to form other parties is theoretically guaranteed by the Constitution, in practice, no other party has been allowed. More open discussion of government policies has been permitted in the period since the country's first competitive elections in 1980 for local party, municipal, and legislative positions. The unicameral National Assembly has never challenged a policy put forth by the executive branch, however. As provided by law, competitive elections within the Democratic Party (at five-year intervals) were held in late 1985 for municipal offices, the legislature, and the presidency. Houphouet-Boigny was reelected to a sixth 5-year term as President.

The Surete National, the national police service structured along French lines, includes an arm tasked with intelligence gathering and counterespionage responsibilities. It is a part of the Ministry of Internal Security.

Ivory Coast has enjoyed considerable economic development since independence, but poverty still prevails in much of the country. The Ivorian economy is market-oriented and open to foreign investment. It showed steady growth until the beginning of the current decade. Over the last four years, however, Ivory Coast has been squeezed by a heavy debt burden and low prices for its exports on world markets. The austerity measures which the Government has introduced to offset this reduced income have been broadly accepted by key elements of the population. Gross domestic product (GDP) was expected to rise between two and three percent in real terms in 1985. Nonetheless, the quality of government financial management of the economy will continue to be a key determinant of the country's future economic health.

There was no change in the human rights situation in 1985. The President advocates "dialogue" in settling disputes, generally seeking to involve dissenters in the operation of the Ivorian system rather than isolate or imprison them. There are no known political prisoners in Ivory Coast, and there has never been an execution of political opponents. Detainees, especially foreign Africans, are routinely treated roughly by the Surete National and the Gendarmerie upon arrest. Riots directed against foreign Africans occurred in 1985, as on occasion in the past. However, there is no history of violent or repressive action against specific ethnic or religious minorities.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have never been reports of political killings by forces with official sanction.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abduction or disappearance of persons by forces with official sanction.

IVORY COAST

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Ivorian penal code prohibits the use of violence by official means without legitimate justification. The code does not, however, specifically mention or prohibit torture nor does it define what constitutes "legitimate justification" or the level of violence officials may use. There were no reports of torture during 1985, and systematic cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment of persons or prison inmates is not thought to occur. Since the beginning of a state-sponsored anticrime campaign in 1983, some detainees, primarily foreign Africans, have reportedly been denied adequate food and drink, beaten by police, and forced to do menial labor. While foreign Africans are treated more roughly by police than are Ivorian detainees, once offenders are committed to prison there is no evidence of discriminatory treatment of prisoners on the basis of sex, Ivorian ethnic background, race, or type of crime. Prisoners are allowed visits from attorneys of their choice and from family members, who must provide food to supplement the sparse prison diet. Prisons are crowded and conditions poor. Sanitation and medical facilities are limited.

Ivory Coast marked its 25th anniversary of independence on December 7, 1985, by releasing 9,500 of its 13,000 convicted prisoners. Prisoners involved in violent crimes and armed robbery were reportedly not included in the amnesty.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Ivorian Constitution and pertinent statutes prohibit arbitrary arrest or imprisonment. People are not detained, punished, or tried for expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government. However, the Government has occasionally detained a few persons it believes to pose a threat to internal security. It also takes firm nonviolent measures against acts it considers threats to internal security. The Government has used the threat of forced conscription to discourage student involvement in antigovernment activities. Some prominent critics of the Government have chosen to live and write elsewhere; on the other hand, political exiles from a number of countries have found Ivory Coast a hospitable safe haven.

Under the Ivorian penal code, a public prosecutor can detain a suspect for up to 48 hours without bringing charges. The code dictates that further detention must be ordered by a magistrate who can authorize periods of up to four months but must provide the Minister of Justice, on a monthly basis, with a written explanation of why detention should be continued.

There is no forced labor in Ivory Coast.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Ivorian law establishes the right to a fair public trial. This provision is generally respected in urban centers. In rural areas justice is often administered at the village level through traditional institutions. The judiciary is independent of the executive and military. Defendants accused of felonies or capital crimes have the right to legal counsel, and the judicial system provides for court-appointed attorneys for indigent defendants. In practice, however, such attorneys are not readily available. The court of appeals reviews verdicts of civilian courts. Civilians are not tried by military courts. There is no structure of appellate courts within the military justice system. Persons convicted by a military tribunal occasionally request the Supreme Court to set aside the tribunal's verdict and order a retrial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

With few exceptions, all Ivorian citizens are considered to be members of the Democratic Party of Ivory Coast. Party regulations call for active participation in party activities and payment of dues; however, these regulations are not strictly enforced. Ivorians who choose not to participate do not suffer retaliation. It is not known what percentage of the population actively participates in the party. The code of penal procedures specifies that a police official or investigative magistrate may conduct searches of homes without a warrant if he has reason to believe there is evidence concerning a crime on the premises. The official must have the prosecutor's agreement to retain any objects seized in the search. He is required to have witnesses to the search, which may not take place between the hours of 9 p.m. and 4 a.m. Legal safeguards against arbitrary searches are generally respected in the modern parts of cities. In less developed urban sectors and in rural areas, legal safeguards are sometimes ignored. There were scattered reports of forced entry or other violations of the home, specifically involving foreign Africans, during 1985. There is no evidence of monitoring of correspondence and telephone conversations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite Ivory Coast's established one-party state, there is a large measure of freedom of speech. Critics of the Government feel free to, and do, express themselves in informal situations, among Ivorians and foreigners alike, without fear of reprisal. However, some Ivorians do not feel free to express their views openly, and public criticism of basic government policies or of the party and the president rarely occurs. Limits--such as the cancellation of gatherings--are occasionally placed on the expression of controversial views in public forums. As a result of 1982 student disorders, only apolitical gatherings are now permitted on campus, but students still speak freely about politics in informal situations.

The country's one daily newspaper is owned by private interests, but its editorial opinion follows the policies of the country's single political party. The one weekly news magazine is controlled by the party. The Ministry of Information operates a wire service, radio, and television. Government policy assigns the media a positive role in promoting national unity and development. It allows criticism of failures of policy execution but not of the policies themselves. Investigative journalism is permitted except with respect to the Government and its policies. The Government has occasionally banned a critical publication such as Islam and Ivory Coast. In September 1984, the leadership of the party issued an official statement denouncing an antigovernment tract circulating in Abidjan. Foreign publications are readily available, but occasionally issues which are particularly critical of the Ivorian Government, the party, or the President are seized.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is generally respected in Ivory Coast, except when the Government perceives a significant and immediate danger to public order. In such infrequent cases, the Government prohibits meetings and arrests persons disregarding its orders. Such a case occurred on November 22, 1985, when university students, after discussing their grievances with government officials, staged public demonstrations to protest against a drop in scholarship aid. The demonstrators reportedly committed acts of violence, whereupon university officials summoned security forces which arrested approximately 400 students, the vast majority of whom were released shortly thereafter.

The majority of unions are organized and directed by a government-sponsored union confederation, the General Union of Ivory Coast Workers (UGTCI), the leader of which occupies a senior position in the party hierarchy. Membership is encouraged but not mandatory. The UGTCI is a relatively passive coordination mechanism rather than an active campaigner for workers' rights. The right to strike exists in theory, but in practice strikes are rarely authorized. The 1983 secondary teachers' strike was broken by a presidential decree ordering teachers back to the classrooms and threatening them with prison sentences and fines for noncompliance. Generally, the Government negotiates with strikers and resolves at least some of their economic grievances. There have been no reports that professional groups have experienced persecution or harassment. The Government, however, attempts to bring such groups under its wing or that of the party so as to exercise control over their activities. Unions, trade associations, and professional bodies are permitted to maintain relations with recognized international professional bodies in their fields. The UGTCI is a member of the continent-wide organization of African Trade Union Unity.

There are no known impediments to religious expression in Ivory Coast. There is no dominant religion, and no particular faith is favored by the Government. The open practice of religion is permitted, and there are no restrictions on religious ceremonies or teaching. Better paying government and private sector jobs seem to be concentrated among the minority Muslim (25 percent) and Christian (15 percent) populations, a phenomenon attributable more to urbanization and access to education than to a systematic pattern of discrimination.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Ivorian Government exercises minimal control over domestic travel, but internal roadblocks for identity checks are common. Ivorians can travel abroad freely and can emigrate without discrimination. Ivorians have the right of voluntary repatriation. There are no known cases of revocation of citizenship. Ivory Coast's refugee and asylum practices are liberal. The country has resettled or granted safe haven to Angolans, Burkinabe, Eritreans, Ghanaians, Guineans, Liberians, and Vietnamese. While in Ivory Coast, they receive one-year renewable resident visas for their first five years in the country, after which they may apply for permanent resident status. Ivory Coast does not take any significant responsibility for the economic and social welfare of refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political participation in Ivory Coast is limited to the Democratic Party of Ivory Coast, which is headed by President Houphouet-Boigny. No opposition groups exist openly, and their formation is discouraged. Within the party, the President operates through a 10-member executive committee, a 58-member political bureau, and a 206-member steering committee. Political power is concentrated in the President's hands, and most important decisions are made by the President himself. Within this strictly observed one-party system, the Ivorian Government continues to encourage more open participation in the political process by expanding the size of the party institutions noted above and by permitting any citizen to contest legislative, municipal, and local party elections. In the case of the 1985 legislative elections, approximately 577 individuals ran for the 175-seat National Assembly. The party played no role in choosing candidates or administering the elections. Intense competition took place in all three elections in which all citizens were eligible to vote. In the municipal elections, 13 of the 33 incumbent mayors who sought reelection were defeated, and only 60 out of 112 incumbents running were reelected to the National Assembly. Voter participation in these two elections was reported at 45 percent. President Houphouet-Boigny was returned to a sixth term in office in an uncontested race. An important development in 1985 was an amendment to the Ivorian Constitution designating the President of the National Assembly as interim successor to the Chief of State should the latter become incapacitated.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been cooperative toward inquiries into its human rights situation. Ivory Coast has a chapter of Amnesty International. The last inquiry occurred in 1981 and concerned a published report by Amnesty International in Paris that the Government drafted striking television employees into the army as a form of extrajudicial punishment. The Government at first maintained that these men were simply doing their duty as conscripts. Later, the men appeared in uniform on national television and were told they were being returned to civilian life. Amnesty International did not include an entry on the Ivory Coast in its 1985 report. Freedom House terms Ivory Coast "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of the Ivory Coast was estimated at 10.1 million in mid-1985 and is currently growing at an annual rate of 4 percent. Approximately three-fourths of that growth comes from natural increase and the remaining one-fourth from net immigration. Roughly 44 percent of the populace is urban. Per capita gross domestic product (GDP) was $691 in 1985. More than 2 million foreign Africans, some 100,000 Lebanese, and over 30,000 French, along with a small number of other Europeans, North Americans, and Asians live in Ivory Coast.

Ivory Coast's predominately agricultural economy is one of Africa's most prosperous, having grown in real terms at nearly 7 percent annually until 1982. However, three years of recession and negative GDP growth, coupled with government austerity measures (e.g., civil service salary freezes and reduced perquisites), have substantially reduced both purchasing power and the Government's ability to provide services that Ivorians had come to expect. Ivory Coast now seems on the threshold of recovery. In 1985, it had very good harvests in all the important agricultural sectors and enjoyed good international prices for coffee and cocoa crops. The external debt currently stands at nearly 6 billion dollars and will continue to be a constraint on growth through the end of the decade.

A great disparity exists between the standard of living of expatriates and African elites and that of the urban poor and villagers. Nevertheless, there is a sizable and growing urban Ivorian middle class, and village living conditions have steadily improved during Ivory Coast's 25 years as an independent state. The country has constructed an excellent nationwide highway system and nearly all Ivorians have access to motorized transportation.

Life expectancy at birth is 51 years (1985). The current estimate of infant mortality is 121 per 1,000 live births. The World Bank has estimated that 66 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water in 1980 and that the ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirement was 115 in 1985. Ivory Coast has a substantial degree of food self-sufficiency and, although malnutrition sometimes occurs, it is largely due to nutritional ignorance and/or distribution problems rather than an overall lack of food.

The adult literacy rate is 35 percent (1980). Education absorbs some 30-40 percent of the operating budget and is generally available to all children, Ivorian and foreign, boys and girls. At least three years of primary education are offered in all but the smallest villages. Primary school enrollment, as a percentage of children of primary school age, was 76 percent in 1981-1983. Health care, by contrast, absorbs only 7 percent of the budget and is less widely distributed than educational services. There is no primary health care system in place. Health facilities tend to emphasize curative rather than preventive medicine, and most health care professionals are based in urban areas where access to their services is determined largely by the demands of the market.

Ivory Coast is a signatory to and seeks to abide by the U.N. conventions on workers' rights and conditions of employment. Minimum wage levels and a minimum working age of 16 years of age have been established by the Government. The Government enforces a comprehensive code of law, code du travail, governing the terms and conditions of service for salaried workers and providing for occupational safety and health standards. Extensive safeguards protect against unjust compensation, excessive hours, and capricious discharge from one's position. Month-long paid vacations and a substantial severance pay are guaranteed. Government medical insurance and retirement programs provide an element of income security for salaried employees in the modern sector. Urban workers in the informal sector and rural workers find conditions quite different, and occupational regulations may be underenforced. The Government's policy of Ivorianization requires that all positions be offered to Ivorians before foreigners; this keeps foreign Africans from most wage and salary jobs in the modern sector.

Although males clearly play the preponderant role overall, some Ivorian traditional societies accord women considerable political and economic power. In rural areas tribal customs dictate the division of tasks and these sometimes fall heavily on women. Female circumcision continues to be practiced among elements of the Ivorian population, although it is rare in urban populations. Official party policy is to encourage full participation by women in social, economic, and political life. The Ministry of Women's Affairs was established in 1976 for this purpose but recently has remained without a minister for an extended period. Women remain lightly represented at the higher levels of government and the party. Ten women are in the 175-seat National Assembly and 28 women in the 202-member Democratic Party's steering committee.

KENYA

Kenya has been a single party state since 1982, and the President, Daniel Arap Moi, exercises firm control over both the Government and the party, the Kenyan African National Union (KANU). The role of the party was enhanced in 1985 with local and national party elections, the third such elections since independence. There was government pressure to force rank and file citizens to join the party during the voter registration drive. As of January 1, 1985, all Kenyan civil servants are required to be party members. However, neither KANU nor the National Assembly have significant impact on policy initiation.

Despite the one-party system there is still considerable competition for parliamentary seats. In the September 1983 parliamentary elections, over 900 candidates competed for 158 seats. While the large majority of parliamentary and party elections are free and fair, reportedly there was government interference in 1985 party elections in a few sensitive cases to ensure that only State House-approved candidates won. People who have been expelled from the party (15 during 1984) are ineligible for public office. Others have voluntarily stepped down in order to facilitate the election of candidates more favored by State House.

Kenya's economy has largely recovered from the 1984 drought, although growth in the gross national product (GNP) in 1985 barely kept pace with the population growth. With population expanding at over 4 percent a year, unemployment continuing to rise (400,000 job seekers after at best 20,000 new jobs in the wage economy each year), declining per capita income, inefficient subsidized public corporations, and an increasingly difficult budget situation, Kenya's economic problems are not likely to be resolved in the near term, although the Government has begun to take appropriate steps.

There was no basic change in the human rights situation in Kenya in 1985 from 1984. As in the previous year, there was a serious border incident involving nomadic tribesmen. Two persons are still held under the Public Security Act which includes provisions superceding constitutional safeguards. The judiciary showed significant independence in handling several student cases.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Kenya does not sanction or practice unlawful or arbitrary deprivation of life, and there were no reports of political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

The Government does not sanction or carry out secret arrests or abductions.

KENYA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is specifically forbidden under the Kenyan Constitution. Nevertheless, there are reports that police have used torture and that security forces in Northeast Province have tortured local citizens (mostly Somali ethnics). Most allegations of torture are investigated by the Government, and several police and military officials have been jailed or sacked for torturing suspects or prisoners. Police also often use excessive force in apprehending criminals and numerous suspects have been killed while attempting to flee the scene of a crime. Many Members of Parliament have questioned the authority of the police to "shoot to kill," and the topic has led to lively discussions both within the Government and in the National Assembly.

Military forces have also been criticized for "overreaction" to incidents in border areas. In February 1985, the Kenyan military used helicopter gunships to kill at least 50 Ethiopians who had reportedly massacred 42 Kenyan women and children while rustling cattle in Marsabit district. This district routinely is troubled by cross-border raids and incidental attacks on civilians by nomadic tribes inhabiting both sides of the border. No attempt was made to apprehend or question the suspects. Although military officers spoke freely about the incident, the Government never publicly acknowledged it.

In 1982, the Moi Government began to utilize the Preservation of Public Security Act, which includes provisions superceding constitutional safeguards. Persons formally held under the Act are kept in solitary confinement, where they are allowed almost no contact with the outside world, including their attorneys and families.

Prison conditions are poor, and Amnesty International has expressed concern over the treatment of detainees. In June 1985, a former Member of Parliament, held in conjunction with the murder of his successor, died in prison of a heart attack after allegedly being refused his prescribed medication.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Preservation of Public Security Act empowers the State to detain or otherwise control individuals without trial or other reference to the judiciary for an unlimited period. Since resuming the practice of detention without charge in 1982, the Government has formally detained or restricted 13 persons under the Act. Ten uncharged detainees were released in 1983 and 1984 and one in 1985. Those remaining in detention without being charged are a journalist and Ralli Odinga, the son of Kenya's former Vice President, Oginga Odinga.

Other Kenyans have been held, usually for short periods, without being formally detained. Approximately 60 soldiers and airmen have been held since the 1982 coup attempt, and several others implicated in an alleged coup plot in early 1985. Subject to military jurisdiction, none of them has been charged with any crime.

Double jeopardy is not unknown in Kenya. In December 1984, a prominent businessman was arrested and charged with a crime allegedly committed in 1976. The case was dropped by the Attorney General in 1976, and the dropping charge was confirmed by his successor in 1981. The case was reopened even though no additional evidence was produced. Although a constitutional court convened by the Chief Justice in 1985 ruled that continuation of the case would be "vexatious and harassing, an abuse of the process of the court, and contrary to public policy," the current Attorney General continues the prosecution.

KENYA

However, aside from detention cases under the Public Security Act and the unprecedented circumstances created by the attempted coup in August 1982, habeas corpus has generally been available in Kenya. Kenyan law requires that persons charged with crimes be brought biweekly before judicial authorities in public court to ensure that investigations are carried out in a timely manner and that prisoners are not mistreated. The degree of compliance with the biweekly review requirement seems to vary with the diligence of the individual senior resident magistrate responsible for ensuring that these procedures are followed. Detainees' cases are reviewed every 6 months by a Confidential Detainees Review Tribunal.

Kenya does not practice forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary usually exhibits considerable independence. The major exception is in cases involving detention under the Preservation of Public Security Act, where its authority is limited to ensuring compliance with procedural provisions. Aside from these security cases, the right to a fair public trial is usually observed in Kenya. Civilians are tried in civilian courts, and verdicts may be appealed to the Kenyan High Court. The High Court is susceptible to executive pressure since justices are appointed and dismissed solely at the pleasure of the President.

Military personnel are tried by military courts and verdicts may be appealed. Judge Advocates are appointed on a case by case basis by the Chief Justice. Most sentences meted out as a result of the August 1982 coup attempt have either been reduced or suspended. However, the 12 coup leaders convicted of treason, whose appeals were rejected, were reportedly executed in July 1985. Members of the press regularly attend and report on court proceedings whether civilian or military.

The major judicial event in 1985 was the arrest and trial of students involved in demonstrations leading to the closure of the University of Nairobi's main campus for several months. Five students were charged in March 1985 with participating in an illegal assembly and failure to obey an order to disperse. The senior resident magistrate hearing the case jailed one defendant for 1 year, fined three $330 each, and acquitted the fifth.

In another case, 14 students were convicted of stealing a university vehicle and sentenced to 6 months in prison, but the High Court upheld their appeals and called the initial trial "arbitrary and unlawful." The students were released and permitted to return to their studies in October.

KENYA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Security officials sometimes conduct unwarranted or illegal searches to seize allegedly stolen property or apprehend suspected criminals. In early 1985, after the murder of a European couple in the Nairobi suburb of Karen, general service units conducted house-to-house searches and illegally confiscated personal property which they claimed must have been stolen since the owners "could not afford it."

Correspondence with prisoners is monitored, censored, and frequently not delivered. Security officials are invariably present when prisoners or detainees consult with family members or attorneys. Reportedly, security forces occasionally employ surveillance techniques and electronic invasion of the home.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including.

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and freedom of the press are proclaimed in the Constitution. In practice, however, these freedoms have been narrowly interpreted by Kenyan authorities (e.g., Parliament is not permitted to discuss "foreign affairs"). The existence and use of the detention provisions of the Preservation of Public Security Act inhibit public exchange of views on political subjects. Kenya has no formal censorship of the local press, but pressure--including the firing of journalists--has been brought to bear on journalists and publications not to stray too far from the government line. Additionally, government officials regularly caution editors against printing information which they wish withheld from the public, and editors usually oblige. The press can and does report unflattering news about government officials, but never about the President and only rarely about other leaders considered to be "off limits." Government policies are rarely criticized.

The Government also discourages students and faculty from political activism. Kenya's institutions of higher education have been closed on repeated occasions. The main campus of the University of Nairobi only reopened after students were required to refrain from any political activity. Shortly thereafter, three university lecturers and a primary school teacher and his wife were arrested and charged with sedition. Kenyan leaders regularly harangue lecturers for disloyalty and for preaching tribalism.

Kenya has a 30 member film censorship board under the auspices of the Ministry of Culture and Social Services. The Board must approve all films shown in Kenya, but a wide variety of uncut foreign films is regularly available. A 10 member television censorship board has established precepts which govern what can be shown on television.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Kenyan Constitution formally sanctions freedom of assembly and association, these rights are sometimes limited by the Public Order and Police Act, which gives local administrative authorities wide powers to control public gatherings. It is illegal to convene an unlicensed meeting, and politicians have been arrested or investigated for violations of this statute. Nonetheless, licenses for public meetings are rarely denied, and then usually on the grounds that the proposed meeting might generate civil disorder. The Government has occasionally prevented political, religious, and social meetings under the Societies Act.

Excepting civil servants, forced membership in political organizations is not officially required. Nevertheless, many Kenyans complained of harassment and intimidation during the KANU party recruitment drive from January to June 1985. Security forces routinely arrested on false charges those who could not produce a party membership card, and one district commissioner directed that party membership was a prerequisite to any economic activity in his district. Another refused to grant interviews to nonparty members. The Government and the party both repudiated the coercion, but intimidation continued.

Kenya has a relatively free trade union movement. Its single trade union confederation, the Central Organization of Trade Unions, is affiliated with the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. Complex labor legislation renders virtually all strikes illegal. Strikes are permitted only if the Ministry of Labor has not taken action toward resolution within 21 days after the formal declaration of dispute. Wildcat strikes of no more than 1 to 2 days are quite common. Most disputes, however, are settled by the parties concerned. Kenya's dispute mechanism is centered in the Industrial Relations Court, founded in 1964, which has a high reputation for fairness and impartiality. All Kenyan wage earners are subject to government regulations limiting wage increases. Nevertheless, some unions have had notable success in obtaining salary adjustments for union members by filing litigation before the Industrial Court. Some unions have also obtained significant additional worker benefits, such as expanded health insurance coverage and increased housing allowances. All collective agreements must be approved by the Industrial Court before they can take effect. The Industrial Court has become the model for several other such labor courts in Africa.

In August 1980, the Government formally disbanded the Kenyan Civil Servants Union (at that time Kenya's largest union) because of its alleged political activities. The Public Service International has continued to press for a genuine civil servants' union, given Kenya's membership in the International Labor Organization and signature to the Convention on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining. In September 1985, a "civil servants association" was formed with presidential permission, but labor observers claim that it is not a legitimate labor union.

All permanent workers engaged by an enterprise employing at least seven persons may be organized into trade unions. Approximately 75 percent of all such enterprise employees are unionized, and about half (300,000) pay voluntary union dues. Unions actually represent a greater number in collective bargaining because nonunion workers are also covered by collective agreements negotiated for their respective enterprise. Agreements are usually valid for 2 years. A few professional voluntary organizations, such as the Law Society of Kenya (i.e., the Kenyan Bar Association), exist, but such associations do not conduct themselves as trade unions.

KENYA

c. Freedom of Religion

A wide range of religious freedoms exists in Kenya, and freedom of worship is protected by the Constitution. The Government has often criticized church officials for meddling in politics and has refused to register religious societies and groups which it believes may pursue activities harmful to society. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) has tried for the past 4 years without success to obtain registration under the Societies Act. However, the Government has not registered any other churches during that period, and it has not interfered with Mormon meetings. In 1985, the Government also started to deregister "sects" which it considers prejudicial to public security. For example, the African Gospel Church of God was deregistered on August 23, 1985, after 25 years of activity in Kenya.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel within Kenya is restricted only by provisions of the Preservation of Public Security Act, which limits movement within Kenya of persons considered to be a danger to public security. These provisions are only rarely implemented.

Following the August 1, 1982, coup attempt, the Kenyan Government expanded bureaucratic requirements necessary for travel abroad. These additional hurdles have had a negative impact upon study and research opportunities for Kenyan university students and faculty. Kenya does not formally prohibit emigration of its nationals. In rare cases influential or controversial Kenyans have had their passports confiscated by the Government, thus preventing them from traveling abroad.

Although Kenya suffers from high and increasing unemployment, it continues to accept refugees. During 1985, Kenya's refugee population increased by approximately 15 percent to about 8,500 documented resident refugees. Of these, over 90 percent are Ethiopian, Ugandan, or Rwandan. In addition to those individuals who obtained official refugee status, between 3,000 and 10,000 additional persons have taken refuge in Kenya unofficially. The renewed fighting in Uganda produced new refugee flows from Uganda at the beginning of 1986.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Chief of State, President Moi, supported by a small group of advisors, controls all major aspects of policy-making and has increasingly consolidated political power, especially since the attempted coup of August 1, 1982. Kenya became a de jure one-party State on June 9, 1982, but a wide range of candidates and views is generally permitted. In 1983, the Kenyan electorate rejected approximately 35 percent of Kenya's incumbent parliamentarians, including 5 Ministers and 18 Assistant Ministers. Within the one-party system, the number of candidates for a particular public office is frequently a half dozen or more, and in the September 1983 general elections up to 15 candidates ran for a single parliamentary seat. Of the 995 persons who applied for party clearance to run for Parliament, 992 were granted permission to stand for election. Of these, roughly 700 ultimately had their names placed on the ballot. A small number of elections in sensitive districts reportedly were rigged to ensure that government-favored candidates won. Individual local government officials also allegedly have accepted bribes to influence a favorable outcome for certain candidates.

In Kenya's post-independence history neither the President nor the Vice President has ever faced an opposing candidate. The Kenyan Government encourages but does not coerce the electorate to vote. Turnout has generally averaged between 60 and 70 percent of the electorate, but this figure fell to 42 percent in 1983. Participation in the 1985 party elections was also relatively low.

President Moi has expanded ethnic representation in the Government and the party. Members of all ethnic groups are permitted to run for office, and Kenya has one white Parliamentarian who was reelected in a constituency that is 99 percent black African, despite the presence of several black African candidates on the ballot. Twelve persons from different ethnic groups hold cabinet portfolios in the Government, including the first ethnic Somali ever appointed to Ministerial rank in Kenya. Sixteen groups are represented among the 43 assistant ministers in the Government.

Only one female candidate was elected to Kenya's National Assembly in 1983, although several others ran for seats. Over 20 female candidates were elected to municipal office. President Moi subsequently appointed two women to Kenya's National Assembly as nominated members (the Kenyan Constitution provides for 12 such presidential appointments). In August 1985, one of the women resigned her nomination and contested and won a by-election in her constituency.

The range of permissible discussion of, and opposition to, government policies has been fairly broad within the National Assembly. However, discussion is increasingly focused on local subjects, and there is no criticism of the President or any policies which he initiates or supports. The formal detention in August 1982 of Koigi Wa Wamwere, a sitting member of Parliament who was repeatedly critical of major government policies, exemplified government sanction against critics.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Kenya is sensitive to criticism of human rights conditions. Various human rights organizations, including Amnesty International, have conducted extensive letter-writing campaigns to the Government with respect to Kenya's resort to the use of formal detention. Although the Government released 11 persons held under the Public Security Act between October 1983 and September 1985, Government officials have emphatically rejected the notion that foreign pressure had anything to do with the releases. President Moi has publicly criticized Amnesty International for "meddling" in Kenyan internal affairs.

Although there are several Kenyan organizations which address certain aspects of human rights issues, there is no group which focuses exclusively on human rights concerns in Kenya. Kenya has neither signed nor ratified the Organization of African Unity's Human Rights Charter which was adopted at that organization's July 1981 Summit in Nairobi. Kenya hosted the U.N. End of Decade for Women Conference in 1985.

KENYA

In its 1985 report, Amnesty International noted the release in 1984 of five prisoners of conscience and expressed concern about the continued imprisonment of other political prisoners held without trial since 1982. Freedom House rates Kenya "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Kenya's population of 20.3 million will double by the year 2000 given an annual population growth rate of 4.1 percent--the highest in the world. Real growth in per capita gross national product ($340 in 1983) has been uneven over the last several years. Kenya has had one of the most dynamic and successful economies in Africa with a highly developed private sector and, in most years, self-sufficiency in food. The Kenyan Government has taken action to improve the country's health care, education, and general standard of living, but recent economic difficulties, including an unprecedented drought in 1984, retarded progress in these areas. While good rains in 1985 substantially improved crop harvests, bills due for food purchases, payment to the (International Monetary Fund), and uncertain prices for coffee and tea (the two main foreign exchange earners) cloud the outlook for 1986. Also, the Government, despite praise for the private sector, still relies heavily on inefficient, subsidized public corporations, which control major commodity prices and distribution.

Approximately 80 percent of all Kenyans live in rural areas, and most are involved in subsistence agriculture. Only 1.1 million people (out of the 7.4 million estimated to be in the work force) are in the formal sector, i.e., the wage economy, and 50 percent of those are government employees. Kenya's work force in the year 2000 will number approximately 14.6 million, putting even greater strain on the country's society and economy. About 10 percent of the urban population and 55 percent of the rural population was estimated in 1978 to live below the poverty level.

The minimum age for the employment of children in Kenya is 16. However, with the majority of Kenyans employed in the informal sector, the law is unenforceable. Kenya has adequate legislation to provide for acceptable conditions of work and occupational safety and health, but the Government is unable to ensure compliance due to a shortage of qualified inspectors. The minimum wage is established by the Government and reviewed periodically.

Women constitute an essential factor in Kenya's labor equation. They still provide about three-quarters of Kenya's farm labor, while carrying out their traditional familial responsibilities at the same time. Because of an accelerating rural migration of males to the cities in search of hard-to-find but higher paying jobs, female farm labor is likely to maintain its prominent position. Most of Kenya's tribes still practice female circumcision. The Kenyan Government, however, has made a major effort to eliminate the practice. President Moi has publicly and repeatedly condemned female circumcision, and the Ministry of Health has forbidden such operations to be performed in government facilities. The Kenya Government's commitment to women's rights was shown by its hosting of the U.N. End of Decade Conference.

Education is given a high budgetary priority, and this is reflected in a primary school enrollment ratio (1982) of 125 percent (This ratio is more than 100 percent because overage children are included in the enrollment statistics.) However, secondary school enrollment rates drop sharply: of all students between ages 15 and 19, only 25 percent of males and 15 percent of females are enrolled in secondary school. About 2 percent of Kenya's college age population is enrolled in institutions of higher education, and of these students only 25 percent are female.

The infant mortality rate has steadily declined from 150 per 1,000 live births in 1960, to 83 in 1977, and now stands at 59. Life expectancy has risen steadily from 42.5 years in 1960 to 58.5 years in 1985. Although the most recent data available (1980) indicate that 85 percent of Kenya's city dwellers have access to clean water, only 15 percent of the rural population has regular access to safe water. Last available data (1977) on caloric consumption indicate that 94 percent of Kenya's minimal nutritional requirements are met.

Another looming economic and social problem concerns Kenya's 65,000 member Asian community which directly accounts for approximately one-fourth of Kenya's total economic output. African resentment of Asians, primarily because of their extensive business holdings, has intensified in direct proportion to Kenya's current economic decline. Kenya's Africanization campaign to encourage black African participation in commercial interests has resulted in some Asian emigration and disinvestment and has prompted concern within the community for the security of Asian ownership.

Kenya also amended its citizenship law in 1984 depriving many Asians and Europeans of Kenyan nationality. Under the current law, people born in Kenya of non-Kenyan parents can no longer claim Kenyan citizenship. Several such persons have been refused passports and work permits.

LESOTHO

Lesotho is nominally a constitutional monarchy under King Moshoeshoe II, but in fact almost all political power is held by Prime Minister Leabua Jonathan and his ruling Basotho National Party (BNP). In 1970, Jonathan suspended the Constitution, which provided for parliamentary democracy, and declared the results of that year's election null and void. The Government contended that traditional democratic practices were preserved in the ensuing period through the holding of public meetings known as "pitsos," but dissent is rarely aired at these government-orchestrated gatherings. In 1985 Lesotho scheduled its first elections in 15 years. Although a number of opposition parties had indicated their intent to field candidates, in the end they did not participate, alleging general intimidation of opposition leaders and supporters, and electoral malpractices. Only Jonathan's BNP candidates fulfilled the requirements for election to the National Assembly. The BNP candidates, in accordance with Lesotho law, were then declared elected (unopposed) on September 17, 1985.

Sporadic violence occurred during 1985, partly as a result of clashes between the security forces and groups opposed to the South African regime, and partly in connection with political opposition to the regime. The Government cited trouble with the African National Congress (ANC) and the Pan-African Congress (PAC), but especially the threat of and occasional attacks by the outlawed Lesotho Liberation Army (an offshoot of the opposition Basutoland Congress Party) as justification for the recent strengthening of security laws. The heightened security posture and undisciplined and poorly trained police and military forces contributed to human rights abuses. There are unsubstantiated reports that a "death squad" operates within the Lesotho Paramilitary Force (the army), with the aim of eliminating political opponents of the regime. Death threats have been recorded against both supporters and opponents of the regime. Some elements of the Basotho Youth League, an arm of the ruling BNP, have weapons and intimidate political opponents.

Lesotho is a developing country with a free market economy based primarily on subsistence agriculture. The economy is highly dependent on remittances by Lesotho citizens engaged in migrant labor in South Africa; these remittances amount to almost 50 percent of Lesotho's gross national product. The Government is likewise dependent on revenue generated by the South African Customs Union, which accounts for some 70 percent of government revenue. The economy rebounded somewhat in 1985 after several years of poor performance, caused partly by the lingering drought in the southern Africa region.

The Human Rights Act of 1983, technically guaranteeing many fundamental human rights, came into force in July 1984. However, the Act is subordinate to the provisions of existing law which include temporary detention without trial and other restrictions on human rights. The Parliament passed a new internal security bill in 1984 which codifies existing security laws, removes bail in cases of armed robbery, increases minimum sentences for certain security offenses, and allows for the detention of witnesses in security cases. While the courts have not hesitated to rule against the Government in security cases, potential for mistreatment of prisoners prior to trial remains high. Mistreatment of those detained for purely criminal offenses also occurs.

LESOTHO

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Sporadic incidents of violence occurred throughout 1985 on several fronts. Several clashes took place between Lesotho security forces and members of the African National Congress (ANC) and the Pan-African Congress (PAC). The latter groups are dedicated to the overthrow of the South African Government, and some members of the groups have taken refuge in Lesotho. Events in late 1985 suggested that the outlawed Lesotho Liberation Army (LLA) is stepping up terrorist activities in Lesotho. Several deaths also occurred during the 1985 election campaign.

In March, six members of the PAC were killed by a Lesotho security patrol near the South African border. Shortly thereafter, a member of the Lesotho paramilitary force (LPF) was killed by an ANC member, and the house of an ANC member was attacked in Maseru. In May, an explosion took the life of a South African refugee at his house in Maseru. The victim was believed to belong to the ANC and may have accidentally blown himself up while making a bomb.

In August, the Government announced that the LLA had launched an attack on the home of a BNP Parliamentary candidate, killing four women and two children. The Government protested this attack strongly to the Government of South Africa, which had previously permitted an opposition spokesman to use the South African broadcasting system to threaten violent attacks against Lesotho. An elderly member of the ruling BNP, who was expected to run for a seat in Parliament, was killed and his daughter wounded in an attack on his home outside Maseru. That incident remains under investigation, but to date there is no indication of the responsible parties.

On October 6, mortar rounds were fired into the west end of the capital of Maseru, allegedly from South African territory. There were no casualties. Shortly thereafter, the Government reported that its security forces had captured a South African-trained terrorist and killed two more. On October 23, six women died in a blaze set by armed men. A neighbor who came to investigate was also shot to death. At least two of the women had previous ties with progovernment groups. On November 1, a Maseru-dateline radio broadcast reported that three BNP supporters, a chief and his wife and child, were killed in an LLA raid that was launched from South Africa. Finally, on December 9 Prime Minister Jonathan blamed the LLA for the murder of seven Basotho the previous week; he said the terrorists were seen crossing back into South Africa.

In most of these incidents, the Lesotho Government protests vehemently to Pretoria, alleging that the South African Government knows of these specific attacks beforehand and that South Africa generally provides training, refuge, and support to the LLA insurgents. South Africa denies the charges that it is involved in the incidents and countercharges that Lesotho harbors groups which perpetrate violence against South Africa. In December, South Africa increased its warnings about ANC presence and activities in Lesotho. On the night of December 19, nine persons, including South African refugees whom the ANC claimed as its members, were assassinated in Maseru. The Lesotho Government blamed South Africa for the killings, but that Government denied any responsibility.

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Allegations of beatings by police and military personnel continue to be reported but are difficult to document. According to Amnesty International's 1985 Report, at least one state witness in a 1984 trial reportedly testified that he had been blindfolded and severely beaten by police until he "confessed" to membership in the LLA. Such abuse generally takes place during the arrest and interrogation phases, and it appears to extend to cases related to national security as well as to common crimes. Detention facilities are very poor. In view of Lesotho's limited resources, it is unlikely that any major improvements can be expected. Prisoners who can afford lawyers (and are thus more likely to file lawsuits charging abuses) usually receive better treatment. In late 1984, the high court awarded about $5,500 in compensation to a chief who sued the Government for illegal arrest, detention, and torture at the hands of the police in November 1982, illustrating that civil remedies are possible for those complaining of human rights abuses.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Habeas corpus applies to all arrests except those involving persons detained under the Internal Security (General) Act of 1982. This Act provides for preventive detention without charge or trial for up to 42 days and for holding detainees incommunicado for part of that time. During the second stage of the detention, ministerially appointed "advisors"--thus far all employees of the Government--report on the health of the detainee, investigate whether the detainee has been involved in subversive activities, and advise the Minister on the need for continued detention. Detainees may make representations on their own treatment only through the advisors. The Internal Security (General) Act, as amended in 1984, disallows bail in cases of armed robbery and allows for detention of witnesses in security cases.

In 1985, observers indicated that there might be as many as 100 to 200 persons in custody of one sort or another as a result of alleged political crimes. At least one political detainee, Daniel Moeketsi, died in detention in 1984 according to Amnesty International.

There is no forced labor practiced in Lesotho.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary in Lesotho is independent and has acted to limit police and military infringements of law and procedure on a number of occasions (see example in 1c). However, the Government abruptly notified the Chief Justice, a man known for his efforts on behalf of justice and civil rights, that his recently renewed contract would instead be terminated as of April 1986. Court decisions and rulings are respected and obeyed by the authorities. Accused persons have the right to counsel. Civil suits alleging maltreatment are accepted and adjudicated. Verdicts of Civil Courts may be appealed to the High Court. In military cases, decisions may be appealed to more senior officers, including the Lesotho army commander, but not to civilian courts. Under the system of Roman-Dutch law applied in Lesotho, there is no trial by jury.

Traditional courts do exist, largely in rural areas, but their influence is declining, and they generally handle only family disputes and cases of violation of custom.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

These rights are generally respected in Lesotho, although under the Internal Security Acts of 1982 and 1984 the police have wide powers to stop and search and to enter homes or other places without a warrant. There have been credible allegations of forced entry into the home, but these are quite likely the result of indiscipline.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Human Rights Act of 1983 provides for freedom of expression but subordinates this freedom to the protection of national security. In practice, opposition viewpoints are expressed freely only in two Lesotho-language weekly newspapers published by the Roman Catholic and Evangelical churches. In 1984, criticism centered on the delay in elections, intimidation of opposition candidates, the Government's format for elections, and the tardy announcement of the voter registration lists. This criticism has been tolerated but, at the same time, attacked strongly by Lesotho's sole radio station which is government-owned and also by a government-published weekly newspaper. The Government has also rebutted articles and viewpoints on Lesotho in the South African media which are widely available in Lesotho. A private daily, The Nation, which was temporarily a vehicle for a variety of political opinions, closed for lack of financial backing after printing 46 issues. As elections approached, Radio Lesotho sharply stepped up its attacks on opposition parties and politicians, depicting them variously as irrelevant groups lacking support, political has-beens, or agents of the South African Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Opposition political parties (with the exception of the Communist Party) are permitted, and two new parties were established in 1985. Permits are required for public and private meetings. Groups wishing to hold political rallies or organized sessions sometimes encounter difficulties in the form of denial or delays in the issuance of permits or of investigatory arrests of attendees. Police are normally in attendance at such meetings. During the electoral campaign in 1985, opposition parties complained of harassment and threats, particularly from the newly formed National Youth Service, which serves as a police auxiliary, and from the Basotho Youth League, an arm of the ruling BNP. These groups are widely reported to be armed.

All trade unions in Lesotho enjoy the right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike. However, trade unionism has played a relatively minor role in society, largely because of the small size of the modern manufacturing, retail, and service sectors. In 1984, the Government intervened to help form a single trade union confederation after negotiations for the merger of the two existing confederations broke down. Although there is still some opposition to the new confederation, named the Lesotho Congress of Free Trade Unions (LCFTU), 24 of Lesotho's 28 trade unions participated in the LCFTU's first convention in May 1985 and elected the existing leadership to 3-year terms. The LCFTU has rewritten Lesotho's badly outdated labor laws and expects to submit to Parliament later this year the draft agreed to by the Employers' Federation and the Government.

Union, government, and employer representatives have participated in delegations to the International Labor Organization and other foreign trade union organizations. Lesotho has hosted meetings of the labor arm of the Southern African Development Coordinating Conference and the international mineworkers. The LCFTU is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, as well as of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

There is no state religion in Lesotho. Free and open religious practice is permitted. Christianity is the dominant faith of the majority of Basotho, with the principal denomination being Roman Catholic. There is a significant Protestant minority as well, which is composed of the Lesotho Evangelical Church (Presbyterian), the Anglican Church, and a wide variety of other denominations. Conversion is permitted, and there is no indication that there is any social or political benefit attached to belonging to any particular sect.

The Government has been critical of church groups and leaders, accusing them of conspiring with opposition political factions which support violence, and has harassed prayer meetings calling for national reconciliation. Prominent church leaders have been among those who have received death threats.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement within the country is not restricted, although the police and the military sometimes set up temporary roadblocks to check insurgent activity. There is no legal restraint on emigration, but overseas travel is made more difficult by the sizable repatriation deposit required of passport applicants. Many citizens of Lesotho perform migrant labor in South Africa's mining and other industries.

Several thousand refugees from South Africa reside in Lesotho. They are generally free to move about the country although the Government imposes restrictions on their political activities as a condition of entry. Until recently, government policy has been to integrate refugees into the mainstream of Lesotho society to the extent possible. However, since the South African raid against refugees in Maseru in 1982, and in light of continuing pressure from South Africa, Lesotho has, in practice, become primarily a country of transit for refugees. Although Lesotho is a signatory of the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, refugees who leave Lesotho on U.N. travel documents issued by Lesotho are sometimes not granted the right to return. A number of political exiles from Lesotho are resident in neighboring countries, notably Botswana and South Africa. The 1980 Amnesty Act allows political exiles to return after signing statements concerning any criminal acts they may have committed, but few have done so.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

Prime Minister Jonathan and the leadership of his Basotho National Party have ruled Lesotho since 1965, and, after voiding the results of the first postindependence elections in 1970, did not permit new elections until 1985—15 years later. The 1985 elections were marked by a series of opposition complaints, first over electoral procedures, and then over allegations of harassment at meetings and rallies and over death threats to some leaders. The leader of the Marematlo Freedom Party filed an urgent petition with the High Court requesting a ruling to delay the election date, but the suit was dismissed on August 13. As a result, all the opposition parties agreed not to participate in the election. On nomination day, the candidates of the ruling BNP from each of the 60 constituencies were unopposed and were therefore declared elected on September 17, 1985. In view of the opposition boycott of the elections, it has been difficult to assess the true level of support for any of Lesotho's political parties. The leaders of 4 of the opposition parties were among a list of 20 persons nominated by the King to be members of the National Assembly, but according to a recent report, all 4 had declined.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In past years, representatives of Amnesty International who have visited Lesotho to investigate human rights conditions have met with government officials and have been given access to some security detainees who complained of abusive treatment. In general, the Government has attributed alleged human rights violations to an excess of zeal or indiscipline by low-level police or military officials. The Government maintains that any abuses are not sanctioned by government policy and has pointed out that judicial remedies for alleged abuses are available in the courts. As indicated in its 1985 Report, Amnesty International remains concerned about detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government and about deaths of prisoners while in custody. In 1985, Amnesty International brought to the attention of the Government of Lesotho reports it had received that death threats had been made against 14 named Basotho. As reported over Radio Lesotho, the Government said it was not knowledgeable about such threats but condemned such action and promised to punish the guilty parties if they are found. Freedom House rated Lesotho "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Lesotho's population is estimated at 1,512,000, with an annual growth rate of 2.6 per cent. Designated by the United Nations as "one of the least developed countries," Lesotho had a per capita gross national product of $460 in 1983. Lesotho's economic plight is complicated by its lack of natural resources, its mountainous terrain, and low rainfall. Development of water resources, including potential hydropower, appears the best long-term prospect for economic development.

LESOTHO

Lesotho's economy is closely tied to South Africa's economy. Remittances from migrant workers in the Republic of South Africa are of crucial importance since over 90 percent of the country's imports come from South Africa. Lesotho is a member of the Customs Union Agreement between the Governments of Lesotho, Botswana, South Africa, and Swaziland, and is a member of the Rand Monetary Area. Customs Union receipts in recent years have averaged about 70 percent of total government revenues. These funds, coupled with donor support programs, have managed to prop up a weak economy. Only about 10 percent of the labor force in Lesotho is employed outside traditional agriculture. The prospect of better paying jobs has attracted the best of the Lesotho labor force to South Africa, including the homelands, at the expense of local development.

Life expectancy was estimated at 54 years in 1985, and the infant mortality rate was 98 per 1,000 live births. Nutritional standards are barely adequate, with the ratio of caloric supply available for consumption to nutritional requirements estimated in 1977 to be 102 percent. Drought conditions over the last few years, however, have hit some areas hard, and cases of malnutrition have been reported. In 1975, only 17 per cent of the population was estimated to have access to safe water. A severe water shortage in the capital city in late 1985 caused a major setback in efforts by the Government and international donors to improve this situation.

Lesotho has a long history of church-sponsored primary schools throughout the country, which have contributed to a comparatively high adult literacy rate, i.e., approximately 60 percent. School enrollment in 1982 was 128 percent of the number of children in the primary age group--110 per cent for boys and 148 percent for girls. Church and government commitment to education is considerable, and despite a shortage of funds, universal education and improvement of educational quality is underway.

The Employment Act of 1967 spells out basic workers' rights including a 45-hour workweek, a weekly rest period of at least 24 hours, 12 days' paid leave per year, and pay for public holidays. Employers are required to provide adequate light, ventilation, and sanitary facilities for employees and to install and maintain machinery to minimize the risk of injury. Children under 14 years of age are prohibited from employment in anything other than family businesses. Children under 16 are not allowed to work in excess of 8 hours a day, and employers are prohibited from employing any child in hazardous conditions. The Government sets minimum wages for various types of work. In practice, these regulations are generally followed.

All Basotho have fairly equal opportunities, although in the areas of property and contracts married women's rights are limited by law and custom. For example, a married woman cannot apply for a loan without her husbands' written consent. Women in Lesotho have traditionally been the stabilizing force in the home and in the agricultural sector, given the absence of over 100,000 Basotho men who work in South Africa. There are more female than male children who complete primary and secondary schools. Better use of women's talents and abilities will depend on their access to credit, changes in the land tenure laws, and cultural practices. The Government speaks of increasing women's rights but is doing little to actually upgrade the status of women in Lesotho.

LIBERIA

Liberia has been ruled by a military government since the 1980 coup led by Master Sergeant Samuel Kanyon Doe ended 133 years of constitutional government. The previous government was an oligarchy comprised largely of the descendants of freed slaves from the United States and the West Indies, who constituted about 5 percent of the population. Doe and his colleagues, all young noncommissioned officers with indigenous backgrounds, justified taking power as a revolt against elite minority rule. They established a military government ruled by the People's Redemption Council (PRC), suspended the Constitution, instituted martial law, and banned political activities.

In 1984, the new Government instituted steps to return Liberia to democratically elected, constitutional, civilian rule. These steps included the drafting of a new constitution and lifting of the ban on political parties. Controversy soon surrounded the political reform program, both before and after the October 15 elections--the first national elections in Liberia's history based on universal suffrage. The Government carefully controlled the reform process by setting sharp limits on political debate (Decree 88A), forming a government party, establishing high registration standards, and banning two popular parties on the grounds they advocated Socialist policies, thereby reducing the number of eligible political parties to four. The campaign itself was lively, and both government and opposition parties received coverage in the media which consists of both government and nongovernment newspapers and radio. Voting on election day appeared generally free and open, with popular interest in the process very high. There were, however, immediate and widespread allegations of illegal procedures in connection with the counting of the votes. The Special Elections Commission announced that Samuel Doe had won the Presidency by 50.9 percent and that his party had garnered 80 percent of the House and Senate seats. The three opposition parties denounced the results as fraudulent and announced they would contest them in court.

During 1985, there was an April assassination attempt against Samuel Doe and a subsequent coup attempt against his Government which occurred shortly after the election results were announced. On November 12, a small force including some non-Liberians and led by former Army Commanding General Thomas Quiwonkpa entered Liberia from a neighboring country and attempted to overthrow the Government. Although the coup attempt lasted only a few hours, there was considerable loss of life associated with the abortive coup and its aftermath. No accurate casualty figures are available, but there are unconfirmed estimates that some 450-500 people, including Quiwonkpa, lost their lives in this period. In its wake, there were widespread arrests by government forces of military persons and civilians. There were reports of summary executions, killings, and reprisals against certain ethnic groups by government forces or government supporters. Both the Quiwonkpa and government forces and supporters engaged in beating presumed opponents during and following the coup, and homes were looted by both sides.

Against this background, Liberia's mixed economy, with significant state enterprise activity, continued to decline in 1985 due to weak export markets, economic mismanagement, lack of fiscal discipline, a large foreign debt, and government corruption. Foreign exchange receipts and government revenues are heavily dependent on exports of iron ore, rubber, and timber, all of which have suffered prolonged market decline. The Government has attempted to reduce income disparities by increasing employment in government, but this has only postponed needed economic reforms. Retrenchment of government workers was begun in late 1985.

While there were some notable achievements in 1985, such as the holding of multiparty presidential and legislative elections that were covered by both government and nongovernment media, concern over human rights performance in Liberia increased during the year. The Government used its authority inter alia to curtail political debate, to limit the number of political parties, and to detain opposition leaders and hold them incommunicado. In the wake of the October elections there was a bloody coup attempt in November, which left many dead and others in prison awaiting trial. The establishment of a constitutional government in place of military rule provides the basis, if respected, for greater protection of political and civil rights. Liberia returned to civilian rule on January 6, 1986, when the new Constitution officially went into effect.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In 1985, there were reports of summary executions in connection with the April assassination attempt and the November coup attempt. An Army colonel accused of an attempted assassination on the Head of State was arrested on April 4. His investigation and interrogation ended in the early hours of April 8, and less than 12 hours later he was executed. The politicians whom he had implicated in his plot were arrested but subsequently released as there was no credible evidence of their involvement. Following the colonel's execution, the Government stated that the executed man had been tried by a military tribunal. There is, however, no public record that such a trial took place.

On November 12, former commanding general of the Liberian Armed Forces Thomas Quiwonkpa led an armed group in an attempt to overthrow the Government by force. Although no accurate casualty figures are available, there are unconfirmed estimates that some 450-500 lost their lives in the coup attempt and its aftermath. A variety of sources in Liberia reported immediate summary executions of military personnel involved in the coup. Quiwonkpa himself was captured and killed, and a number of his supporters were either killed in fighting or executed. The Government denied that there were summary executions, although it acknowledged that a number of supporters of the failed coup were killed in mop-up operations after the coup.

In November, after the attempted coup, a number of journalists were arrested. Charles Gbeyon, the editor-in-chief of the radio and television news for the Liberian Broadcasting System, was killed; the Government announced that it happened while Gbeyon attempted to resist arrest, although other sources disputed this account.

LIBERIA

b. Disappearance

A number of people disappeared (either went into hiding, were arrested or killed) in the wake of the November 12 coup attempt and have not yet been accounted for. No accurate figures are yet available for these disappearances.

In 1985, there were several instances when people disappeared and their mutilated bodies were later found. It is believed that these were cases of ritual killing. Some who practice traditional religions believe that ritual killing of others and the removal of certain parts of their bodies can increase one's power and chances of success in one's endeavors. The Government has condemned ritual killing but has been unable to identify the perpetrators.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Persons arrested are often subjected, upon or shortly after apprehension, to beating or whipping by security personnel as a form of summary justice and a means of preventive discipline. Such treatment is not generally repeated or used as a tool in interrogation.

In 1985, there was an increase in reported instances of torture of political detainees and prisoners. There were reports of physical abuse of a number of persons arrested on suspicion of involvement in the November 12 coup attempt. Four individuals detained for 9 months without charge, allegedly in connection with the publication of an underground leaflet, were reportedly given 50 lashes each. It was widely reported that these four and two others detained in connection with the same publication were then each given 25 lashes upon transfer to a different prison several months later. Two journalists were also reportedly given 50 lashes each when they were arrested after announcing their intention to sue two high ranking government officials for false imprisonment in connection with an earlier detention which followed the journalists' publication of a story on government corruption.

Approximately 12 persons, some of whom had been participating in an opposition party political rally, were detained in Grand Gedeh County and were beaten and whipped. In one case, family members of a politician were detained as hostages to force him to turn himself in for making "contemptuous remarks against the Interim National Assembly." The Defense Minister also threatened to arrest the families of two wanted men unless the families disclosed their whereabouts.

Prison conditions are generally poor. Cells are often small, overcrowded, and without windows or ventilation. Food, exercise opportunities, and sanitation facilities are usually inadequate. Prisoners are often stripped to their underwear. One opposition party leader was stripped when he was arrested and forced to pose in his underwear in front of the executive mansion. Government supporters, including a government minister, were publicly stripped and beaten by supporters of the coup attempt on November 12, and their property was destroyed or stolen. Some opposition party officials and journalists arrested following the coup were reportedly beaten or mistreated, either at the time of arrest or afterwards, and some of their homes were looted or burned.

LIBERIA

Custom and government regulations permit "trial by ordeal" in some criminal and legal cases, although senior government officials have spoken out against the practice. While the suspect's consent is formally required, social pressure may play a coercive role. The ordeal usually consists of drinking liquid prepared from the bark of a sassywood tree. Vomiting the liquid after ingestion indicates innocence, while its retention signifies guilt. Even if vomited, the liquids may be toxic. There were no reports of sassywood-related deaths in 1985.

d. Arbitrary Arrests, Detention, or Exile

Since the 1980 coup, martial law has coexisted with civilian law enforcement and the judicial machinery. Although the Constitution and the writ of habeas corpus have been suspended, the full body of pre-1980 statute and case law is in most cases regarded as valid. In theory, civilians charged with statutory violations are arrested by police with warrants, must be charged within 3 days of arrest, have the right of bail in noncapital offenses, are entitled to legal counsel, and may be convicted in a court of law only under due process procedures. In practice, however, reports of abuses by police and soldiers are frequent. Civilians have been arrested or threatened with arrest by soldiers and police who then require payment of a fine. In cases of arrests for political crimes, there have often been long delays, eventual trials, sometimes harsh sentences, then pardoning by the Head of State or release on other grounds.

In 1985, in connection with preelection political activities and in the aftermath of the November 12 coup attempt, there was a significant increase in the number of arbitrary arrests. More than 50 individuals were arrested for expressing views critical of the Government or for engaging in opposition party activities. For example, two leaders of an opposition party were detained without charge for 2 months for "making remarks contemptuous of the Interim National Assembly." Most were detained without charge for periods ranging from several hours to 10 months. Six university students and opposition party members were detained for 10 months for their alleged connection with the publication of an underground pamphlet. Of the detainees, two were charged with "breach of security" and one with sedition for criticizing the Government. The two charged with breach of security were later released without trial.

In November, after the coup attempt, at least 200 military and perhaps as many as 400 civilians were arrested and investigated on suspicion of involvement in, or sympathy with, the attempted coup. At the end of 1985, some military personnel had been charged and closed courts-martial were under way. Over 50 civilians had been released, including presidential candidates of the Unity Party and the Liberian Unification Party and the chairman of the Liberian Action Party. Others, including the presidential candidate of the Liberian Action Party (Jackson Doe) and a former Minister of Finance (Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf), were still being detained. Civilians being detained had not been allowed access to lawyers and trials had not been scheduled as of December 31.

There was also a noticeable increase in 1985 in the number of detainees held incommunicado. The Government refused to allow lawyers, family, friends, or, in one case, the Red Cross and a local doctor, to visit these prisoners. For more than 3 months, the Government refused to acknowledge that one opposition party official had even been arrested. It was only after the detainee escaped that the authorities admitted that he had been in custody for more than 3 months. As of late December, some persons detained after the November 12 attempted coup had not been allowed visits by their lawyers, family, or friends.

In March, the Head of State established a special task force for debt collection headed by the Minister of Defense. Several dozen people were arrested without warrant and imprisoned without a hearing. They were held until they paid their taxes, made arrangements to pay them, or convinced the authorities that they did not owe the taxes.

The Government does not exile its citizens. In fact, the Head of State and other government officials have on many occasions urged Liberians who fled or stayed abroad after the coup to return home. In most cases, those who did return have not been persecuted.

The Liberian Government neither practices nor condones forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Liberia's civilian court system is based on Anglo-American jurisprudence. The military courts follow the uniform code of military justice of the U.S. military. The Liberian judiciary, both civilian and military, is vulnerable to influence exerted by the executive branch, and the Head of State has reversed unanimous Supreme Court decisions, notably in December 1984. While there are many good judges and lawyers, there have been widespread allegations of corruption among lawyers and judges and of interference in court cases by senior government officials. The concept of due process of law is well-established, but there are many allegations of bribe-related or politically motivated manipulations by judges.

The Government sometimes uses the military court system for "political cases." In 1985, three civilians--two journalists and a leading member of one of the opposition parties--were tried in camera by a military tribunal. The defendants were not allowed civilian defense counsel. One of these trials, involving the two journalists, was suspended after 2 days, and the journalists were released after approximately 2 months' detention. A leading member of one of the opposition parties, former Finance Minister Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, who was accused of sedition for criticizing the Government, was found guilty by a closed special military tribunal and sentenced to 10 years in prison. Shortly after the sentence was passed, the Head of State pardoned her. This special military tribunal was formally disbanded on January 4, 1986.

In November 1985, a large number of military personnel and civilians were detained in connection with the November 12 coup attempt, and investigations of people whom the Government suspected of coup involvement began. By the end of 1985, in camera courts-martial were under way, with appointed military lawyers for some military personnel, on charges including conspiracy, mutiny, and sedition. At the end of the year, however, only five civilians had been indicted. In early January, the Government announced formal charges of treason against one additional detainee. The Liberian Government had announced that it would hold open trials in civil courts for any civilians indicted on charges of involvement in this attempted coup.

In 1985, several opposition political parties faced legal challenges to their registration. In two cases, the probate court ruled in the parties' favor but allowed significant delays in the cases, despite the fact that the parties faced a registration deadline. Appeals to the Supreme Court faced long delays. The Supreme Court's handling of these cases led to accusations that the Court was attempting to delay or even prevent the registration of opposition political parties. In the end, three opposition parties were allowed to register to participate in the elections.

Traditional courts presided over by tribal chiefs are not bound by Anglo-American common law or judicial principles but apply customary unwritten law to domestic and land disputes and petty theft. These decisions may be reviewed in the statutory court system or may be appealed to a hierarchy of chiefs, followed by administrative review by the Internal Affairs Ministry and in some cases a final review by the Head of State. Allegations of corruption and incompetence in the traditional courts are commonplace.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the martial law regime currently in effect, security forces may enter private residences without warrants, although civilian courts continue to issue warrants prior to such entry in most cases. Before the November 1985 coup attempt, there had been several cases reported during the year of persons arrested in their homes without warrants. In the brief period of control in parts of Monrovia by forces led by Quiwonkpa during the November coup attempt, homes and property of some government ministers were sacked and some members of the Doe Government were arrested and beaten. After the coup attempt had failed, there were widespread arrests without warrants of military personnel and civilians and reports of beatings, killings, and other reprisals against some opposition groups. The Government stated that some of the civilians, particularly opposition leaders who were later released, had been taken into protective custody in a period of great tension and civil disorder. Other military and civilians were being investigated for possible involvement in the coup attempt. In the period after the coup attempt, police and soldiers searched many homes without warrants. Houses and buildings associated with some opposition leaders, including the Liberian Action Party headquarters, were burned or looted. There were also reports of soldiers looting both in Monrovia and in the countryside. The Government called for a restoration of public order and an end to ethnic violence, but there were reports of lootings and ethnic reprisals for days after the coup attempt.

There is no evidence of widespread monitoring of telephones or correspondence, but there have been allegations of specific instances of these practices.

LIBERIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Liberia has a relatively vigorous press, including a number of independent newspapers. However, the Government has passed laws and taken actions restricting freedom of speech and press. Among these actions in 1985 were the detention of journalists and the dismissal of members of the Interim Assembly for criticizing the Government. The key statutory limitation to free speech is Decree 88A which makes it a felony to accuse any government official or other individual of any crime if the purpose of the accuser is to injure the person's reputation, to create disharmony, to spread rumors, to undermine the security of the State, or to impede the electoral process. Some independent newspapers, opposition political parties, the Liberian Business Caucus, and the Liberian Council of Churches have called Decree 88A an unwarranted restriction on freedom of speech and press and demanded its repeal. Opposition party officials said the decree restricted their ability to mount effective political campaigns since they were unable to criticize the Government.

Government officials frequently warned the press and other media in 1985 to temper their criticism. Head of State Doe stated that papers which published articles "designed to create fear and confusion" would face the consequences of the law. According to several newspaper accounts, the Minister of Defense summoned the publisher of one of the independent papers to the Ministry on October 31 and criticized his paper's coverage of the Head of State's election victory. He allegedly warned that the Government would "no longer tolerate" attempts by journalists to "create division among the people." The Government also allegedly threatened to close two radio stations because of their election coverage. In October, the Justice Minister warned that anyone spreading lies and rumors about the election results would be prosecuted.

Some other specific actions included: (1) In January, the Government closed a leading independent newspaper on the grounds that it was "antigovernment." This was the fifth closure of the paper, and it remained closed at the end of the year. (2) In August, another independent paper was closed when the Government accused it of "injuring the image of the government." The ban was lifted 1 month later. (3) In September, members of the youth task force of the Government's party carrying batons and chains entered the office of a leading independent newspaper and threatened to destroy the office if the paper continued to print articles critical of the task force.

Despite considerable self-censorship, there are no formal procedures in place to censor the independent media, and the relatively independent press did its best to provide balanced coverage of the process of transition to civilian rule.

There is no prohibition against receiving foreign publications, but occasionally the Government bans a particular issue of a foreign periodical. The magazine, West Africa, is currently banned in Liberia.

LIBERIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The ban on political parties was lifted in 1984, and parties have generally been allowed to hold organizing meetings. However, in many instances opposition parties were denied access to public buildings such as town halls and stadiums. In some counties, opposition parties were prohibited from holding rallies. One opposition party was suspended for 3 months for publishing a pamphlet before the party was registered, although there was no prohibition against this in the election law. The leaders of two opposition parties were "banned," which meant they were prohibited from attending political meetings or giving speeches or interviews. One opposition party was banned because its vice chairman made remarks "detrimental to the stability of the state," and another party was banned for its "alien philosophy."

In 1985, the Head of State lifted a previous suspension on the activities of fraternal organizations such as the Masons. There are no official restrictions on social, recreational, or self-help development associations. There had been no official restrictions on other civic organizations until November 1985 when the Liberian Government announced a ban on five organizations: the Press Union of Liberia; the National Union of Liberian Teachers; the Liberian National Students' Union; the Liberian Business Caucus; and the Provisional Student Leadership Council of the University of Liberia. Although the Government gave no explanation of the ban, members of some of these organizations had been outspoken during the campaign or have been in detention following the November coup attempt.

Workers have the right to form unions and to organize and bargain collectively. Liberia has a national trade union confederation, the Liberian Federation of Labor Unions (LFLU), as well as several independent unions. However, organized labor represents only a small part of the labor force. Approximately 70 percent of all workers are engaged in subsistence agriculture and are not affected by the union movement. Unions represent an estimated 20 percent of the workers in the monetary sector of the economy.

Union organizing, collective bargaining, and the internal operations of trade unions are largely free from government interference. Nevertheless, in one case in 1985, the Head of State ordered the Labor Ministry to recognize one of two competing unions as the bargaining representative for workers at the Firestone plantation, despite the fact that the issue was at the time under appeal to the Supreme Court. The Liberian Government's suspension of a union which previously represented the workers at Firestone was criticized by the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1985, and the ILO has requested more information on the Government's handling of the matter. Unions are prohibited from strike action, but brief strikes have occurred despite the ban. In most cases, workers have been persuaded to return peacefully to their jobs, and the Government has taken no punitive actions against them.

The LFLU is a member of the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, as well as the continent-wide, Ghana-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

In 1983, and again in 1984 and 1985, the Liberian Government was cited by the ILO for violations of ILO Convention 87, regarding freedom of association, because Liberian legislation does not recognize the right of Liberians in the public service or in government enterprises to unionize or the right of workers to strike. The Liberian Government, the unions, and employers have drafted a new labor code which eliminates the objectionable legislation cited by the ILO, but the new labor code has not yet been promulgated.

LIBERIA

Freedom of religion is recognized and respected by the Government of Liberia. The pre-1980 constitution called for separation of church and state, a concept repeated in the new Constitution. Christianity, brought by 19th century settlers and spread through the interior by missionaries, has long been the religion of the elite groups but has not been an official or state-favored religion. The majority of the rural population continues to practice traditional religions, and approximately 20 percent of the total population is Muslim. The Government does not practice discrimination against any religious group. Although there is a tendency among some Liberians to view Muslims as "outsiders," many government officials are Muslims, and Muslims are active throughout the economy.

During 1985, Head of State Doe twice warned the clergy to stop making political statements. After the Methodist bishop made remarks critical of the Government, the Government withdrew the Methodist Church's duty-free privileges and ended a government subsidy to Methodist schools. In November, the radio program of one religious leader who had been critical of the Head of State was canceled by the government-owned radio station. The program was later reinstated.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

In general, neither domestic movement nor foreign travel is restricted. Exit visas are required for departure and exit visas are occasionally denied. Neither immigration nor emigration is formally restricted. Refugees are not generally forced to return to the countries from which they have fled.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Choose Their Government

Since the 1980 coup, Liberia has had a military government. Head of State Doe gradually consolidated his position and there were no effective checks on the power of the executive branch. At the end of 1985, however, preparations were under way for the institution of constitutional civilian rule on January 6 under a constitution which provides for the separation of powers and a system of checks and balances among the three branches of government.

In 1980, Head of State Doe pledged to return Liberia to a democratically chosen, constitutional, civilian government and subsequently instituted a series of steps toward this goal, including: drafting a new constitution; establishing an interim National Assembly; organizing a commission to supervise elections; initiating two voter registration drives; conducting a national referendum on the Constitution; and lifting the ban on politics. The elections, held in October 1985, attracted a large voter turnout. Election day appeared largely free of attempts to intimidate the voters.

However, there have been persistent and widespread allegations that the Government, the Special Elections Commission (created by the Head of State to organize and supervise the elections), and the Head of State's National Democratic Party of Liberia (NDPL) manipulated the transition process and engaged in illegal activities to secure victory for the NDPL. The Government, in turn, alleges irregularities by opposition parties during the elections.

Eight of the 13 opposition parties were unable to meet the high financial requirements established by the Special Elections Commission (SECOM). Two other opposition parties were banned by the Government for espousing Socialist policies. All three opposition parties encountered procedural and legal delays; one was not registered until six weeks before the election. No opposition party was able to complete registration before July 1985, while the government party was registered in November 1984. As noted above, the opposition parties met a variety of other legal obstacles, such as Decree 88A, and opposition party supporters in some localities were jailed, intimidated, and prevented from campaigning by local government officials.

The Interim National Assembly reduced the number of representatives to be elected on the grounds that the Government could not afford the salaries and support costs of a large House of Representatives. The manner in which constituencies were redrawn resulted in 26 percent of the population electing 46 percent of the representatives.

The election law, written by SECOM and approved by the Government, stated that competing party representatives were to be present during ballot counting at polling stations, consulted on questionable ballots, and allowed to sign the official vote tally. The results of these tallies are unknown, but after the elections, SECOM's chairman ruled the tallies invalid because one opposition party allegedly had infiltrated the pollworkers. As a result, the chairman established a 50-member committee without official representation by the opposition political parties to recount the ballots. There was no provision in the election law for such a committee. There were widespread though unconfirmed allegations that some ballots counted by the 50-member committee were fraudulent and that many ballots were secretly removed from ballot boxes and burned. On October 29, the Special Elections Commission announced that Samuel Doe had been elected with 50.9 percent of the vote and that his party had won 80 percent of the legislative contests. All of the opposition parties denounced the vote-counting procedure as illegal and fraudulent. They announced their intention to challenge the election in court and their refusal to accept the legislative seats they had reportedly won. In fact, however, in early January 1986, 12 of the 18 opposition legislators did take their seats. By-elections will probably be held for the other 6 seats if the elected members continue to refuse them after 30 days.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Foreign journalists and other observers were allowed to cover the Liberian elections in October. Several times this year the Government has met expressions of concern or requests for information about alleged violations of human rights with the argument that they constitute unwarranted interference in Liberia's domestic affairs. The Government has generally been unwilling to supply information on alleged human rights violations. The Government refused permission for the Red Cross and a local doctor to visit political prisoners who had allegedly been beaten. In the month following the November 12 coup attempt, people arrested in connection with that attempt were not allowed visits by lawyers or independent international groups. Several of those arrested have subsequently been allowed visits by lawyers. Some have been allowed visits by family members. The Government has indicated it will allow outside observers at any trials of civilians which may result from investigation of the coup attempt. The U.S. delegation to Doe's inauguration had individual meetings on January 6, 1986, with Jackson Doe and Ellen Johnson Sirleaf and a group meeting with 12 other detainees.

LIBERIA

Amnesty International, in its 1985 report (covering 1984), was concerned about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience and about the detention, usually without trial, of other individuals suspected of criticizing the Government. Freedom House rates Liberia as "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In rural areas, where 70 percent of Liberia's estimated 2,232,000 (1985) population lives, the inhabitants practice subsistence agriculture and follow a traditional culture. The population is growing by 3.3 percent per year (1985).

The Liberian economy depends heavily on export of iron ore, rubber, and timber, whose production is dominated by foreign corporations. Expatriate communities, primarily Lebanese and Indian, also control an estimated 80 percent of retail and wholesale trade. However, foreigners until December 1985 have not been permitted to own real property, and citizenship is open only to Negroes or persons of Negro descent. Gross national product (GNP) per capita was estimated in 1983 at $480 annually, but 50 percent of national income is held by only 5 percent of the population. The current per capita figure is probably significantly lower due to negative GNP growth each year since 1980.

Health care is poor, especially outside urban areas. Only 20 percent of the population has access to safe water (35 percent in urban areas and 6 percent in rural areas (1974). The infant mortality rate is 127 per 1,000 live births (1985), and life expectancy at birth is only 52 years (1985). Average calorie supply, however, was 99 percent of requirements in 1977.

Education for the growing population is a major problem. Two-thirds of all teachers are not professionally qualified and only 70 percent have finished high school. Only 25 percent of adults were literate in 1980 (42 percent of males and 9 percent of females). The primary school enrollment ratio was 80 percent (99 percent for males and 61 percent for females), but many students drop out. Only 22 percent of school-age children finish elementary school, and the dropout rate is much higher among women than men.

Liberia's labor laws provide for minimum wages and health and safety standards. However, the inspection is not rigorous. In many cases, the employer has provided appropriate protection, but the employees prefer not to follow the guidelines. Employers are prohibited from employing children under 16 during school hours. This is a difficult statute to enforce, especially since many children are engaged in subsistence farming. While it is difficult for the Government to inspect all workplaces and enforce the laws, any employee with a grievance can file with a labor inspector.

Liberia was founded by private American "colonization societies" as a territory where blacks could enjoy political, economic, and social freedoms denied them in the United States. Eventually, 20,000 settlers came to Liberia and they and their descendants have remained heavily influenced by American cultural, economic, and political models. In urban areas and along the seacoast where settler dominance was strongest, a modern sector has evolved with a free enterprise economy, substantial political and economic equality for men and women, and Anglo-American judicial procedures based on English common law as transmitted and modified by the American experience. Here, land is plotted, deeded, and held in fee simple, and women can inherit land and property. There is no formal discrimination in property ownership, educational opportunity, or participation in economic and political processes. Women in Liberia have held ministerial and ambassadorial positions and are represented in the professions and throughout the modern economy. Women hold two cabinet posts and several national judicial positions. There was one woman serving in the Interim National Assembly.

In rural areas, most land is held communally among the related families of a clan, and women perform most of the labor in food production and distribution, both for household consumption and market sale. As opposed to statutory marriage, seen as a contract between individuals, customary marriage is an agreement between families. With payment of a dowry under the customary marriage system, a woman is considered the property of her husband and family. Upon the husband's death, the marital contract continues with the family, which has certain obligations and responsibilities to the widow, or more commonly widows, if they remain with the family as wives to other relatives. In the traditional sector, women are not usually entitled to inherit from their husbands or to administer their estates. In addition, women are informally excluded, in many indigenous ethnic groups, from chieftancies or membership in the councils of elders that direct the affairs of the community. Female circumcision is widely practiced by those Liberians following traditional religions. In practice, especially in newly urban areas, many women use both the customary and statutory legal systems.

MADAGASCAR

Madagascar is governed by a President and National Popular Assembly, both elected by direct universal suffrage, and a Supreme Revolutionary Council chosen by both the President and the National Assembly. President Didier Ratsiraka has broad constitutional powers, and his position is further strengthened by the influential role played by his political party, AREMA, which holds an overwhelming majority in the National Popular Assembly. The President's role has evolved in recent years into that of a power broker among various competing interests. Elections are actively contested within the controlled political framework sanctioned by the Government. This framework permits political activity by only the seven parties making up the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution, but whose political orientation ranges from moderate and pro-Western to pro-Soviet. Vigorous debate in 1984-85 National Popular Assembly sessions and negative votes by opposition parties indicate that the Assembly is becoming less of a "rubber stamp" organization. The President chairs the Supreme Revolutionary Council which is composed of political and regional leaders and representatives of the military forces. The Council approves basic policy guidelines, convenes and adjourns the National Assembly, and passes laws when the Assembly is not sitting.

The Malagasy internal security system is composed of the urban police force and the National Gendarmerie, which has jurisdiction in the provinces. On occasion, the National Peoples' Army has also been used for internal security purposes.

The Malagasy Constitution adopted in 1975 made "Socialism" the State's political philosophy. This led to the nationalization of a major portion of the economy. The private sector was reduced to a secondary, albeit still important, role. The economy subsequently deteriorated as production declined, foreign debt rose, and unemployment grew. However, in the past few years the Government has adopted economic reform measures, and agricultural production has stopped declining. Nevertheless, there is still widespread unemployment, and markets for export commodities are weak.

Fundamental liberties and individual rights are guaranteed by the Malagasy Constitution. However, several of these rights, such as freedom of the press and freedom of assembly, are restricted in practice. Rights normally considered inalienable, such as the inviolability of the home and the right to due process, may also be disregarded in cases involving state security.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

There has been one political assassination in Madagascar's 25-year history. There have been, however, periodic outbreaks of political disturbances resulting in loss of life. In December 1984, street fights between "Kung Fu" martial arts enthusiasts and government-sponsored youth groups escalated into a downtown riot that left some 50 dead. When the victorious Kung Fu groups then began to play a vigilante role in Antananarivo's poorer districts and began to represent a threat to the State, the Government responded in August by attacking Kung Fu headquarters. Some Kung Fu were shot on sight. The official casualty count was 20 dead, 31 wounded, and 208 arrested, but there were credible reports that approximately 50 people were killed and 300 arrested. Casualties were reportedly buried in mass graves without being returned to families for traditional funeral ceremonies.

There were no reports of disappearance in Madagascar in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were credible reports that the armed forces used torture in their campaign against outlaw bandits in Madagascar's southwest. There were also allegations that the security forces engaged in acts of brutality and torture. Prison conditions are reportedly poor; inadequate sanitation, poor health care, and unbalanced diet continue to be problems. However, there is no evidence of systematic or widespread mistreatment of prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no concept of habeas corpus in the Malagasy legal system. In criminal cases, the accused must be charged within three days or be released. However, persons suspected of activity against the State may be legally detained incommunicado for 15 days, subject to indefinite extension if considered necessary by the Government.

Defendants are generally formally charged within the specified time frame and, upon being charged, are entitled to the assistance of counsel. Counsel is readily available, and in cases of indigence, court-appointed counsel is provided. Arbitrary arrest or detention generally occurs, however, in cases which involve an alleged threat to the State, such as during the August attack against the Kung Fu. Minors who were arrested at that time have been released, but 34 adults who were arrested are still being detained incommunicado without formal charges having been filed or a trial date set. Such extended periods of pretrial detention are the exception, not the rule, and are usually limited to cases involving state security.

Forced labor is not practiced in Madagascar.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under the Malagasy Constitution and in practice, the judiciary operates independently of the executive and legislative branches of government. Defendants are normally afforded due process. Trials, including those for individuals charged with crimes against the State, have been open, and decisions judged to be impartial.

MADAGASCAR

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The State does not intervene in the nonpolitical aspects of the lives of the people. The home is inviolable under Malagasy law. Intrusions into an individual's residence are permissible only under the authority of a warrant. However, at the time of the attack on the Kung Fu in August the military entered and ransacked homes without court orders.

Although government economic policies limit the choices open to an individual, the Malagasy may make their own decisions, without government coercion or interference, in such matters as changing jobs or residence, marriage, having children, or joining political parties or social organizations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

All publications are subject to censorship administered by the Ministry of Interior. The Government provides guidelines on prohibited topics, but the guidelines are not always explicit nor are they rigorously enforced. When censorship is enforced, the newspapers leave blank those columns where the offending materials would have appeared. One example of government censorship was the severely restricted press coverage of its August attack on the Kung Fu. In general, private citizens are free to criticize government officials and policies without fear of arrest by the local authorities, but direct criticism of the President or the "Socialist revolution" is not tolerated. Government control of the media is further strengthened by state ownership of the radio, television stations, and a news bulletin. There are also, however, two independently owned French-language papers. Several dailies and weeklies are also put out by party groups, and independent publications are available in Malagasy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly and association is restricted in Madagascar. Permits are required to hold public meetings and can be denied by the Government if officials believe that the meeting poses a threat to the State or endangers national unity. Persons and groups belonging to the parties in the National Front are permitted to organize and assemble. Two of these parties held national conventions in the capital city in 1984 and in speeches and resolutions roundly criticized the Government. There were no major political meetings in 1985. Since political activity by groups outside the National Front is prohibited, dissenting political opinion is limited. Malagasy are free to establish nonpolitical private associations.

Although the right to organize labor unions is recognized, unions do not play a major role either politically or economically. The labor force of 4.5 million is mostly agrarian, and union labor accounts for less than 5 percent of the total. Unions are permitted to strike and conduct substantive wage negotiations, but because of the depressed economy, strikes have been few and trade unions relatively quiescent. Most unions are affiliated with the National Front parties.

MADAGASCAR

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government of Madagascar is secular, and there is no official religion. There is no discrimination on the basis of religious affiliation, and individuals are free to follow the faith of their choice. Missionaries and clergy are generally permitted to operate freely, and the Government has so far made no effort to restrain Christian churches which have become more active in criticizing government policies. However, churches not already established in Madagascar must obtain legal recognition from the Government, a process which can be difficult. Over half of the population is either Catholic or Protestant, with the remainder following traditional Malagasy religious beliefs or other faiths.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government has imposed no restrictions upon travel within the country. Official approval must be obtained for trips outside the country, but exit visas are obtained without difficulty. Travel abroad is impeded by the difficulty in obtaining foreign currency since the Malagasy franc is not convertible abroad, and the Government limits the amount of hard currency that can be obtained for foreign travel. There is no refugee population in Madagascar.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The electorate's choice is constrained by the nature of the political system, since the only political parties allowed to operate in Madagascar are those which are members of the National Front. However, there exists a range of ideological and policy views among the Front parties, and within this spectrum there are viewpoints represented that are at odds with the policies of the Government. Thus, the electoral process does give the voters a chance to choose among candidates expressing differing views in local and regional elections and in the National Assembly and presidential campaigns. The electoral process, although not completely free from irregularities, has been essentially straightforward in recent elections, and elections are actively contested. The political system in Madagascar also reflects a considerable degree of regional balance. There are no special conditions of nationality or citizenship which exclude any elements in society from participating in the existing political process.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has not cooperated with groups wishing to investigate alleged human rights violations and, in fact, denied visas to such groups as Amnesty International. There are no official representatives of human rights organizations in Madagascar. In the absence of private human rights groups, the Christian churches in the country have taken the lead in advocating respect for human rights. Although the Government is sensitive to criticism emanating from this quarter, it has not officially responded to questions or criticisms from the churches or any other groups. When the President's opponent in the 1982 election campaign called for supervision of the elections by Amnesty International, the President rejected this proposal as a derogation of national sovereignty. Amnesty International did not include a section on Madagascar in its 1985 Report due to insufficient information. Freedom House rated Madagascar "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Madagascar is an island country more than twice the size of Great Britain. Some 9.5 million people inhabit its 592,000 square kilometers of territory, approximately 16 persons per square kilometer. The annual population growth rate is 2.8 percent. Madagascar is one of the poorest countries in the world with a per capita gross domestic product of $310 (1983 figure).

Agriculture is the most important sector in the economy, accounting for almost 90 percent of employment and approximately 85 percent of export earnings. Under government controls, agricultural production declined in the late 1970's, and the Government had to import large quantities of rice, the staple of the Malagasy diet. Much of the agricultural problem is attributable to government marketing policies which subsidize consumer costs and control producer prices. Madagascar's external public debt reached over $1.6 billion in 1984. Recent liberalizations in the marketing system, however, are beginning to show results: agricultural production increased slightly in 1984 and the long decline in economic activity has stopped. Inflation has been kept below 15 percent. To attract foreign investment, the Government recently adopted a new investment code.

Life expectancy at birth is 50 years and infant mortality is 101 per 1,000 live births. Health care delivery systems are plagued by shortages of medical personnel, inadequate facilities, and limited supplies of antibiotics and other medicines. Malaria remains a continuing problem, especially in coastal areas, and the population is quite vulnerable to outbreaks of disease following natural disasters such as flooding. Although 1977 statistics show that individual levels of caloric intake were at 110 percent of requirements, recent U.N. surveys indicate significant malnutrition in highly populated areas of the plateau and coast. This is the result of poor dietary habits and erratic distribution of foodstuffs. Further, only one-fifth of the population had access to safe drinking water (1980 statistic).

The official literacy rate in Antananarivo is 70 percent. However, overall literacy is somewhere around 55 percent. Primary school enrollment ratio was 90 percent for females and 98 percent for males (1980 figures). Recent dramatic increases in enrollment have resulted in overburdened school facilities, shortages of qualified teachers, and extremely high student-teacher ratios in the public school system and at the secondary and university levels.

Under the Malagasy work code the minimum age for employment is 14, but the employment of anyone under the age of 18 is prohibited in those areas where there is apparent and imminent danger. There is a 40-hour work week in nonagricultural and service industries. There are also provisions for holiday pay, sick and maternity leave, and insurance. By government decree monthly minimum wages have been established for unskilled workers in both the agricultural and nonagricultural sectors. The work code has rules concerning occupational safety and health as well as sanitation standards. In practice, the rules and regulations of the code are apparently adhered to by employers and are enforced by the authorities.

Madagascar has what is essentially a matriarchal society, and a highly visible role for women has been a long recognized and integral part of the country's sociological framework. There are no restrictions concerning activities in which women may engage. Women have a lengthy tradition of involvement in high level political activity, and currently there are women members of the Cabinet, Supreme Revolutionary Council, and the National Assembly. Women are also active and play major roles in the various political parties. Women have prominent positions in the business and economic life of the country, with many of them managing or owning business concerns or filling management positions in state industries. Education at all levels is open to women. However, women in rural areas and among the poor face a greater degree of hardship. In addition to the responsibilities associated with child rearing and household management, economic necessity forces these women to engage in long hours of farm labor or other similar activities. These conditions stem more from socioeconomic factors than from any discrimination against women in Malagasy society.

Although there are numerous indigenous ethnic groups in Madagascar, the society is relatively homogenous due to a common language and a tendency for what were perhaps once disparate cultures to draw together in an island environment. Nonetheless, prejudicial attitudes and rivalry among Madagascar's various ethnic groups still exist on a community level. Ethnic Indian, Chinese, and French communities have experienced some resentment from the Malagasy mainly because of their success in commerce. Ethnic Comorans have also in past years been the object of discrimination and physical attack. These groups have occasionally been the target of local government policies favoring Malagasy nationals.

MALAWI

The President of Malawi, Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda, has maintained nearly undisputed control over political life and government since independence in 1964, and he was proclaimed "Life President" in 1970. Opposition to the Government is banned and challenges to the system are suppressed. Total loyalty, not merely passive acceptance of party and government policy, is demanded under penalty of suspicion, if not detention, by the authorities. Civil liberties exist at the sufferance of the authorities and are highly circumscribed. Political activity is limited to participation in the sole legal party, the Malawi Congress Party. Military, police, and party security organs form a pervasive network which monitors civilian activity throughout the land.

Malawi inherited a parliamentary form of government from Great Britain. Elections are held every 5 years. Constitutional amendments and laws passed by the 101-member Parliament reflect decisions already taken by the President.

Malawi is still a very poor country. However, since independence the Government has used good planning and wise investment of the limited available resources to promote economic development. An emphasis on agricultural production for food self-sufficiency and exports has gradually improved the standard of living.

During 1985, two cases received outside attention from human rights groups. Appeals and inquiries were made on behalf of Orton and Vera Chirwa, both serving life sentences for treason (commuted from death sentences in 1984). Amnesty International has also expressed concern for three journalists detained in March 1985, reportedly because of a misquote published in the local newspapers. At the end of 1985, the journalists were still being detained, although no charges had been made against them.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no allegations of politically motivated killings during 1985.

b. Disappearance

In the past, surreptitious detentions by the police, acting at the behest of the party, have been behind disappearances lasting from a few weeks to several months. There are no known instances in which such detentions have led to death. There were no known political disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Beatings by the police at the time of detention or arrest, or during interrogation, are not officially condoned but do occur. Prison terms of hard labor are the norm for common criminals, with political detainees normally receiving less harsh or degrading treatment. Prison conditions are generally poor.

The Forfeiture Act permits the Government to revoke the property rights of those suspected of economic crimes. These actions sometimes have political overtones. When the Forfeiture Act is invoked, the individual--but not his family--loses all worldly possessions, including business, financial holdings, and personal possessions. Revocation of property rights constitutes an executive fiat with no judicial review. Notice of forfeiture must be published in the Official Gazette. There were no such cases published in 1985.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

At any given time a number of individuals are detained arbitrarily for real or perceived offenses against the party or Government. Malawi residents (including Africans and those of Asian extraction) may be picked up almost at the whim of the authorities, held without charge for varying lengths of time, beaten, and released after several weeks or months. The usual cause for such treatment is suspected disloyalty to the President or expression of views which differ even slightly from the accepted norm. An unknown number of political prisoners are said to be under a loose form of detention such as house arrest. Rarely are those so detained charged officially and brought before either traditional or modern courts. A suspect may also be held without charge for a long period of time while authorities develop a case. It is impossible to estimate the number of arbitrary detentions and arrests made in Malawi in 1985. Forced labor is not practiced in Malawi except as a form of criminal punishment.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Those charged with criminal offenses are tried in either the traditional or modern court system, depending on the nature of the charge. Those charged under the military codes of justice are tried in military courts. Lawyers usually are not permitted to assist the defendant in traditional court cases, but legal counsel is permitted in the modern court system. In the latter case, the defendant has the right of access to counsel before and during the judicial proceedings. In practice, Government and party exert little control over the trial system in cases tried before the high court or magistrate courts; hence, the modern judiciary is almost totally independent of the executive branch, notwithstanding the fact that the President appoints the Chief Justice of the high court who, in turn, appoints other modern court justices. These courts are open to the public, and defendants are charged publicly.

Traditional court justices are appointed directly by the President. The right of appeal exists in both the modern and traditional court systems. It is generally believed that there is little executive interference in traditional court cases dealing in matters of customary law, and there is no evidence of indirect executive pressure on traditional courts adjudicating cases of a political nature. Although the decision is that of the Director of Public Prosecution or the Attorney General, the recent trend indicates that political prisoner cases are likely to be tried before a traditional court, as in the Chirwa case. Amnesty International, in its 1985 report, noted that Orton and Vera Chirwa, by being tried in a traditional court rather than a high court, were placed at a disadvantage: they were denied the right to legal representation and the rules of evidence observed in the high court did not apply.

MALAWI

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In private life, most people are not unduly affected by government authority. Malawian law calls for the issuance of individual search warrants before any home may be entered, but this is not always observed in practice. Police and quasi-military groups enter houses of suspects at will under special entry authority to conduct searches for people or incriminating evidence. Correspondence is monitored by the authorities, and those violating prescribed norms are punished.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Criticism of the Government and its policies is not tolerated. This proscription extends even to the Parliament, where the expression of total loyalty to the President and his Government is both expected and enforced under threat of expulsion or worse. All media are under direct or indirect government control. The two newspapers and sole radio station disseminate news directly authorized by the Government Information Agency and operate under informal self-censorship guidelines. Recently, both media have exhibited increasing candor in coverage of international issues. In practice, the principal focus of government censorship is on material deemed critical of the Government. Some freedom of inquiry into the natural and social sciences exists at the university level and may include some examination of political ideologies at radical variance with those of the Government, provided this does not extend to explicit criticism of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Individuals and organizations are generally free to meet and associate as long as the purpose is not to protest against government or party policy or practices. Professional, fraternal, and service organizations exist and are encouraged by the Government. No political meetings are permitted other than those of the party.

Labor unions exist, but their activities are highly circumscribed and generally ineffective. Collective bargaining is allowed but its use is limited. Strikes are not legally prohibited but rarely occur. Labor unions come under the Malawi Trade Union Congress, which, in turn, is subject to direction by the Ministry of Labor. With Government permission and supervision, the trade union organization associates with international organizations, and the Malawi Trade Union Congress is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. While the labor movement has yet to achieve significant gains for its constituents, the principal explanation for its failure is economic rather than political: the economy of Malawi can sustain only a small number of wage earners, most of whom occupy positions as unskilled laborers on large estate farms.

There is relative freedom of religion in Malawi for all religions whose particular religious tenets do not preclude recognition of the temporal authority of the state. Jehovah's

MALAWI

Witnesses have been banned since 1967 because the Government considers the sect's activities to be disruptive of "the prevailing calm, law, and order." There is no state or preferred religion, and conversion from one religion to another is permitted. There are no restrictions on religious observances and ceremonies which do not impinge on government authority. Religious groups may establish places of worship and train clergy. There is no licensing of religious groups, but their publications, like all others, are subject to government censorship. Religious groups are free to establish and maintain links with coreligionists in other countries and are also free to travel abroad. Similarly, missionaries from abroad are permitted to enter Malawi and proselytize. There is no tie between any particular religion and the Malawi Congress Party.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Few restrictions are placed on movement within Malawi, but denial of passports on political grounds frequently extends to family members of persons in political disfavor and to those persons whom the Government suspects may criticize it if allowed to travel abroad. Legal provisions exist for restricting movement of those convicted of political or criminal offenses. Formal emigration is neither restricted nor encouraged. With the exception of a small group of political dissidents, there is no outward flow of Malawian refugees from the country. Expatriates born in Malawi may return. Citizenship may be revoked, but in practice this is not done. Malawi does not accord official refugee status but has given medical and other relief to displaced persons from neighboring countries and has pursued a policy of persuading rather than coercing them to return to their own lands. Asian residents and citizens are free to travel within the country but must reside and work in one of three urban areas (Lilongwe, Zomba, and Blantyre/Limbe). Within some of these urban centers, strict rules governing where Asians may own property result in limitations on where they may reside. Asian residents, whether Malawian citizens or not, have been compelled to transfer ownership of rural shops and trucking businesses to ethnic African Malawian citizens. Asians are free to expand into other areas of business, however, and industrial licenses for new Asian businesses are routinely granted.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

All political decisions are made either directly by the President or those few closely associated with him. No opposition political parties or movements are permitted. Membership in the only political party is not mandatory, but active membership is expected of those who aspire to government positions (including the civil service) or even professional success. Access to government services, and to some nongovernment services such as local markets, is frequently based upon party membership. Nearly half of the population has at least nominal party membership. The party's pervasiveness and broad-based structure provide for some choice among candidates for party, parliamentary, or other offices. For example, as was the case in the 1983 election, there are often three candidates for election to a parliamentary constituency. All nominees, however, are selected by the party and submitted to the President for vetting. Active campaigning is not permitted. The National Assembly (Parliament) consists of both elected and appointed members and is mainly concerned with ratifying government policy. Its powers are broadly based in law but highly circumscribed in practice. Women are entitled to party membership and voting rights, and hold 13 of 101 elected seats in parliament. No women hold ministerial-level appointments.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not permit organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International to conduct investigations in Malawi. No nongovernmental organizations devoted to the furtherance of human rights are permitted to exist. Expressions of interest in alleged human rights problems by outside groups or individuals are not welcomed and are usually ignored. Few government officials are even willing to discuss the subject of human rights. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International continued to express concern about detentions without trial and the lack of effective safeguards against ill-treatment of political detainees. Freedom House considers Malawi "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Malawi is a small, densely-populated, landlocked country, whose principal assets are moderately fertile soil, good water resources, and a climate favorable to crop production. Despite the strides made since independence, Malawi remains one of the world's least developed countries. Per capita gross national product in 1984 measured only $200, reflecting the absence of any appreciable industrial base in the economy. Malawi's current population of 7.1 million people is growing at an estimated annual rate of 3.3 percent.

Possessing no significant mineral resources, Malawi has since independence pursued a successful export-oriented agricultural growth strategy. The estate sector produces tea, tobacco, and sugar for export, while smallholders cultivate maize, and to a lesser extent, tobacco, cotton, groundnuts, and vegetables. In recent years, the country has been self-sufficient in food production and has exported surplus maize to its neighbors. Over 90 percent of the workforce is still engaged in subsistence agriculture.

Beginning in the mid-1970's, the country experienced mounting balance of payments problems and a halt to economic growth, due to such factors as escalation in import prices of fuel and capital goods; cyclical swings in the prices of agricultural exports; and interruptions in and resulting higher costs of transport in traditional rail routes to the Indian Ocean. With assistance from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, the Government embarked on an ambitious structural adjustment program aimed at restoring economic growth and achieving a sustainable balance of payments position. Economic growth has spurred in the last 2 years with gross domestic product increasing 4.5 percent and 6.8 percent in 1983 and 1984 respectively.

Life expectancy at birth is 45 years and the infant mortality rate is 159 per 1000 live births. About 37 percent of the rural population and 77 percent of the urban population have access to safe water supplies (1980). Calorie supply is 96 percent of requirements (1977). Primary school enrollment has climbed dramatically since independence with the 1980 enrollment ratio of school-age children estimated at 83 percent (male 95 percent, female 70 percent). The adult literacy rate is estimated to be 25 percent.

The minimum working age is 14, though this applies only to the relatively small urban sector. Less than 15 percent of the work force is employed in the formal-wage sector. For those fortunate enough to hold paid jobs, wages and working conditions are generally adequate, and paid holidays and safety standards in the workplace are required by law. However, wage levels are low, reflecting the abundance of unskilled labor, and the Government's desire to limit the rural-urban income gap and hence the rate of internal migration.

As mothers, women have enjoyed a high degree of access to the traditional health services and to extension programs geared toward improving women's homemaking abilities. Such programs, while beneficial, have failed to recognize the importance of women as agricultural producers in the rural sector (roughly 70 percent of all smallholder farming and over 50 percent of subsistence holdings are headed by women) and the potential role women can have in the modern sector. Although males still have a comparative advantage in terms of educational and employment opportunities, the Government has initiated sufficiently broad-scale programs to begin to rectify the discrimination which exists. A third of the positions in the public education system have been reserved for women. Within Malawi's traditional and primarily matrilineal tribal leadership structures, there are several small ethnic groups wherein women possess fewer rights and privileges and where female circumcision is occasionally practiced.

Malawi enjoys a considerable degree of ethnolinguistic uniformity. The vast majority of the population speaks and/or understands Chichewa, which was declared the national language in 1968. English is the official language for government and business. Malawi's indigenous groups are sufficiently alike in culture and social organization to permit relatively easy interaction, including intermarriage, mixing in agricultural settlements, and mixed grouping for political purposes.

MALI

Mali is a single party state in which effective authority is exercised by General Moussa Traore, Secretary General of the Democratic Union of the Malian People and President of the Republic. In 1968, President Traore, then a lieutenant, led a military coup which overthrew the leftist civilian government of Modibo Keita. Although Mali adopted a Constitution in 1974 which increased the number of civilians in the Government, the military continues to play an important role in party and governmental affairs. Military officers hold about a quarter of the senior positions in the cabinet and party, four of seven governorships, and an important portion of the lower level administrative posts, mostly in border areas.

Mali is one of the world's poorest countries with the average per capita income around $160 a year. Landlocked and lacking easily exploitable mineral resources, except for some gold, Mali's economy is based on farming and animal husbandry, both of which have been severely affected by drought in recent years.

The political and human rights situation did not change significantly over the past year. Although civil rights are officially guaranteed, no organized political opposition groups are permitted within Mali. The Government has not, however, reacted harshly or brutally to opposition since the student riots in 1981. It permitted limited criticism in 1985 of its economic reform policies within the controlled context of official party or union meetings. The number of women holding important government positions increased slightly. The Government remained sensitive to any criticism of its human rights record. The country's only external problem is a border dispute with Burkina Faso which has been referred to the World Court.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political killing

There were no reported incidents of politically motivated killings during 1985 in Mali.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported incidents of disappearance, abduction, or hostage-taking during 1985 in Mali.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government of Mali does not officially condone police brutality, but physical abuse of suspects is sometimes used in police interrogation. Torture rarely occurs and never as a form of punishment. Public beatings by the citizenry of persons identified as thieves are known to occur, though not regularly. Prisons in Mali are not harsh by design, but lack of resources creates poor physical and health conditions. Amnesty International in its 1985 report again expressed its concern over alleged inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners in Taoudenit and Kidal prisons situated in northern desert locations and appealed to the Government to improve conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were no reports of arbitrary arrests, detention, or exile during 1985 in Mali. The Malian judicial system is based on the French model so the principle of habeas corpus does not exist. Bail is not legally available, but prisoners are sometimes released on their own recognizance. Prisoners are usually allowed access to a lawyer of their choosing. Administrative backlogs often cause delays in bringing people to trial.

All forms of forced or compulsory labor are prohibited except in the case of convicted criminals.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is part of the executive branch and therefore potentially subject to interference. Trials are generally short in duration. While confessions are not coerced, defendants usually admit guilt and defense lawyers tend to argue mitigating circumstances. The verdict and sentence are rendered by a panel of three judges. The appeals process is limited to presidential pardon or call for a new trial. The National Assembly can convene a high court of justice to hear cases against state ministers. This court did not meet during 1985. Amnesty International indicates that at least nine political prisoners were reportedly held in Taoudenit prison in 1984 for involvement in a coup plot.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The inviolability of the home is guaranteed in the Constitution and generally respected in practice. Police searches are infrequent, and warrants are issued and recorded, but sometimes after the fact.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Malian Constitution does not guarantee freedom of speech or of the press. The state controls all Malian media and does not permit criticism of its authority. Criticism of specific programs, aspects of society, or the performance of government offices (rarely individuals) is allowed limited expression. The national labor union is allowed limited freedom to express dissatisfaction with some government austerity programs. Academic freedom does not extend to criticism of the Government or its policies. Journalists are all government employees. A few have been suspended or fired due to "impertinent" questioning, but in general have not been subjected to harsh reprisals. Private Malian publications expressing antigovernment views are not tolerated, but international publications, even those critical of Mali or its Government, are readily available and circulate freely.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Malian Constitution guarantees the liberty of citizens to form organizations to protect their "professional interests," but in reality only selected organizations such as urban professional associations qualify for this freedom. The only groups which assemble freely are the women's, youth, and labor associations of Mali's single political party.

The National Union of Malian Workers (UNTM) is the only recognized workers' organization. Workers are organized according to the type of work and belong to 1 of 12 unions which form the UNTM. Despite party affiliation, the UNTM claims to maintain a degree of autonomy from the Government. Strikes, though permitted by law, seldom occur. The UNTM maintains relations with international bodies, both public and private.

Mali is a secular state. The Government generally does not discriminate on religious grounds. Ninety percent of Malians are Muslim, but most other religions are practiced freely and permitted to establish houses of worship and schools. Christian missionaries of various faiths enjoy government cooperation and are free to proselytize. Religious conversion is permitted. The Baha'i are forbidden to proselytize or establish houses of worship, although they are free to practice their faith otherwise.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement in Mali is generally unimpeded, although travelers are sometimes subject to police checks, especially at night. These are allowed by law, ostensibly to restrict the movement of stolen or contraband goods. In practice, some underpaid police are known to supplement their usually delayed salaries by assessing fines or confiscating goods. Malians are free to change residence or workplace. Foreign travel requires an exit visa which is easy to obtain. Emigration is viewed as a relief from poor economic conditions. Repatriation is not restricted. Mali is both a refugee-accepting and -generating country with the drought and famine the major forces in the movement of people. A steady stream of people--mainly nomads--migrated to the towns in 1985 under the impact of the drought.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The only legal political party, the Democratic Union of the Malian people, is the supreme political entity in Mali. The Secretary General of the party is by law the President of the Republic. In March 1985, the second party Congress reelected Secretary General Moussa Traore. He was then confirmed as President in a June election. Important policies and decisions are made among a small group--the President, the 19-Member Central Executive Bureau (which includes representatives from all regional groups in Mali), and the Council of Ministers. National delegates to the party congress meet only once every three years and the National Assembly meets twice a year. Citizens thus have only limited opportunity to influence government. Within the one-party system, multiple candidates often contest party elections at the local level. National Assembly elections generally have a single candidate selected by the party for each seat. All party members are eligible to run for election. The National Assembly debates proposed legislation after its acceptance by the Council of Ministers and review by the Supreme Court.

MALI

The role of the military has decreased in recent years but is still important. Five of the 19 Central Executive Bureau members, 5 of the 17 cabinet ministers, 4 of the 7 regional governors, and numerous lower level officials are military officers.

Women are free to participate in the Malian political process, and, while underrepresented, are present at all levels of government and the party, especially at the local level. A limited number of women occupy positions of responsibility in most ministries. There is one woman in the cabinet (Minister of Information) and one in the Executive Bureau (president of the women's union.) Three women now serve in the National Assembly. In 1985, the first woman cabinet director was appointed in the Ministry of Health. The Union of Malian Women is an active political organization under party auspices and a channel through which women can voice their concerns.

While the Government avoids use of ethnic "quotas," in practice, virtually all ethnic groups are represented at the highest state and party level. In local government, officials are assigned outside their native regions. Although some nomadic groups remain outside the economic and political mainstream, Mali is relatively free of ethnic tension.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Mali has been generally responsive to calls by recognized groups such as Amnesty International to correct reported human rights violations. Mali itself has no local human rights organizations. The Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Justice are charged with responsibility for human rights issues. Mali does not play a major role in international human rights forums. Amnesty International's current concerns are noted in 1c and 1e above. Freedom House rates Mali as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mali is one of the poorest countries in the world. Its agricultural activities occupy 73 percent of the work force and provide 42 percent of the gross domestic product. Small-scale subsistence farming dominates the agricultural sector. Mali's population of 7,721,000 is growing at the rate of 2.3 percent annually. Real per capita gross national product ($160 in 1984) has stagnated. A 3-year drought has devastated livestock, and massive amounts of food aid have been necessary to feed the population. The Tuareg nomads, who have long relied on raising cattle for their livelihood, have seen 70 percent of their herds destroyed by drought. Emergency food aid and resources appear to be distributed on a nondiscriminatory basis, but Malians living near or in urban centers or who work for the Government generally have greater access to government services and resources.

Despite deteriorating health conditions due to the prolonged drought, infant mortality has fallen slightly from 174.3 per 1,000 live births in 1984 to 172.8 per 1,000 live births in 1985. Malians born in 1985 can expect to live an average of 46.1 years. Only a relatively small part of the population has access to safe water, although the percentage is higher for urban dwellers (37 percent) than for rural dwellers (3 percent). Only 9 percent of the population is literate (male 14 percent, female 6 percent). About 27 percent of the eligible children attend school (approximately 20 percent are female and 35 percent are male).

Workers' rights are specified in the Constitution. The minimum age for employment is 18. However, with parents' permission, children can be apprenticed at the age of 12.

Social and cultural factors affect the role of women more negatively in Mali than political or economic determinants. Custom often restricts women to "women's issues" when they do participate in politics. The National Union of Malian Women in particular promotes discussion of health and education issues. It has disseminated information on the disadvantages of female circumcision, but it is still widely practiced, without government sanction, throughout Mali.

MAURITANIA

Mauritania is governed by the Military Committee for National Salvation, established in the wake of a bloodless 1978 coup which removed the civilian president and abolished the parliamentary system established at independence in 1960. Colonel Maaouya oul Sid' Ahmed Taya, in his role as President of the Committee, is Chief of State. He assumed power after the peaceful ouster of the former president, Lt. Colonel Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla, on December 12, 1984. All 21 members of the Military Committee retain ministerial portfolios or occupy other key government posts. Prospects for an early return to civilian rule appear remote; the military remains the "custodian of the nation's sovereignty."

All political parties and opposition groups are banned. In the absence of any formalized means of communication between the Government and the people, the Structure for the Education of the Masses was created in 1982 on a nationwide basis. Organized down to the village and neighborhood level, it is used to explain government policy, mobilize manpower for self-help projects, and air grievances. The exercise of state power is tempered by traditions of informal consensual decisionmaking and the historical fragmentation of authority among various tribes, families, and regions.

The country continues to face daunting economic and social problems: desertification and other aftereffects of prolonged drought; the Western Sahara conflict; racial tensions; massive unemployment; the highest per capita debt in Africa; poor infrastructure; inadequate health and education systems; and a mass exodus from the rural areas. Although adequate rains fell in 1985 for the first time in many years, the 13-year drought destroyed much of the agricultural and animal husbandry resources and severely weakened the nomadic culture of the Maurs. The gradual disappearance of traditional culture and ancient religious centers has generated a sense of crisis, and the explosive growth of urban refugee camps has placed enormous burdens on the State.

The advent of the Taya regime brought some improvements in 1985 in the human rights situation. In late 1984, the new regime released and pardoned all political prisoners and detainees and invited exiles to return to Mauritania. The Government also decided to restore the property and pension rights of families of released detainees. President Taya has deepened the dialogue with blacks, focusing on efforts to eradicate the remnants of slavery which have survived three attempts at abolition.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports in 1985 of politically motivated killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no cases of politically inspired disappearances during 1985.

MAURITANIA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Mauritanian law prohibits the use of torture, and there is no evidence that it was practiced in 1985. However, extended confinement is sometimes used to encourage self-incrimination. Some political prisoners released in late 1984 charged that they had been tortured under the previous Haidalla regime. Amnesty International, in its 1985 report (covering 1984), states that the secretaries general of the labor and student organizations were held incommunicado with other detainees, many of whom were reportedly tortured shortly after their arrest by being suspended by their hands and feet and beaten with rifle butts and clubs.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Mauritanian law guarantees expeditious arraignment and trial, access to legal counsel, and the right of appeal. However, an inadequate and underfinanced judicial system results in suspects being held regularly for long periods before trial. Moreover, based on legislation enacted before the 1978 coup, the authorities have the prerogative to detain, without trial or appeal, anyone judged to be a threat to national security. Such detainees are usually confined to their residences but can also be detained in prisons, which exist in both Nouakchott and Jereida for the more serious cases.

As many as eight government officials and businessmen closely associated with former President Haidalla were detained along with him at the time of the coup in 1984. These men are still under house arrest or in prison and no formal charges have been brought against them. There were no arbitrary arrests or detentions reported in 1985.

Although the Government remains opposed to slavery and has established a commission to implement abolition decrees, vestiges of the practice still exist. In the spring of 1985, the United Nations Subcommission on Human Rights released a report on slavery in Mauritania, based on a 1984 visit by a Commission representative. The report criticized the continued existence of slavery, especially in rural areas, but acknowledged the Government's intent to stamp it out. Efforts to implement Mauritania's 1980 Declaration of the Abolition of Slavery have been limited and only partially effective. Some government-sponsored resettlement programs for former slaves have been implemented. Estimates of the number of persons remaining in a slave status run as high as 100,000, although such figures are impossible to verify. The institution persists largely in southern Mauritania, where it originated in historic conflicts between nomadic Maurs and sedentary blacks. The drought has had a tremendous impact on slavery, causing many Maurs to release their slaves as, under deteriorating economic conditions, they could no longer meet the costs of slave-holding. Slavery in Mauritania is not identifiable with the chattel servitude of the American historical experience. There is no commercial market for slaves, and the large class of freed slaves and their descendants is regulated by complex social obligations.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Former President Haidalla released a number of political prisoners shortly before his ouster. President Taya, in late 1984, released and pardoned all remaining political prisoners; those whose goods were confiscated at the time of their detention had their belongings restored by the Government. Although President Taya also invited all exiles to return home to Mauritania, only small numbers have done so.

MAURITANIA

The Shari'a Islamic Code, as instituted in Mauritania in 1980, covers adultery, theft of personal property, and murder. A Muslim judge presides over a jury chosen by the governor of the region. The defendant has a right to counsel and can appeal a guilty verdict to the Supreme Islamic Court within 15 days. Circumstantial evidence cannot be admitted as proof of guilt. Admission of guilt is sometimes obtained in the context of a promised reduction in punishment. An inability to convince the sitting magistrate that the Government's charges are in error is in itself considered by the courts as a legal admission of guilt, as is the convincing testimony of a firsthand witness or codefendant. All sentences must be approved by the President. Opposition to the Shari'a Code has been expressed most often by blacks and women, who believe that the Shari'a Code favors the Maur way of life and limits the role of women. Although a strict interpretation of the Shari'a in earlier years produced communal tension, the issue has largely passed from public debate due to a more moderate government implementation.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government interference in private affairs, save in instances where treason is suspected, is limited. Reflecting the nomadic penchant for privacy and the sanctity of confidences, a lack of sophisticated equipment to undertake surveillance, and the isolation of various parts of the country from one another, the Government limits its surveillance to patrols on major highways, occasional nighttime inspections of vehicular traffic, and inspection of mail suspected of containing currency or prohibited items. Under the Haidalla regime, some individuals who were believed not to support the regime were interrogated by the security agencies. This practice appears to have diminished or ended under the Taya regime.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The freedoms of speech and press are restricted. Mauritania's only newspaper, news agency, and radio/television station are government-operated. The Government does not permit criticism of its policies or authority, and editorial content of the media is controlled. International news magazines and newspapers generally circulate freely in Mauritania. Shortwave broadcasts and Senegalese television are followed openly.

Association with foreigners and the free expression of opinions are not discouraged, although most Mauritians are careful not to propagate antigovernment opinions. Private discussion is lively in family and clan networks which act as vehicles for communicating complaints and airing dissent, as do the Structures for the Education of the Masses. The nomadic tradition also provides for candid expressions of concern to the leadership. In practice, the Government appears to concern itself largely with activities directly related to the destabilization or overthrow of the military Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly has been suspended since 1978 when civilian rule was ended by a military coup. The Government enforces strictly its prohibition of public meetings addressing political themes.

Labor unions were the only nationwide organizations with any political import that were not dissolved following the 1978 coup. Labor unions are grouped in a national organization called the Mauritanian Workers Union (UTM). In 1984, the Government arrested the Secretary General of the UTM, as well as the Secretary General of the politically active (since 1981) of the National Student Union, for allegedly possessing material indicating active Libyan involvement in their activities. The Government then installed an entirely new leadership at the Mauritanian Workers Union, and student union activities were "frozen." Later in 1984, former President Haidalla released these two leaders, who shortly thereafter resumed their former positions. In the case of the Mauritanian Workers Union, this led to an acrimonious split within union ranks which continues to paralyze the organization.

The Mauritanian Workers Union is allowed a large measure of freedom in its organizational efforts. The union is associated with a number of regional and international labor organizations, and its officials are permitted to travel abroad to attend international labor meetings. Within the confines of Mauritania's basic foreign policies, union officials are free to take positions on international labor matters. Unions are recognized only when they register with the official body and accept an appointed director general. Local union officials claim that their membership has reached 30,000 members. Union membership is not universal; workers must pay an annual membership fee of $4.00, but the Government indirectly finances most union activities. The right to strike exists in theory, but an extended strike would probably be strongly opposed by the Government. There have been two brief strikes in recent years.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official religion of Mauritania and the country's official name is the Islamic Republic of Mauritania. Virtually all citizens are Muslim. Proselytizing and the construction of churches and other non-Islamic houses of worship are prohibited without government permission. Mauritania's small Roman Catholic community has been granted permission in several instances to build churches. A number of Catholic churches operate freely. There are no restrictions on personal religious expression, but Mauritanian Muslims are prohibited from entering non-Islamic houses of worship. There is no religious discrimination in employment.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within the country, although travelers are frequently subjected to routine police checks. Temporary curfews have been imposed several times during emergency situations, most recently following the 1984 "restructuring" of the Military Committee for National Salvation. In 1985, the Government ended the requirement that Mauritians must have an exit visa before traveling abroad. A few Mauritanian officials have left the country because of political opposition to the Government. The Western Sahara conflict has led to a small immigration of refugees into Nouadhibou and other northern towns, but there are no acknowledged political refugees in Mauritania.

The right of citizens to change their government has not existed since 1978, when Mauritania's military ended all democratic procedures and abolished the country's sole political party. At the present time, there are no parliamentary bodies, and opposition groups and political parties are prohibited.

The Structure for the Education of the Masses, which was begun by the Government in 1982, functions in some respects as a party organization, and some observers believe that it may eventually evolve into a political party. The Movement has emphasized mobilization of manpower for community projects, explanation of government policies, and raising public awareness of means for combatting drought and its collateral effects. In the wake of the 1984 coup, the Government decided to give greater attention to leadership of the Structure for the Education of the Masses since local leaders were sometimes presenting viewpoints different from the official government position. On a regional level it is always headed by a member of the Military Committee for National Salvation (CMSN), but local officials tend to be prominent businessmen or tribal leaders.

The black population is represented at all levels of the Government but underrepresented in terms of its proportion of the population. Many blacks believe that they already constitute a majority of the population, and that Maur domination in government and religious institutions is a result of discrimination. The same situation prevails in the key state-owned enterprises and among larger private sector firms. The Government insists that a substantial majority of the population is Maur and that a sizable segment of the black population considers itself to be Maur since its mother tongue is Hassaniya Arabic and it shares Maur cultural traditions.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is sensitive to criticism on human rights and has been cooperative with the U.N. Human Rights Subcommission's working group on slavery, including with the Commission's representative during his 1984 visit. There has been, however, no official response to the Subcommission's report, which was released in 1985. The Government is also aware of the continuing Amnesty International concerns over a number of human rights issues, but considered that the majority of the specific charges were based on misinformation. There are no human rights organizations based in Mauritania. Amnesty International's 1985 report noted that all but three of the prisoners of conscience had been released by the end of 1984, (The others have since been released.) Freedom House rates Mauritania "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mauritania's population is estimated at 1.6 million, with an annual growth rate of 2 percent. On a per capita basis, Mauritania falls within the middle group of developing nations (1984 - $480), but this figure conceals wide differences between the modern, internationally oriented mining and fisheries sectors and the very underdeveloped subsistence livestock and agricultural sector in which the majority of the population is engaged.

During recent years, Mauritanian food production has declined sharply as a result of the drought; an estimated 15 percent of cereal needs and 7 percent of overall food requirements are met through local production. In the fall of 1985, rainfall was adequate throughout the country for the first time in several years, and forecasts for the 1985-86 agricultural season call for greatly increased production. Even if the most optimistic predictions are realized, however, Mauritania will remain heavily dependent on food aid for the foreseeable future. Several years of consistent rains will be needed before it is clear whether the enormous ecological damage from the drought can be overcome. In the meantime, the Government's position is complicated by the need to implement an adjustment program in the near term to deal with serious fiscal and balance of payments problems, as well as to carry out a series of policy and institutional reforms in the medium term in an effort to increase productivity. Unemployment is estimated in Mauritania at 50 percent. It is probably even higher in the urban shantytowns. Many Mauritanian workers go abroad for work, but Mauritania also receives substantial numbers of workers from the neighboring countries.

A collateral effect of the drought has been the near destruction of traditional nomadic cultures, as hundreds of thousands of former desert dwellers came to the cities in search of food and assistance. Although this concentration of population allowed the Government and donors to distribute food relatively easily to much of the endangered population and thereby avert a famine, it has also created severe strains on the social fabric. Nouakchott, built for 30,000 people, now has more than 500,000 inhabitants.

The Government is able to provide only minimal assistance in such basic areas as sanitation, education, employment, health care, social services, and economic opportunity. The average life span at birth is 47 years and thought to be declining as a result of drought-induced malnutrition and disease. Infant mortality rates in 1984 were 136 per 1,000 live births. The literacy rate is estimated at 17 percent. About 36 percent of eligible children attend primary school (46 percent male, 26 percent female).

No child may be employed in Mauritania before the age of 14 without the express permission of the Minister of Labor and the National Labor Council. The standard minimum age of employment in nonagricultural enterprises is 15 years. The Labor Code does not address conditions of employment for family members in agriculture or animal husbandry, which is largely outside the cash economy. Although there are no figures available, the use of child labor (except in the family-owned agricultural sector) is not thought to be widespread due to massive unemployment among adult males. There is a guaranteed minimum wage, established in 1985 for unskilled workers and for agricultural workers and in 1984 for skilled workers. Information on actual wage levels is scanty and often unreliable.

The standard nonagricultural workweek in Mauritania is not to exceed 40 hours, nor 6 days per week. Enforcement of labor laws is the responsibility of the Labor Inspectorate, Ministry of Labor. Disputes over labor issues are heard before special three-person labor courts which are jointly overseen by the Ministries of Justice and Labor. The leadership of the National Labor Union indicates that the courts are unbiased and effective.

Although Mauritanian women are legally free to participate fully in governmental affairs and private business, traditional values and practices limit the scope of activities. A number of women have risen to important positions in the fields of health and education or hold midlevel government positions; however, the number is small and the possibilities for advancement are slight.

Strong racial tensions, present throughout the society, have been consistently reflected in the schools. An attempt to enforce the use of Arabic in all schools was abandoned due to strong opposition by blacks, who traditionally prefer the use of French and their tribal tongues. A major shift in government policy is being considered that would eventually replace French as a medium of instruction and allow students to choose between Arabic and one of the three African languages spoken in Mauritania.

MAURITIUS

Mauritius is a small, densely populated island country with a fully functioning parliamentary democracy modeled after that of Great Britain. Mauritius is governed by a Prime Minister, who currently heads a coalition government, a Council of Ministers, and a Legislative Assembly. A Governor General, with largely ceremonial powers, represents Queen Elizabeth II, the titular head of state. Elections at national and local levels take place at regular intervals. There are five major political parties with wide-ranging ideologies, and several smaller parties. Executive power has changed hands twice in the last 4 years through fair and orderly elections supervised by an independent commission. Municipal elections in 1985 in Mauritius' five largest cities returned the main opposition party to power in three of five cities.

Mauritius has no military forces and depends on the paramilitary 700-man Special Mobile Force and the 240-man Police Riot Unit for internal security. These forces, under the command of the Commissioner of Police, are apolitical, well-trained, and backed in times of unrest by a general duty police force of approximately 4,000 men.

Mauritius has a mixed economy, based on sugar production, tourism, and textiles, with a strong private sector. In 1985, the economy continued its recovery, registering a 4 percent growth rate and creating of some 12,000 jobs. Mauritius maintained readjustment policies in line with guidelines from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank.

Political and civil rights, including the freedoms of speech and press, are protected under the Mauritian Constitution and exercised in practice. There are 290 labor unions which enjoy considerable freedom in contract negotiations and within the political arena, although their right to strike is limited by law. Religious freedom is respected in this society which has large Hindu, Christian, and Moslem populations. Mauritius' independent judiciary administers a legal system patterned on the British model. Since independence in 1968, there have been no reports of political killings, disappearances, torture, or degrading treatment of prisoners.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of disappearance of persons in Mauritius for political causes.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman punishment are prohibited by law, and there have been no reports of degrading treatment or punishment. There have been reports of overcrowding in local prisons, a condition which the Government is striving to overcome through the allocation of additional resources for the prison sector.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There have been no reports of arbitrary arrests or detention since the early 1970's, when some opposition politicians and trade union leaders were jailed, accused of creating chaos. Habeas corpus exists in practice, and a person can be held only for brief periods without being charged. Bail is commonly granted. Exile is legally prohibited and not used as a form of punishment. The Constitution prohibits any form of forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Mauritius' judicial system, modeled on that of Great Britain, consists of a Supreme Court with appellate powers and a series of lower courts. Final appeal may be made to the Queen's Privy Council in the United Kingdom. There are no political or military courts. The legal system has a good record of providing fair, public trials to those charged with crimes. Defendants have the right to private or court-appointed counsel. The judiciary is also charged under the Constitution with ensuring that new laws are consistent with democratic practice. In January 1985, a government commission chaired by a former supreme court justice investigated charges of fraud and corruption against several government officials. The commission exonerated the officials, but the opposition accused the commission chairman of bias and challenged the commission findings in the Supreme Court. The cases are still being adjudicated.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home is guaranteed by law and generally respected in practice. The search of personal property or premises is allowed only under clearly specified conditions by court order or by police decision if an illegal act has been committed. Police conform to well-established procedures in performing their duties. There have been allegations that the Government's intelligence apparatus occasionally opens mail, carries out wiretaps, and exercises surveillance of local opposition leaders and other major figures.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is protected by the Constitution and by local tradition. Sixteen privately owned daily and weekly newspapers present varying political viewpoints and freely express partisan views. Newspapers are subject only to the legal constraints of libel laws. There is one television station and one radio station, both government-controlled, broadcasting in five languages. These stations are reasonably objective in news and entertainment presentation, although opposition politicians occasionally accuse the stations of political bias in their news coverage. In March 1985, the Parliament passed an act which made it a felony to charge without proof in speech or print that a government minister was corrupt in exercising official functions. The first offense brings a $600 fine; the second, 3 years in prison. No one has been prosecuted under this law.

MAURITIUS

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Mauritians enjoy the right to form associations, including political parties, trade unions, and religious organizations. Mauritius has a multitude of such private organizations. Political, cultural, and religious assemblies are commonplace. Although police permission is required for holding demonstrations and mass meetings, such permission is rarely refused. May Day rallies held in 1985 by all major political parties attracted a total of 75,000 supporters.

Mauritius has an active and widespread trade union movement. Almost 300 unions represent 90,000 workers, more than one-fourth of the work force. Unions are free to organize workers in all sectors, including the export processing zones (EPZ) which employ about 40,000 workers. Unions can press wage demands, establish ties to domestic political parties and international organizations, and address political issues. One leading federation actively supports the main opposition party. The largest confederation, the Mauritian Labor Congress, is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Unions in theory have the right to strike. Nonetheless, in labor disputes the Industrial Relations Act requires a prestrike 21-day cooling off period followed by binding arbitration, which has the effect of circumventing most strikes. Some labor leaders have expressed concern over the elimination in January 1985 of minimum wage rates for male workers in the EPZ, and the unwillingness of some new EPZ investors to fully recognize their unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no official state religion in Mauritius. Hindus, Christians, Moslems, Tamils, Buddhists, and others openly practice and teach their religions and proselytize without prejudice. All religious institutions receive state subsidies in proportion to their membership. There is no state-sanctioned discrimination against any ethnic or religious community.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on full freedom of movement within the country, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. There have been no reports of abuses in these areas.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Mauritius is governed by a freely elected, unicameral legislative assembly, with executive direction coming from a Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister. The parliamentary opposition leader enjoys a special status in the legislative assembly. A Governor General, appointed on the advice of the Prime Minister, represents Queen Elizabeth II, who is also Queen of Mauritius. While the role is largely ceremonial, the Governor General has the right to designate the person to try to form a new government following parliamentary elections or a parliamentary crisis. Parliamentary, municipal, and village council elections are held at regular intervals. Voting and running for office are open to all citizens 18 years of age and over. In Parliament, 8 of the 70 members are appointed via a complex "best loser" system designed in part to ensure that all ethnic groups are adequately represented. Political parties often match the ethnicity or religion of their candidates to the composition of particular electoral constituencies. There have been allegations that certain groups, including Muslims, are underrepresented in the civil service.

In December 1985, municipal elections took place in the five largest cities in Mauritius. The elections were supervised by an independent commission and were preceded by intense campaigning, including regular public rallies. In the end, the opposition retained control of three of the five municipal governments.

Women in Mauritius participate in all types of political, business, and social activities, and a few hold important positions. Nonetheless, only 4 of the 70 members of Parliament and 1 of 19 ministers are women.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no known reports of requests by international organizations to investigate human rights violations in Mauritius. Amnesty International maintains two branches in Mauritius. There are several local human rights groups which address the internal situation in Mauritius without government intrusion. Amnesty International in its 1985 report noted that the first execution (for murder) in over 23 years occurred in 1984 after an appeal to the Privy Council was rejected.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mauritius is a relatively prosperous island state with a population of just over 1 million and a 1983 per capita income of $1,160. The Mauritian economy is based on sugar production, textile manufacture, and tourism. A strong private sector works hand-in-hand with the Government and with state-owned enterprises. After economic difficulties in the early 1980s, Mauritius has made a sustained recovery, based in part on policies designed to limit government interference in the economy, to encourage industry and tourism, to diversify agriculture, and to restructure the sugar sector. Foreign assistance from bilateral and multilateral sources, including the IMF and World Bank, has also contributed to rapid recovery. More than 12,000 new jobs were created in 1985, and unemployment fell to about 17% by the end of the year. Gross domestic product grew by 4 percent.

Medical care is available to all Mauritians through an expanding network of free government hospitals and clinics. The system emphasizes basic health needs and preventive care. Those requiring complex treatment must travel abroad. Faced with one of the world's highest population densities, Mauritius has stressed mother-child health care and family planning. The population growth rate has declined rapidly during the past two decades, and the 1985 rate is 0.9 percent. Infant mortality has fallen equally fast to about 25 per 2,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth is more than 67 years. Malnutrition is not a serious problem, with latest figures showing calorie supply exceeding nutritional requirements by 17 percent. Access to safe water in both rural and urban areas is virtually universal.

Mauritius places a high priority on education, with the education ministry receiving the largest allocation in the 1985/86 budget: about $36 million. Education in both English and French is free and accessible to all through secondary school. Enrollment in primary school is universal. Adult literacy is 79 percent (1980 figure). The nation's only university teaches a technical curriculum to 400 students. Other secondary school graduates must go abroad for university education.

Conditions of employment in Mauritius, including wage and leave conditions, are generally sufficient to afford an acceptable standard of living for workers in the agricultural, service, and manufacturing sectors. A maximum workweek of 45 hours is allowed, and children below the age of 14 cannot be legally employed, although scattered cases of child labor have been reported. The Government mandates minimum wage increases each year based on inflation. It also operates an unemployment insurance program and a social security fund, although an effective social safety net does not yet exist. Mauritius has stringent health and safety legislation which requires, inter alia, that a full-time health and safety inspector be present at all major industrial and agricultural work places. This legislation is being updated with the assistance of the International Labor Organization.

The Mauritian Government has sought to improve the status of women. Recent amendments to laws ranging from emigration to inheritance have removed sexually discriminatory sections. An interministerial committee headed by the Minister of Women's Rights and Family Affairs (a woman) was formed in April to remove remaining discrimination from local laws and practices. Some inequality remains, however, including a prohibition against women serving on juries. The Ministry of Women's Rights and Family Affairs receives one of the smallest ministerial allocations: just $300,000 in 1985/86. While women are highly sought for employment in manufacturing plants, they tend to occupy the less skilled and lower paid positions and are particularly susceptible to layoffs during economic downturns. The average industrial salary for women is about 30 percent less than that of men.

MOZAMBIQUE

Mozambique gained independence from Portugal in 1975 following a decade of guerrilla warfare waged by the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO), which then took power. The Government is run by a Council of Ministers appointed by the President, currently Samora Machel, who is also the head of the FRELIMO party. It is the only party allowed, and it articulates government policies. A self-proclaimed nationalist and Marxist-Leninist party at independence, FRELIMO's approach is increasingly pragmatic and aimed at the practical realities which Mozambique faces. Popular participation in the local political process in rural areas operates generally through traditional channels. In urban areas and at the national level, it is largely limited to granting or denying approval to delegates to the People's National Assembly.

In the first 10 years since independence, the exodus of skilled personnel, the world-wide recession, misdirected economic policies implemented by the Government, and the savage insurgency in recent years have contributed to economic stagnation. The extended drought, the worst in this century, which ravaged southern and central provinces in 1981-84, uprooted vast sections of the population and resulted in the death of tens of thousands of rural Mozambicans. Mozambique now ranks among the poorest countries in the world. The per capita gross national product was estimated at $396 in 1982 according to the World Bank (others place per capita income in 1982 as low as $178), and it has probably dropped since then. Mozambique's foreign debt now stands at $2.4 billion.

Mozambique is a country at war. Since the late 1970's, the Mozambican National Resistance (RENAMO) has waged a violent guerrilla war against the Government. RENAMO originally was the creation of Ian Smith's Rhodesian regime but later received extensive support from South Africa. RENAMO now claims that it is an independent, indigenous force, and in the past 2 years has become active in all 10 Mozambican provinces.

Respect for human rights, never widespread during Portuguese rule, has suffered in the violence which Mozambique has experienced in recent years. The insurgents' preferred target is the economic infrastructure, but thousands of innocent civilians have lost their lives in the violence perpetrated by the RENAMO guerrillas. The Government has responded to the threat by applying aggressive security measures of its own, and the Mozambican security/defense forces have undoubtedly committed excesses against innocent civilians. There have been no reports of public and summary executions by the Government since 1983, but allegations of torture by both the guerrillas and the government forces continue to be made. The Government is developing a judicial system and has already established approximately 700 village-level courts in addition to the district and provincial system which operates throughout the country.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Request for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

The continuing war between the Government and RENAMO has led to the death of many innocent Mozambican and foreign civilians. Precise figures are unavailable, but the total number of fatalities over the past few years is certainly in the thousands. The insurgents have been brutally violent, killing, maiming, and kidnapping their victims. For example, in April 1985 RENAMO units on two occasions ambushed civilian convoys traveling between Maputo and neighboring Gaza Province. Over 200 civilians were killed, some of whom were bayoneted to death. Amnesty International, in its report on the practice of torture in Mozambique, listed numerous confirmed instances in which RENAMO insurgents had been guilty of "torture, violent beatings, mutilations, and summary executions of civilians." In response, the Government has continued its aggressive efforts to combat RENAMO, and government military operations have reportedly resulted in the killings of many innocent civilians in contested areas.

The Council of Catholic Bishops in Mozambique has publicly decried the senseless violence perpetrated against the civilian population by both sides. The Government has halted public executions of insurgents or those convicted of economic sabotage or other crimes against the State. The death penalty is not prescribed for nonpolitical crimes.

There were no confirmed reports of government-sponsored disappearances during the year. This represents a significant improvement over the situation in 1983, when thousands of allegedly unemployed city dwellers in Maputo and Beira were arbitrarily rounded up and sent off to resettlement sites in northern Mozambique. The Government's commitment to the prompt notification of relatives and friends of persons detained by government authorities remains spotty and suspect. Security forces sometimes hold detainees incommunicado for extended periods. Detainees held by the police have the right to contact their relatives and to regularly receive visitors. This right was often abused in the past but observance improved in 1985. President Machel has publicly campaigned to ensure that the legal rights of detainees are not violated.

RENAMO has reportedly abducted thousands of rural villagers. Sometimes these people are released; sometimes they are forced to live permanently in areas outside of government control. (However, RENAMO does not appear to have the ability to maintain many under its direct control.) For instance, insurgents reportedly abducted a large number of people who lived in Luabo, Zambezia Province, and whose fate is still unknown. RENAMO increased the kidnapping of foreigners during 1985. In June and July, the insurgents kidnapped over 20 foreign workers, missionaries, and residents. All were later released unharmed. However, according to media reports, two Soviet geologists held since 1983 were summarily killed by their captors during the same period.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture has been widely practiced in Mozambique and continues to be a problem. In the early years of independence, according to numerous reports, prisoners at remote government-organized "reeducation camps" were brutally bound, beaten, and often killed. These camps were used to intern political prisoners and "antisocial elements." Starting in 1979, however, the Government promulgated laws which established a formal judicial system in Mozambique, and in 1981 President Machel declared that henceforth no one would be sent to a reeducation camp without due process. The same year the President also launched the "offensive for legality," and in the following months a number of security and defense force members were fired for abusing prisoners. Amnesty International, in its report on torture in Mozambique, characterized the campaign as the Government's "most important effort to end the practice of torture and to control other abuses which had come to be committed by the security and defense forces." Despite recent changes, including closing of some camps, reports indicate that prisoners have extremely Spartan living conditions.

The situation with regard to torture in 1985 represented a significant improvement in comparison with previous years, but reports continue to be received alleging capricious and cruel treatment by some members of the security and defense forces. Flogging is also still practiced, although apparently on a more limited basis than previously. At the end of 1984, functionaries of the Ministry of Justice met and publicly condemned excessive and illegal floggings. Prisons in Mozambique are generally overcrowded and characterized by inadequate food, hygiene, and medical care.

As noted, according to numerous confirmed reports, RENAMO has repeatedly tortured and mistreated prisoners and civilians. At the end of 1984, the Southern African Catholic Bishop's Conference wrote that the atrocities committed by RENAMO had reached a horrific level.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile.

Since 1979, two separate legal systems have existed. The first is the civil/criminal system with a judicial service and a police force under the authority of the Ministry of the Interior. The second system, which is characterized in its initiating legislation as transitional, is the military-run State Security System, which incorporates the Ministry of National Security (SNASP). This latter system, established to deal with the growing armed insurgency, now has jurisdiction over both political crimes against the State and economic sabotage. These two systems operate separately and are subject to separate controls.

Under the State Security System, all investigations and arrests are carried out by SNASP. SNASP has in the past held detainees indefinitely without formal charges. Although detainees held by SNASP are legally entitled to counsel, prisoners reportedly have been held incommunicado. Amnesty International has recommended that SNASP's power to detain persons be drastically reduced because it believes that this situation invites abuse and leads to prisoner mistreatment.

Under the civil/criminal court system, persons accused of the most serious crimes can be detained up to 84 days without investigation. At the end of this period, the police can request an additional period of up to 84 days to complete their investigation but must secure the approval of the court. While being held for investigation, a detainee has the right to counsel and to contact relatives or friends. Although adherence to these principles has improved during the last 2 years, there are still reports of abuses. The availability of lawyers to defend detainees is limited, but in 1985 the Ministry of Justice continued its effort to ensure that detainees held by police were afforded access to private or government-provided legal assistance. In some cases detainees may be released from prison while the investigation proceeds, but the bail system in Mozambique remains ill-defined. If the prescribed period for investigation has been completed and no charges have been brought, the detainee must be released. During 1985, there were no reports of anyone being exiled from Mozambique. As far as is known, compulsory labor is not practiced in Mozambique.

Trials conducted by the civil/criminal court system are public. At the local level they are often conducted in a public place in the village where the crime was allegedly committed to encourage public attendance and participation. The proceedings are conducted by a trained representative of the Ministry of Justice, assisted by two or four popularly elected "judges." Since the legal knowledge of those involved is limited, they are instructed to exercise common sense and to apply locally accepted principles. These courts can handle only minor offenses; more serious crimes are judged in Peoples' Courts at the district and provincial levels. District and provincial trials are also open to the public, except in certain cases, such as rape, where the defendant can request a closed trial. Persons convicted of a serious crime have the automatic right of appeal to the next higher court. The Superior Court of Appeals was recently established in Maputo.

Prisoners charged with crimes against the State are tried by the Revolutionary Military Tribunal. These trials are held in camera and there is no recourse of appeal. However, this court has apparently not been called into session since 1983. There are no reliable estimates of the numbers of persons detained for political reasons. The exact number of persons incarcerated in the reeducation camps in the mid-1970's will never be known. Many reportedly died in these camps and the fate of others remains a mystery. In its 1985 report, Amnesty International estimated that there were approximately 4,000-5,000 RENAMO prisoners at the beginning of 1985, and the figure was probably somewhat higher at the end of 1985. The general amnesty announced by President Machel at the beginning of 1984 remains in effect, and there have been reports of some insurgents surrendering voluntarily.

"Operation Production," which forcibly relocated thousands from large urban areas to the countryside in 1983, has not been repeated. Moreover, most people have moved back to their former dwelling places. Since FRELIMO defines itself as a vanguard party, people are not forced to belong, but there is an obvious correlation between professional advancement and party membership. Nonparty members are also occasionally compelled to attend political indoctrination meetings where they work or live.

It is widely assumed that surveillance devices are employed to monitor the local and international telecommunications systems. There have also been reports of tampering with mail, especially the mail from abroad.

MOZAMBIQUE

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is little tolerance for public criticism of basic government policies and officials at the national level. At the local level, especially in rural areas, there is considerable openness as the people express their views on prevailing conditions. Magazines and newspapers often contain articles or letters to the editor complaining about the lack of goods and social services or the ineffectiveness of a particular official.

The Government controls all authorized publications in the country as well as the radio and experimental television facilities. Although the media promote the Government's general philosophy and its positions on issues, there is controlled reporting on abuses within the system or flaws in the implementation of government policies for those areas of state policy where the Government has admitted to errors.

The Government has criticized Western news agencies for exhibiting a general bias against the Third World, but Western journalists (including Americans) are welcome in Mozambique, and the Government generally works to make their visits productive.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Since political opposition to the Government and to FRELIMO ideology is not permitted, public gatherings of all but a purely social nature are controlled by the local authorities. The right of Mozambicans to come together to form voluntary associations is limited: local economic cooperatives are encouraged but politically oriented associations are proscribed. The Government has organized several "mass movements" for women, youth, workers, etc., and attempts to use them to motivate the general population. Though membership is theoretically voluntary, there is occasional pressure to join.

The formation of independent unions is not permitted. In 1983, the Government established the Mozambique Workers' Organization (OTM) intended to function as a national labor union. In practice, however, an organized union movement has yet to develop, and labor currently has little influence on economic policy or politics. There are occasional exchanges of delegations in the labor field with other countries, especially with those of Eastern Europe. Existing labor law is generally very favorable to the employee, but in practice it is difficult to enforce because of the fragility of the institutions associated with labor.

Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of religion, in the past the Government placed restrictions on the activities of religious groups. It has reserved the right to decide whether individual church buildings can be operational and whether individual clergy can visit outlying areas. It has also nationalized church schools and hospitals. Over the past few years, however, there has been an improvement in church/state relations. Organized religions now operate with relative freedom and some churches have been effective in social work activities and in acting as channels for the distribution of emergency food donations to the poorest regions of the country. Pastoral letters issued in 1985 by the Catholic bishops which were critical of governmental policies circulated widely without reprisals by the authorities. The Muslims have also been allowed to establish a national organization, to resume religious training, and to reopen mosques. Attendance at religious rites is thought generally to be on the rise and party members are no longer specifically prohibited from membership in a church or mosque. Critical comments regarding religious beliefs by the Government are almost always general in nature and not directed against specific individuals or churches. Membership in a religious group does not appear to affect, either favorably or unfavorably, a person's secular standing.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel and relocation within the country are controlled by security and employment requirements under the rationale of assuring public and social order. Mozambicans planning to travel outside their city of residence must obtain a travel permit from local government authorities.

Mozambican law does not address the issue of emigration, although presumably Mozambicans can emigrate if they wish. Several hundred thousand people fled from Mozambique at independence in 1975 because of economic chaos and fears of political persecution. In the past few years, additional thousands have fled, some only temporarily because of the deteriorating security situation created by the guerrilla war and because of continuing economic hardship. In 1981, the Government announced a policy of welcoming back Mozambicans who had left the country, and in 1982 it passed a law allowing for the reacquisition of citizenship by Mozambicans who had left the country and assumed another nationality. Previously, some Mozambicans who had opposed the party before independence were jailed upon their return to Mozambique. More recently, Mozambicans who have accepted the Government's invitation to return have apparently not suffered harassment or retribution. However, persons involved in the insurgency movement or outspoken critics of the Government generally have opted not to return overtly to Mozambique.

Since independence, the Government has readily provided first asylum to refugees from neighboring countries. Although many thousands of Zimbabweans resided temporarily in Mozambique during the struggle for that country's independence, most refugees now in Mozambique are from South Africa and Malawi. In spite of the poor economic situation, the Government continues to assist refugees by providing land, housing, relief assistance, social services and in some cases employment. There are an estimated several hundred thousand internally displaced persons in Mozambique due to drought and insurgency activity, and thousands of Mozambicans have fled to Malawi, Zimbabwe, Swaziland, and South Africa.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political activity and active opposition to FRELIMO is not allowed. The party and the Government are controlled by a small cadre of senior officials, headed by President Machel. Structures for so-called mass political involvement exist at the provincial, district, and local levels, but they only permit limited participation. The party and Government espouse a system of "People's Democracy" where decisions are made by consensus; in practice, this means that policies and initiatives emanate from above. Election to representative bodies is made from a single slate and the electorate has only the option of endorsing or rejecting candidates preselected by party structures. Votes by the National People's Assembly endorsing government policies are usually unanimous.

The number of ethnic Asian and white Mozambicans holding important positions is much greater than their proportion of the general population, a reflection of the greater educational opportunities available to these groups prior to independence, rather than to unequal treatment. Within the black population, individual ethnic groups are treated equally, and tribal affiliation appears to have relatively little correlation to political outlook.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

Although the Government has discussed the status of RENAMO prisoners with international relief organizations, it has not yet allowed them access. Several times during 1984 Amnesty International presented to the Government recommendations to strengthen the controls against torture and to limit the right of the security forces to hold detainees for unlimited time without charges. The reaction of the Government to these recommendations is unknown. Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report, remains concerned about the long-term detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government, including some reported detainees arrested before independence in 1975, and about allegations of torture of political detainees and prisoners suspected of committing economic crimes. Freedom House rated Mozambique as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mozambique's annual per capita gross national product was estimated at $397 in 1982 and probably dropped significantly by 1985. The country has a population estimated at 13.6 million, 85 percent of which is engaged in subsistence agriculture. The population growth rate was estimated at 2.8 percent in 1985.

Because of drought, lack of security, and mismanagement, food production continues to fall far short of domestic requirements. In order to feed its population in 1985, the country spent a significant amount of foreign exchange on food imports and relied on very sizable food aid grants from abroad. Although drought conditions have improved, considerable foreign food aid will still be required for rehabilitation purposes in 1986. In order to promote agricultural production, the Government returned some state farms to private farmers and cooperated on aid programs aimed at private farmers. It also raised prices for food resulting in significant modest response.

Industrial production is only a fraction of preindependence levels--some factories are closed and many are operating at only 10 percent of capacity. Productivity has suffered from shortages of raw materials, equipment, spare parts, and trained personnel. The Government continues to follow a nominally

Socialist economic system, but there is an active private sector, and in 1985 the Government instituted sweeping reform aimed at cutting back the commercial involvement of the State in the economy and at actively encouraging foreign investment. Smaller privately owned Mozambican industrial enterprises are functioning again. Various companies have begun to explore for oil, gas, and minerals. The Government published an investment code in 1984, signed an agreement with the U.S. Overseas Private Investment Corporation, and became a member of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

In areas of public health and education, differences in the quality of services available to rural and urban populations still exist, primarily as a result of limited resources and poor security. Medical care is significantly better in metropolitan areas. For example, the infant mortality rate now averages 158 per 1,000 live births nationwide, but varies from a low of 35-40 per 1,000 in sections of the capital to a high of 190-200 per 1,000 in some rural areas. Life expectancy at birth is 52 years but, again, there are wide differences among various parts of the country. In 1977, caloric supply available for consumption was estimated to be 83 percent of nutritional requirements and may be lower in 1985 due to drought and civil strife. Fewer than 10 percent of the population has access to safe water supplies and, even in urban areas, outbreaks of cholera occur.

Education continues to be a priority. The Government emphasizes teacher training programs, particularly in rural areas. Most training centers, however, lack adequate facilities and are oversubscribed and understaffed. As a result, the number of teachers in rural areas continues to increase, but the quality of instruction remains low. The World Bank estimates that the primary school enrollment ratio was 53 percent in 1983 (62 percent for males and 45 percent for females). Although the literacy rate has risen as a result of government programs, a rate of 20 percent (including those who are only semiliterate) would probably be more accurate than the World Bank estimate of 33 percent.

The Government has continued efforts to safeguard the health and welfare of the population. Health and environmental laws protecting workers have been enacted, and the Government has on occasion closed down firms for noncompliance. Child labor is also controlled and the minimum working age (excluding agriculture) is 16.

In spite of the strains imposed by the war and the economic collapse, racial harmony remains a hallmark of Mozambican society. Largely due to government support, women continue to play an increasingly important role in Mozambique, particularly in the working levels of the Government. The 1985 national congress of the Mozambican's Women's Organization was notable for its avoidance of ideology and its concentration on issues of direct relevance to women's concerns.

Niger is governed by an authoritarian military regime with power concentrated in the hands of its President, General Seyni Kountche, who heads the nation's highest body, the Supreme Military Council. Kountche took power in 1974 in a military coup, toppling the civilian regime of Hamani Diori. At that time, the Constitution was suspended and Kountche has ruled by decree ever since. Freedoms of assembly, speech, and political activity are restricted. Public dissent is nonexistent, and private dissent tends to be rare for fear of retribution. Nigeriens, however, may pursue their own economic interests and hold private property. The Government is proceeding cautiously with the implementation of the National Development Society, which many believe will lead to greater civilian involvement in economic decisionmaking.

Niger, one of the world's poorest countries, occupies a large area in the arid Sahel region of West Africa. The economy hinges on subsistence farming and livestock and some of the world's largest uranium deposits. However, severe drought and declining world demand for uranium since the early 1980's have had a serious negative impact on the Nigerien economy. During 1985, the Government was preoccupied with the massive logistical effort required to distribute food aid to the many areas of Niger where people faced starvation as a result of the disastrous 1984 harvest.

The human rights situation in Niger did not improve in 1985. In response to an armed attack by Tuareg dissidents on an administrative post at Tchín-Tabaraden in late May, during which 1 Tuareg and 2 soldiers were killed, the Government arrested about 1,000 ethnic Tuaregs in Niamey. On June 6, the Government expelled over 200 Malian and Mauritanian Tuaregs. Former President Diori was put back under the house arrest from which he had been released in April 1984, and restrictions were placed on nighttime travel in Niger as a result of the same incident. In July, a state/security court tried 11 Tuaregs arrested at Tchín-Tabaraden and condemned at least 8 of them to death. The death sentences are not believed to have been carried out. An undetermined number of detainees are still being held in connection with the October 1983 coup attempt.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the integrity of the person, including freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports in 1985 of political killings.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances were reported during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Systematic torture of detainees and prisoners is not believed to take place in Niger. Cruel treatment usually in the form of physical beatings has taken place, however, as the result of overzealousness on the part of officials charged with handling political prisoners. Many of the Tuaregs detained in early June in reaction to the Tchín-Tabaraden affair were beaten, and several are reported to have died in detention. One political prisoner, a former member of an opposition group based in Europe, is reported by witnesses, who have seen him in detention, to have been beaten regularly.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

With the Constitution suspended since 1974, there are no specific statutory protections against arbitrary arrest or imprisonment, nor does habeas corpus exist. Warrants are not required for an arrest. In cases concerning political or security related matters, detainees can be held indefinitely without charge, as in the case of the detainees who are still awaiting trial from the October 1983 coup attempt. When the Government believes the national security to be at risk, large groups of citizens may be rounded up arbitrarily for questioning, as with the roundup of Tuaregs in Niamey after the Tchín-Tabaraden attack. In that instance, over 1,000 Tuaregs were detained on the basis of their ethnicity. The majority of the detainees were released, but only after several days of detention in crowded, unsanitary conditions. For criminal offenses, the law holds that detainees must be charged within 48 hours, but delays sometimes occur as the result of a lack of trained, competent legal officials.

Forced labor is not practiced in Niger, but during the 1985 drought emergency, displaced herders, primarily ethnic Tuaregs and Fulanis, were in some instances forcibly moved onto government-sponsored vegetable growing projects. There are no known instances of dissidents or political opponents being exiled by the Kountche Government, although some dissidents have voluntarily gone into exile.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are an estimated 30 political prisoners in Niger, including the detainees from the October 1983 coup attempt and the 11 Tuaregs detained in connection with the Tchín-Tabaraden affair. It is also believed that political prisoners are rarely allowed visits from family members. However, political prisoners with severe medical problems have been allowed treatment by specialists from Europe, and in one recent instance a prisoner was evacuated to Europe for the treatment of a life-threatening illness.

There are public trials for civil and criminal cases not involving political or security-related acts. Legal counsel is provided for indigent defendants accused of felonies or other major offenses if they are under 18 years of age, handicapped, or face the possibility of a sentence of more than 10 years. While there are reliable accounts that courts in some specific cases have been subject to political influence or pressure in ordinary civil or criminal cases, the judicial system is believed to be generally independent and fair. Defendants may appeal verdicts first to an Appellate Court and, if desired, to the nation's highest tribunal, the State Court, composed of civilian magistrates, which serves in the capacity of a final court of appeals. The President has the right of pardon in penal cases and invoked this right twice during 1985. On April 1, the 11th anniversary of Kountche's accession to power, 123 prisoners were pardoned. An additional 238 were pardoned or had their sentences reduced on the occasion of the Id-el-Fitr Islamic holiday. At the village level, matters such as property disputes are frequently resolved by traditional means without reference to the legal system.

Operating outside of the traditional legal framework is the state security court, which tries political and security related cases. This body meets in secret and little is known about its proceedings, but it is believed that its members are military officers. This court tried the 11 Tuaregs from the Tchín-Tabaraden affair in July, and is reportedly finally making preparations to try the prisoners detained after the October 1983 coup attempt.

In early June, President Kountche announced the formation of a special court to investigate civil service corruption. The investigation has been proceeding throughout 1985. Reportedly, stiff penalties will be assessed, including the death penalty for convictions of embezzlements of amounts over $500,000.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The police have the right to enter homes between 5 a.m. and 9 p.m. and will enter at other times if deemed necessary. Many of the Tuaregs rounded up in Niamey in early June were removed forcibly from their homes. Court warrants are not required in such instances. Violations of privacy such as interference with correspondence, telephone tapping, and use of informer networks are known to take place. The Government used strong measures in 1985 in forcibly resettling some elements of the population as part of the official strategy for dealing with the drought.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are very restricted. Institutions which might voice dissent, such as a free press or a freely elected legislature, do not exist. The media are controlled by the Government. While some criticism of government policy or bureaucratic inefficiency is allowed, especially in the relatively new Sunday Sahel, such criticism is expressed with the knowledge or at the behest of the Government. Debates on aspects of the economy or cultural policy sometimes take place in the media, but the boundaries of permissible discussion are well understood in advance by all participants. The primary functions of the media are to disseminate government policies and viewpoints and to rally popular support for government programs and leading figures such as the President. Nigerian journalists are acutely aware of their status as government employees and of the guidelines within which they must operate. Journalists whom the Government believes have strayed from these guidelines have been demoted, fired, or otherwise disciplined. Full academic freedom does not exist. There have been no reports of censored or banned magazines or other publications, but the Government is under no constraints should it discover material that it deems offensive. Foreign films are subject to censorship by the Ministry of Interior on the grounds of public morality and political content.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Except for political parties, most forms of voluntary association, such as trade unions, churches, and other 4 religious groups are allowed to function with the understanding that they do so in accordance with government policy. Public meetings of such organizations are usually allowed, but the Government is not obliged by law to permit such activity. Its permission is required for public gatherings.

The trade union movement is controlled and partially financed by the Government. All unions are organized under a government-controlled umbrella group, the National Union of Nigerien Workers (USTN). The head of the USTN is appointed by the Government. The USTN represents approximately 30 percent of the approximately 60,000 salaried workers in Niger. The group is poorly financed partly because of government refusal to allow fund raising methods such as a paycheck checkoff system. Lower level elections in the USTN are believed to be fairly democratic. Strikes in Niger are rare. The confederation maintains relations with recognized international bodies and sends representatives to international meetings. It is a member of the Accra-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Niger is overwhelmingly Muslim, but Christian churches are allowed to operate freely. Conversion from one religion to another is not prohibited but occurs only rarely. Foreign missionaries are permitted to live, work, and travel in Niger. There have been no reports of religious discrimination, but adherence to Islam tends to give one an advantage in all sectors of life. The Government, cautious because of the Islamic fundamentalist violence which erupts periodically in northern Nigeria, monitors religious activity through the Islamic association which is funded by the Government. Local religious leaders are subject to an informal government screening process and Islamic services that have gone beyond strictly religious subjects have been shut down by the Government. Religious groups are allowed to maintain links with coreligionists in other countries.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel within Niger is closely monitored, although no special travel documents are required for domestic travel. Police checks, often entailing thorough searches, take place upon entering or leaving any major town or city. These controls became more stringent in June as part of the Government's reaction to the Tchín-Tabaraden incident. At the same time, the Government imposed a de facto 7 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew on internal travel and on entering Niger from neighboring countries. These measures reflect a governmental preoccupation with smuggling as well as concern over possible movements into the country of foreign-based dissidents or criminal elements. Moreover, the Government uses these measures to discourage migration to urban areas. Nigeriens wishing to travel abroad must obtain exit visas, which are usually granted routinely. Married women must have the permission of their husbands to travel abroad. The repatriation of Nigerien nationals is unrestricted. In May 1985, the Government of Niger efficiently resettled approximately 10,000 Nigeriens who were expelled from neighboring Nigeria. A few refugees from other countries have been accepted. Niger is a signatory to the UN Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees.

NIGER

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The capacity of the people to influence the Government is extremely limited. Virtually all power is held by the President, General Seyni Kountche. He rules through the Supreme Military Council which is made up of officers who helped stage the 1974 coup that toppled the previous civilian regime. Kountche rules by decree, makes all government appointments, and controls the pace of political change and economic development. Government operations are conducted largely by civilian technocrats who implement decisions promulgated by the Supreme Military Council and Kountche himself. The President derives his power from the military. While all but three of the ministerial positions have passed from military to civilian hands in recent years, all of Niger's seven departments have military governors, who have virtually autocratic powers within their departments. Moreover, there is a marked military presence in the upper echelons of the National Development Society.

In lieu of a party system, the Kountche Government since 1979 has been organizing the National Development Society which in theory will lead to greater popular participation in economic decisionmaking. The Society consists of a hierarchical network of councils at the village, regional, departmental, and national levels. The councils consist of elected and appointed members although only at the village level are members elected directly by the people. The national level council consists of Nigeriens from all walks of life, who also serve on special committees considering various aspects of economic development, cultural policy, and social issues. One such committee is writing a national charter which, it is believed, will serve as the basis for a new constitution.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Niger is not active in regional and international human rights organizations. Over the past few years, inquiries from international human rights organizations have apparently been ignored by the Government. There are no domestic groups which monitor the human rights situation in Niger. Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report, expressed concern about the detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government. Freedom House rates Niger "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Niger's population of 6,491,000 is growing at the rate of 3.4 percent and lives at no more than a subsistence level. Roughly 90 percent of Niger's workforce is employed in some form of agriculture or herding. A combination of extensive drought and prolonged slump in the world uranium market has seriously affected the economy. Gross national product per capita was only $240 in 1983.

Infant mortality is 134 deaths per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth is 46 years. On the average, Nigeriens receive 94 percent of daily nutritional requirements (1977 estimate). A 1975 estimate showed that only 33 percent of the population had access to safe water, (41 percent urban, 32 percent rural), but this figure is believed to have improved in recent years, thanks to a large-scale government well-drilling program. Other social indicators are also low. The adult literacy rate was 10 percent in 1980 (male 14 percent, female 6 percent). In 1981, the primary school enrollment ratio was 25 percent, with a large bias in favor of males (32 percent) compared to females (17 percent).

Under the Niger labor code, workers receive benefits for on the job injury, leave for family emergencies, and health benefits. Annual holidays and leave benefits are clearly spelled out. Children between the ages of 12 and 18 may be employed, but there are strict provisions concerning the hours of employment and types of employment for children in this age group. All labor provisions, especially those concerning child labor, apply in practice only to urban areas. In the agricultural sector, which employs most Nigeriens, children work on family plots under conditions which exceed the provisions of the labor code.

The essentially traditional nature of society helps ensure that family and ethnic group ties remain strong and supportive, but traditional practices and attitudes on ethnicity, women, and education have some negative effects. Males have considerable advantages in terms of education, employment, and property rights. In case of divorce, custody of all children under eight years of age is given to the husband. Conscious of this situation, the Government has made progress in improving the status of women by launching work on a new family code, by providing better employment opportunities to women, by giving them a significant role in the National Development Society, and by supporting the National Women's Association. In 1985, the Government undertook a major initiative to encourage Nigeriens to use birth control.

Four major ethnic groups, each with its own language, make up the bulk of the population. The two primarily nomadic groups, Tuaregs and Fulani (Peul), have less access to government services, partly because their transient lifestyles make it difficult for the Government to supply them with services and partly because of historical animosities between the nomads and the sedentary Djerma and Hausa ethnic groups which dominate the Government. Such animosities undoubtedly contributed to a slowness on the part of some government officials in 1985 to guarantee that adequate quantities of food relief reached isolated Tuareg and Fulani populations.

NIGERIA

On August 27, 1985, military officers overthrew the 20-month-old government of Major General Muhammadu Buhari and installed Major General Ibrahim Babangida as President. Babangida was Chief of the Army Staff in the Buhari government, which had itself seized power from a civilian government in December 1983. A 28-member Armed Forces Ruling Council (AFRC) is the main decisionmaking organ of the Government, while a 22-member Federal Cabinet presides over the Government's executive departments. Military governors, appointed by the President and assisted by executive councils, head Nigeria's 19 state governments. The 1979 Constitution remains partially in effect, but significant provisions, namely those guaranteeing such democratic features as free elections and political parties and such fundamental individual rights as due process and habeas corpus, are suspended. In December 1985, the Babangida Government thwarted a coup plot by disgruntled military officers. The plot was widely condemned by the Nigerian public. Courts-martial of those suspected of involvement were pending at the end of the year.

Legislation at both the federal and state levels continues to be promulgated by decree. All decrees are exempt from challenge in the courts and under the previous military government some decrees had ex post facto effect. The Government enforces its authority through the federal security apparatus: the national police, the military, and the Nigerian Security Organization (NSO). No separate law enforcement agencies exist at the state and local levels.

Nigeria, with an estimated 100 million people, is Africa's most populous country. It has a mixed economy in which the Government plays a major role in important sectors. In October, the military Government declared a 15-month state of "economic emergency" in an effort to revitalize Nigeria's sluggish economy. It pledged a reduction of bureaucratic and administrative fetters on the economy in order to encourage new private investment. The Government also announced that it would rely on market forces to induce more efficient resource allocation, revitalize moribund industries, and stimulate production of palm oil, cocoa, and other commodities that Nigeria relied on for foreign exchange before the oil boom of the 1970's.

The new Government moved quickly to demonstrate its commitment to human rights. It repealed a controversial decree that inhibited press freedoms, named a panel to review the remaining decrees of the previous government, formed a committee to review the cases of all current and former detainees, as well as those previously sentenced by military tribunals, and named a prominent, outspoken human rights advocate as Attorney General and Minister of Justice. Since the coup, the Government has released approximately 150 persons detained without charges and released or remanded to the criminal court system common criminals detained by the NSO. The traditionally independent judiciary remains intact, although its authority continues to be limited by the existence of military and special tribunals created by decree in 1984. During the first half of 1985, these tribunals convicted civilians of crimes defined by the provisions of certain military decrees.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1

Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no evidence of killing for political motives. No former officeholder or politician ousted by either recent military government and tried by military tribunals has received the death penalty.

b. Disappearance

There are no known instances of politically motivated or government-instigated disappearances in Nigeria during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no confirmed reports of torture in 1985. Some detainees interviewed after the August coup accused the Nigerian Security Organization (NSO) of using torture or degrading practices against them prior to the coup. Those allegations were under investigation at the end of 1985. A portion of the 1979 Constitution which is still in effect outlaws torture and the mistreatment of prisoners. Nigerian law provides that such excesses be dealt with in criminal or civil proceedings. There are reports of crowded and austere prison conditions and mistreatment, including brutality. The opening to public view, following the August coup, of the NSO's main detention center confirmed these reports and revealed the presence of many detainees held without charges for as long as 18 months.

Under the terms of Decree 20, Special Tribunal (Miscellaneous Offenses) Decree, which continues in effect, the previous government extended the death penalty in 1984 to a number of crimes including arson, tampering with oil pipelines or electric or telephone cables, illegal import or export of mineral ore, dealing in narcotics, illegally dealing in petroleum products, counterfeiting, and armed robbery even when no death or injury occurs. Three cocaine traffickers sentenced to death by a special tribunal were executed in April. Two of the three committed their offenses prior to the issuance of Decree 20. The press reported widespread public criticism of these executions by groups of lawyers, judges, and women, among others. Since then, other offenders have been sentenced to death for drug trafficking, but there have been no further known executions for this offense. Subsequently, the Chief of General Staff announced in November that there would no longer be a death penalty for convicted drug traffickers. Executions for armed robbery occurred in 1985 under both governments, which justified these punishments as necessary to restore order and discipline in society.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention of persons, including foreigners, continued in 1985. The State Security (Detention of Persons) Decree, issued as Decree no. 2 in 1984 and still in force, allows for the detention of persons suspected of acts prejudicial to state security or harmful to the economic well-being of the country. The number of persons detained under this decree, which suspends the constitutional guarantee of the right to habeas corpus and cannot be challenged in any court of law, is unknown. Among the foreigners detained under this decree have been several Americans, some of whom were held for several months before being granted consular access or having charges filed against them. One American detained in 1984 for three months without consular access, and held nine months before charges were filed, was acquitted in January by a special tribunal and released. After the August coup, the new Government discovered that some common criminals had been detained without being charged under this decree, some for longer than sentences appropriate to their crimes would have required.

Both governments in power in 1985 released some persons detained under the state security decree. Some of the released persons have had to pay fines, and others must report regularly to the Nigerian Security Organization. Since August, the criminal suspects discovered in detention have been turned over to the criminal court system or released. Among the many persons still detained are former President Shehu Shagari, his Vice President Alex Ekwueme, former Head of State Muhammadu Buhari, and his Chief of Staff Tunde Idiagbon. The postcoup Government has established a panel to review the cases of all current and former detainees, as well as those previously sentenced by military tribunals. The new Government has also established a panel to review all decrees of the previous government, including the State Security Decree. In December, the Government announced formation of a third judicial commission which will be tasked with examining cases of persons held in custody under Decrees 2 and 3 and of persons who have been conditionally released since the August coup.

The military Government does not use forced labor as a means of political coercion or as a sanction against free expression. Nigeria's 1979 Constitution provides that "no person shall be held in slavery or servitude; and no person shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour." The latter excludes community service programs and "normal communal or civic obligations for the well-being of the community." This exception is relevant to special environmental clean-up campaigns launched by the Buhari government that required both government and private sector employees to devote specified amounts of volunteer time cleaning the areas surrounding their places of employment.

No one has been exiled. The current Government has said that self-exiled former politicians are free to return home with the caveat that those suspected of crimes will be subject to prosecution.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Provisions of the 1979 Constitution still in force guarantee persons charged with crimes a fair public trial in civilian courts within three months from the date of arrest. Cumbersome administrative procedures and inefficiency sometimes extend this time period. The Constitution also guarantees notification of charges and access to legal counsel. Such trials are public and adhere to constitutionally guaranteed individual rights. The new Government has assured the judiciary of independence from the executive branch. In capital cases, the Government provides counsel for indigent defendants. In other cases, indigents must rely for counsel on the Nigerian Legal Aid Society, which has limited resources.

NIGERIA

Decrees promulgated by the previous government, which are currently under review, removed certain crimes from the jurisdiction of the civilian judicial system and subjected those charged with these crimes to secret trial by specially constituted tribunals. Decree 3, Recovery of Public Property (Special Military Tribunals), places persons suspected of corrupt practices or of otherwise contributing to the country's economic adversity under the jurisdiction of special military tribunals, chaired by military officers with a federal or state high court justice as a legal advisor. Decree 20 brought persons accused of crimes such as currency violations, accusations against public officials, arson, import and export of certain goods, destruction of public property, and use or possession of drugs under the jurisdiction of other tribunals in which federal or state high court justices headed panels of military and police officers. According to the decrees, all tribunal verdicts are subject to review by the ruling military council which can confirm, overturn, or reduce the penalties with no further appeal allowed. Convicted defendants have generally received the 21-year sentences prescribed by the decrees, but the Supreme Military Council reduced the severity of some sentences upon review. Despite decree provisions prohibiting appeal of tribunal convictions, the Government established in November two panels to review the cases of all persons convicted under Decrees 3, 7, and 20 with a view to upholding, reducing, or overturning the convictions. Distinguished and experienced judges were named to head the panels that will function essentially as courts of appeal.

The Nigerian Bar Association continued in 1985 to urge its members to boycott corruption trials because of the presence of members without legal training on the tribunals, the requirement that the corruption trials be held in camera, and the absence of a right of appeal. Some lawyers have ignored the Bar Association's position and represented the accused. While procedural norms appear to be followed by the tribunals, some defendants have had little time to consult a lawyer or to prepare a defense.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Nigerian society is generally free of arbitrary interference by the State in the private lives of citizens. The modified Nigerian Constitution guarantees rights of privacy in the home, correspondence, and oral electronic communications. General surveillance of the population by the State is not practiced in Nigeria. There is no political enforcement of social, cultural, or religious codes. Forced entry into homes by police and security officials is not generally permitted without the authorization of the judiciary. However, the police and members of the Nigerian Security Organization have occasionally entered homes and offices without a warrant when seeking evidence in corruption cases.

NIGERIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The modified Nigerian Constitution guarantees freedom of expression and the press. The Government fully restored these freedoms immediately after the August coup with the repeal of Decree 4, the Public Officers (Protection Against False Accusation) Decree, which had made it an offense for any person to publish a statement, rumor, message, or report about a government official that was false or designed to subject the government to ridicule. Two journalists convicted in 1984 under provisions of this decree were released from prison in early 1985 after serving their one-year sentences. Following the repeal of Decree 4, the Government released five other journalists who had been detained under Decree 2, the State Security (Detention of Persons) Decree. There is no direct government censorship of the media, including of books, but there was evidence of self-censorship by all media while Decree 4 was in force. Prior to the August 27 coup, private newspapers claimed that the government discriminated against them in the allocation of newsprint. These complaints ceased after the coup.

Among the vast array of Nigerian daily newspapers is one jointly owned by the federal and several northern state governments. Another is owned 60 percent by the federal Government. Four national dailies with large circulations are privately owned. Some state governments operate their own newspapers. In some states, privately owned dailies compete with state papers. There are also no restrictions on ownership of other forms of print media. The Constitution, however, reserves the right to own and operate radio and television stations for the federal and state governments.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political parties, provided for in the 1979 Nigerian Constitution, remain banned. A 1984 decree authorizes the Government to dissolve any other group considered to have objectives similar to those of a political party. Just prior to the August coup, the Buhari government banned public discussion of the country's political future and arrested some journalists and others for allegedly defying the law. In February, the previous government banned the Nigerian Medical Association (NMA) and the National Association of Residential Doctors (NARD) during a strike by doctors in government hospitals that was crushed by this and other tough government measures. This banning remained in force at the end of 1985. The National Union of Nigerian Students (NUNS) remained banned and its offshoot organization, the National Association of Nigerian Students (NANS), is not recognized by the Government. NANS' leaders were, however, found to be not guilty by a regular court in January of meeting for an allegedly illegal purpose five months earlier. In July, the Nigerian National Police arrested six NANS student leaders at the University of Port Harcourt for holding an unauthorized meeting. Following sympathy demonstrations on the Port Harcourt campus and at the University of Ibadan, the police arrested more students and temporarily closed the two campuses.

Nigeria has ratified International Labor Organization (ILO) Conventions 87 (Freedom of Association and Right to Organize) and 98 (Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining).

NIGERIA

Nigerian trade union, social, and professional organizations are guaranteed the right of association by the 1979 Constitution. On the international level, government policy since 1975 has limited union freedom of association to the ILO, the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, and its affiliated Pan-African Labor Federations. Membership is prohibited in such international bodies as the World Federation of Trade Unions and World Confederation of Labor, but "fraternal relations" with foreign trade unions and secretariats are permitted as long as there is no formal affiliation.

Nigeria has 42 industrial unions, one senior staff association, and one professional association that comprise the Nigeria Labour Congress (NLC), the country's single central labor body. Nigeria's industrial union leaders are democratically elected and independent of government control. Thanks to mandatory dues checkoffs, most of the larger industrial unions are financially independent. Some unions, especially small ones, however, are reportedly in serious financial difficulties following three years of depressed economic conditions. All Nigerian workers 16 years or older may join trade unions, except members of the armed forces and designated employees of essential government services at the federal, state, and local levels. Employers are obliged to recognize trade unions and, since 1978, must pay a dues checkoff for employees who are members of a registered trade union. The establishment of closed shops is prohibited.

Nigerian law and practice generally provide that the terms and conditions of labor will be determined by collective bargaining agreements between management and trade unions. However, in 1984 the previous government imposed a national wage freeze and virtually ordered the NLC trade unions to suspend collective bargaining negotiations for one year; the latter order was allowed to lapse in 1985 but the wage freeze was extended. On November 1, the new Government ordered specified wage cuts for all employees in government ministries and bodies, government-owned companies, and educational institutions without regard to preexisting contracts, and without effective consultation with the affected trade unions. The pay cuts were extended into the private sector following government consultations with the Nigeria Labour Congress (NLC) on November 22. The Government also set up a tripartite committee of government, private sector employers, and the NLC to consult on future emergency economic measures, and a decree issued on November 11, the National Economic Emergency Decree, grants the Government broad authority until December 1986 to issue orders pertaining to "labour matters generally," including issues pertaining to trade disputes.

Industrial disputes ordinarily are governed by the 1976 Trade Disputes Decree, which provides for various conciliation and mediation measures by an industrial arbitration panel and a national industrial court. Strikes and lockouts are forbidden while disputes are under consideration by these bodies. In theory this means that most strikes are illegal, but in practice government intervention has varied widely. In previous years, several hundred work stoppages annually were the norm, whereas only 69 occurred between May 1984 and May 1985. This sharp reduction reflected both the weakened bargaining position of unions during depressed economic conditions and the impact of warnings by the ousted government that it would not tolerate industrial indiscipline.

NIGERIA

c. Freedom of Religion

Constitutional provisions of freedom of religion, religious practice, and religious education are generally respected throughout the country. There are reports of harassment of Christians by state officials in the Muslim North in the form of excessive bureaucratic requirements for church construction projects and occasional refusal of permission to build. There are no restrictions on numbers of clergy trained nor on contacts with coreligionists in other countries. Religious travel, including the Hajj, is permitted and in some cases officially supported. Missionaries and foreign clergy are permitted to enter Nigeria but their activities are not encouraged. In June, the federal Government issued a decree requiring licensing of religious services outside churches and mosques.

Nigeria's population is approximately one-half Muslim and more than one-third Christian, with the remainder being mostly adherents of traditional beliefs. Interreligious marriages occur frequently. Islam and Christianity compete for converts and influence throughout much of the country, especially in the belt of states between the predominantly Muslim North and the predominantly Christian South. Polarization between Christian and Islamic communities most often occurs where a "religious difference" is associated with geographic or ethnic differences. There were no reports of incidents between the two communities in 1985. Despite the religious dominance of Islam and Christianity, non-Muslim/non-Christian minority communities generally live under peaceful conditions throughout the country.

The 1982 ban on the Muslim Maitatsine sect remains in effect. The group still exists, however, and was behind the April 1985 disturbances in the northern town of Gombe. Police moved against the rioters, who had threatened to set Gombe on fire unless their leader was released, and killed an estimated 100 people, about half of them Maitatsine followers. An almost equal number were reportedly killed indiscriminately by the rioters themselves. While Nigeria's Constitution prohibits "secret societies," the restrictions against the Muslim Maitatsine sect represent the only publicized example of proscription of a religious sect in Nigeria.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Nigeria's Constitution entitles citizens "to move freely throughout Nigeria and to reside in any part thereof." The same provision states that "no citizen of Nigeria shall be expelled from Nigeria or refused entry thereto or exit therefrom." In general, these provisions have been observed. Some of the detainees released in 1985, however, must report periodically to the Nigerian Security Organization. Police checks on streets and highways impede but do not prevent travel.

The ease of foreign travel has been affected by stringent government restrictions on the amount of Nigerian currency that may be converted for use outside the country and by the fact that Nigeria's land borders have been closed since April 1984. In January, the government lifted restrictions limiting new passports to students or to persons going abroad for official business or emergency medical treatment. At the same time it reduced the validity of newly issued passports from five to two years. In June, the previous government issued a decree authorizing the Minister of Internal Affairs to cancel any passport for specific reasons including the "public interest." There are no reports that this decree has been applied. Nigerians continue to travel abroad in large numbers and many thousands are studying abroad. Exit visas are not required to leave the country.

There has been no forced resettlement of Nigerian citizens, but there was a mass expulsion of foreign citizens in 1985. In mid-March, the government ordered illegal aliens to regularize their status or leave the country by May 10. As in 1983, the government cited illegal employment of aliens and the high crime rate as reasons for the measure. An estimated 700,000 persons were affected, and, according to the Ministry of the Interior, more than half of this number actually left. To facilitate the movement of the aliens, Nigeria opened its land borders for one week. Lengthy administrative procedures, lack of coordination with neighboring countries, and inadequate transport resulted in an estimated 25,000 persons being caught without adequate food, water, shelter, or sanitary facilities at the Benin-Nigerian border when it closed again May 10. According to press accounts, several aliens were killed when the police moved in to quell a riot at the border camp before the aliens were moved to the Lagos airport transit camp. The government denied that any deaths had occurred.

The previous government's expulsion order did not pertain to an estimated 240,000 persons who had moved into northern Nigeria to escape the effects of the severe Sahelian drought in Chad and Niger. Nor did the measure affect bona fide refugees. Nigerian law and practice permit temporary refuge and asylum in Nigeria for political refugees from other countries. Nigeria supports and cooperates with the work of the Lagos office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

No known penalties have been levied on Nigerians who have emigrated, settled abroad, or acquired another nationality. However, Nigeria does not recognize dual nationality, and naturalization in another country does not release Nigerians from Nigerian laws.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Armed Forces Ruling Council (AFRC), a 28-member group of military officers headed by President Babangida, is the highest political authority in Nigeria and the principal decisionmaking body in the Government. It replaced the defunct Supreme Military Council (SMC) of the overthrown government. There is no legislative body, and political parties are prohibited. The AFRC promulgates all laws by decree, and all decrees are exempt from challenge in any court of law. The President appoints a federal cabinet, currently comprised of 22 military and civilian ministers in almost equal numbers, which presides over the executive departments. Military governors head the 19 state governments. Each state has an executive council of military and police officers and some civilian commissioners. Together with the President, the 19 state governors constitute a National Council of States.

NIGERIA

The new Government announced in October that in 1986 it would present a political plan for the future governance of the country, but it has made no explicit statements about returning Nigeria to civilian rule or holding elections within a multiparty framework as occurred in 1979 and 1983.

Although no formal political structures exist to allow popular input into political decisionmaking, the new Government has stated that it intends to govern in the interest of the people and has taken steps to solicit popular opinion on crucial issues. For example, the Government threw open to public debate the question of whether Nigeria should accept an International Monetary Fund (IMF) stabilization agreement.

The public debate was conducted primarily in the media, in forums of Nigeria's multitude of professional organizations and associations, and before a specially constituted government panel. Nigeria's foreign policy and its future political system will be debated in a similar manner in 1986. The composition of the current Government reflects greater ethnic and religious diversity than any government in the recent past. However, there are currently no women on the AFRC or in the federal cabinet, although some women serve as commissioners in state governments.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Even during a period which has seen the suspension of democratic government and the conduct of extrajudicial trials held in secret, Nigeria remained a relatively open society. Amnesty International maintains an office in Lagos and circulates a monthly newsletter. Its annual human rights reports receive prominent coverage in the press, including its 1985 report.

The human rights committee of the Nigerian Bar Association (NBA) monitors the domestic human rights situation and has consistently gone on record against human rights abuses. It spoke out against the creation of military and special tribunals to try civilians, criticizing their composition and their secrecy, and has called on NBA members to boycott those trials chaired by military men instead of trained judges. The Government has not taken action against the organization for this stand. In fact, the newly appointed Attorney General and Minister of Justice is the ex-chairman of the NBA human rights committee.

The Amnesty International 1985 report (covering 1984) inter alia expressed concern that political prisoners were tried by tribunals using procedures which fell short of internationally recognized standards. It also noted that many of the 111 or more people executed in 1984 had been convicted by tribunals which did not permit any judicial appeal. Freedom House rates Nigeria "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Nigeria's population is estimated at 100 million. With 47 percent of the population currently under 15 years of age and an estimated growth rate of 3.2 percent per year, the total population may double within the next 20 years. The World Bank estimated 1983 per capita gross national product (GNP) at $770. This is a drop of almost $100 from 1982, reflecting the general economic downturn and population increases. The figure has probably continued to decline. The per capita GNP figure can also be misleading, as oil exports account for most of the country's revenue, and a large part of the rural population is only marginally involved in Nigeria's cash economy.

In the past three years, Nigerians have had to adjust to reduced petroleum revenues, steep inflation, and a decline in economic activity. Particularly affected has been the capital, Lagos, where inadequate facilities for water, electricity, housing, and other services have been overwhelmed. Poor urban dwellers face high unemployment, squalid living conditions, rising costs, and serious crime. Nevertheless, the fruits of development, such as road networks, public health facilities, public school systems, airports, electrification, and mass communications, are more accessible to urban dwellers than to the rural majority who are still dependent on agricultural production.

There is virtually no starvation in Nigeria. Although economic difficulties continue to create periodic shortages of imported foodstuffs, good rains in 1985 are likely to produce bumper crops in some areas following several years of poor harvests. The World Bank estimates that the average Nigerian receives 98 percent of daily nutritional requirements. Nevertheless, as in most developing countries, the possibility of malnutrition still exists and was reported in northern Nigeria before the harvest. Life expectancy at birth is 50 years, while infant mortality is estimated by the World Bank at 135 per 1,000 live births. The adult literacy rate was estimated at 34 percent in 1980. The World Bank estimated that primary school enrollment in 1979 was 88 percent of the relevant age group.

A 1984 decision to reduce the number of educational facilities at all levels and to impose fees and abolish subsidies at some levels is also reflective of the policy of the new Government. Five federal universities and all private universities have been closed while plans for additional state universities have been dropped. Many primary and secondary schools have been closed or merged, while polytechnical colleges have been reduced in number. Almost all states require school fees for secondary school students, and federal subsidies for room and board have been abolished. It is too soon to tell whether these measures have had any significant impact on enrollment figures.

The 1974 labor decree forbids industrial and commercial employment of children under 15, and restricts other child labor to home-based agricultural or domestic work. The decree also provides a number of special health and safety provisions to protect young and female workers, in addition to general provisions with respect to hours of work and occupational health and safety. It allows the apprenticeship of youth 13-15 under specified conditions, including a written contract approved by a government labor officer.

Normal working hours in commerce and industry are 40 hours weekly, with 2 to 4 weeks annual leave. Nigeria's minimum hourly wage for commerce and industry is about $1.40, one of the highest in Africa. Employers must compensate injured workers and dependent survivors of those fatally injured in industrial accidents. The 1974 Labor Decree and the Factories Act provide for government establishment and enforcement of occupational health and safety standards under the Ministry of Employment, Labour, and Productivity.

Women in Nigeria have always had economic power and have exerted influence in the society through women's councils or through their family connections. There has been a dramatic increase in the number of women who have university degrees and who have become professionals, including teachers, lawyers, doctors, judges, senior government officials, media figures, and business executives. The new Government has named the first woman Vice Chancellor of one of the country's universities. But the status of women remains ambiguous. Despite a degree of economic independence, women suffer legal discrimination, experience social inferiority, have virtually no representation in the political arena, and are commonly discriminated against in employment. The pattern and specific features of discrimination against women vary according to the ethnic and religious diversity of Nigeria's vast population. In some states husbands can prevent their wives from obtaining employment or passports. In many states a widow cannot inherit her husband's property, which in the absence of children usually reverts to the husband's family. Women do not receive equal pay for equal work. Male professionals receive fringe benefits not extended to their female counterparts. Female circumcision, which has never become a major public issue, is still practiced in many areas.

There is no systematic discrimination among Nigeria's diverse ethnic and religious groups, although tensions among them do exist and tradition imposes considerable pressure on individual government officials to favor members of their own ethnic, regional, or religious group. Laws do not favor one group over another. To the contrary, there is generally a conscious effort to strike a balance among different groups in key governmental positions and decisions.

RWANDA

Rwanda's present Government, under Major General Juvenal Habyarimana, came to power in a nonviolent coup in 1973. The President is also the founder of the single party, the National Revolutionary Movement for Development. Government policy is set by the President in consultation with the party's central committee and the Council of Ministers. Laws are adopted by the National Development Council (the legislature), which was established in 1982. In December 1983, President Habyarimana, the sole candidate, was reelected along with a new slate of deputies. Although the legislative candidates had to be approved by the party, the race was open to almost all who chose to run.

The major organizations responsible for administration of justice in Rwanda include the Ministry of Justice--law courts, judicial police, and the prison system--and the gendarmerie, the police force which is recruited in parallel with the army but receives specialized police training. In addition, the Office of the President includes the Central Intelligence Service which can make certain decisions which may not be appealed, such as denial of passports to Rwandan citizens for travel abroad or the extension of visas and residence permits to foreigners.

Most Rwandans are poor rural farmers. There is little industry, and imports are expensive because of high transportation costs. Nevertheless, Rwandan economic development has managed to keep pace with the country's high population growth rate.

The human rights situation in Rwanda continued gradually to improve in 1985. The President again stressed the nation's commitment to human rights, including in his speech on Rwanda's national day in July 1985. The Government also concentrated on a series of training seminars for persons involved in the administration of justice, continued to release prisoners who had served at least half of their sentences, and made efforts to improve the treatment of prisoners. In 1985, 36 prisoners convicted of political crimes were conditionally released.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings or summary executions in Rwanda in 1985.

b. Disappearance

Unexplained disappearances have not occurred in recent years.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

According to Amnesty International's 1985 Report (covering 1984), there have been allegations of torture made in court by political prisoners, involving forced confessions and electrical shocks. However, Amnesty International also noted the Minister of Justice's efforts to punish security and police forces found to have ill-treated prisoners.

Corporal punishment is not permitted, but neglect, overcrowding, and inadequate guard training have rendered prison conditions generally poor. The Government attempts to cope with overcrowding in part by periodic amnesties of persons who have served half their terms or have fewer than 5 years to serve. The most recent such amnesty was announced in July 1985. A new prison with improved facilities opened near Kigali, and more facilities are planned for the future. The Minister of Justice has made the improvement of the prison system his first priority. A seminar held for directors of prisons in March 1985 emphasized the right of prisoners to be treated humanely and with dignity. All categories of prisoners may now have monthly visits by their families.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Except for suspects caught committing crimes, arrests normally occur with a warrant following investigation. Except in rare cases where the defendant is not available, charges must be formally stated in the defendant's presence within 5 days of arrest. Failure to meet that requirement is grounds for dismissal of the charges. Under preventive detention provisions, however, persons may be held for 30 days. At the end of that period, a judicial review is mandatory. If warranted, the detention can be prolonged indefinitely for 30-day periods. These provisions have not been invoked during the past year. Detainees may appeal their incarceration, and the appeal must be heard within 24 hours by a competent judicial authority. There were no known exceptions to the legally mandated warrant procedures and no detentions for political offenses in 1985. The Justice Ministry has initiated a program of official visits to prisons to ascertain that the proper documentation exists for each detainee.

Rwandan law prohibits forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although all defendants are constitutionally entitled to representation, a shortage of lawyers makes it difficult for the accused to prepare an adequate defense. Family and other nonprofessional counsel is permitted. Trials which arouse extensive public interest are often broadcast to the street, so that persons who cannot be seated in the courtroom may still follow the proceedings.

The judiciary is statutorily independent and expected to apply the penal code impartially, but the President names and dismisses magistrates. New laws in January 1982 strengthened the independence of the judiciary somewhat by improving the nomination process and more closely defining the functions of judicial personnel. Rwanda has three separate court systems for criminal/civil, military, and state security cases. All but security cases may ultimately be appealed to the court of appeals. The state security court has jurisdiction over national security charges such as treason. Some cases tried before this court have resulted in innocent verdicts.

In 1985, 36 persons convicted of political crimes were granted conditional release from prison. Thirty-three of them had been held since 1960 for activities committed during the revolution. The others had been convicted in 1983 of having distributed seditious documents and were adopted by Amnesty International as prisoners of conscience.

Theoneste Lizinde, former Chief of State Security, who is already serving a life sentence for a 1981 conviction of plotting to overthrow the Government, was tried for a second time in May 1985. In the 1985 trial, Lizinde and 11 others were tried on charges of murder, torture, and other crimes against human rights for activities committed in the aftermath of Habyarimana's 1973 coup. The defendants were accused of torturing and killing 55 prisoners, including many former cabinet ministers. Ten of the defendants, including Lizinde and the former Ruhengeri Prison Director, were convicted. The other defendant was acquitted. Lizinde and four codefendants were sentenced to death, while the others received varying prison sentences. The appeals process has yet to run its course, so it is uncertain whether the death sentences will actually be carried out. Those convicted, along with the Rwandan State, are also being held responsible for indemnifying the victim's families.

In August 1985, four persons were tried for political crimes committed between 1960 and 1981. One of the defendants was acquitted; two others received sentences of 2 and 7 years respectively, and the fourth, Aloys Ngurumbe, was sentenced to life imprisonment for fomenting an armed rebellion against the Government.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Rwandans are subject to some interference in their private lives, following practices inherited from the former monarchy which ruled the country for several hundred years. Police are normally required to have warrants before entering a private residence, but, using the pretext of checking required documentation, authorities can gain unwarranted entry into homes. A person may move out of his home commune only with the permission of the mayor of the commune into which he wishes to move; the Government can bar a person from specific employment, but not all employment; and all citizens must carry identification cards. On the other hand, there is no evidence that the Government monitors private correspondence, and the receipt of foreign publications is permitted. Rwandans have the right to own property.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The law guarantees freedom of speech and press, but public criticism of the Government is conspicuously lacking. This is probably due as much to the tradition of respecting authority as to fear of sanctions. Candidates in the 1983 legislative elections were restricted to expressing opinions and advocating policies sanctioned by party doctrine. However, some members of the National Development Council have criticized government policies from the floor of the Council.

The Government produces radio broadcasts, a daily press bulletin, and a weekly newspaper. Two Catholic church publications sometimes print muted criticism of political and economic conditions. Such criticism is tolerated and occasionally even encouraged by the Government. There is no record of any journalist having been arrested for what he has written. The Government has cautioned the press, however, to avoid what it regards as "harmful" criticism of leaders and maintains that the press should devote its efforts to "promoting development." Books and imported publications are not censored, and academic freedom of inquiry and research is respected at universities.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is limited. There have been no public meetings or demonstrations to express overt opposition to government policies. The Government permits private associations but requires that they be registered and accorded legal recognition.

The Rwandan Labor Code grants workers the right to organize "professional organizations." If such organizations establish a collective bargaining agreement with the employer, they may negotiate salaries and terms of employment. No unions currently exist in Rwanda, but the Government is in the process of forming a labor confederation. This confederation is expected to begin functioning in early 1987. It is organized under the guidance of the party, which must approve its choice of officers, and hence will be limited in its independence. All member unions will have the right to strike, but only with the approval of the confederation executive bureau. In meetings prefatory to the confederation's creation, the responsibility of labor to contribute to the development of the nation and to transcend the parochial interests of individual workers and trades were recurrent themes. The Government has permitted seminars on labor issues, organized by unofficial local labor bodies, which receive some support from foreign labor confederations and the International Labor Organization.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. The population is 70 percent Christian and 1 percent Muslim, with the remainder following traditional African or no religious practices. Eighty percent of the Christians are Catholic, but there are active Protestant denominations. The Government does not openly favor one religion over another, although the Catholic Archbishop of Kigali is a member of the party's central committee, and all but one or two members of the National Development Council are Catholic. The Government depends upon church-sponsored schools for a considerable portion of education in Rwanda (over 85 percent of secondary schools are church sponsored).

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of residence within Rwanda is restricted by laws and regulations which require people to hold national identity cards and residence and work permits. People who wish to spend more than 3 days in a commune other than their own must obtain permission from the authorities of the communes they will be visiting. Property owners who do not require renters to show valid documentation are subject to fines and even imprisonment. "Clandestine" renters are subject to expulsion.

RWANDA

Foreign travel is closely controlled through the granting or refusal of passports, preceded by a security check of each applicant under the auspices of the Central Intelligence Service. Rwandans often are denied permission to travel abroad, usually without formal explanation. In addition, they must pay a refundable deposit of about $400 for each passport issued for unofficial travel. This is ostensibly to cover the cost of any subsequent repatriation, but it has the effects of discouraging travel and conserving foreign exchange.

Rwandans may emigrate provided they are properly documented. Official policy states that people who left Rwanda as refugees during the revolution or for other reasons may be repatriated on a case-by-case basis. Refugees and displaced persons can and do return for short family visits on a laissez-passer from the country of refuge. Family members remaining in Rwanda may also obtain a laissez-passer for visits to neighboring countries, without having to go through all the formalities of a passport application. Rwanda's extremely high population density and shortage of land greatly restrict prospects for repatriation and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons. However, the Government has recognized the citizenship claims of some of the refugees and displaced persons forced into the country from Uganda in October 1982; and in late 1985, it began resettling some of those recognized as Rwandans.

The 1985 coup in Uganda caused a major upheaval in the status of the 30,000 Ugandan refugees in Rwanda. Following the ouster of President Obote, the Ugandans felt it was safe to return to the land and houses they had abandoned in their homeland. The Ugandan Government had already accepted the citizenship claims of about 90 percent of these people, but before any orderly resettlement process could be negotiated with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other agencies, the refugees began moving back to Uganda. The Rwandan Government assisted this movement by providing extra rations for those willing to leave, buses to take them to the border, and similar strong incentives. During a period of confusion, many departed Rwanda. At the same time, services such as food distribution, woodcutting, and the like became disrupted among the refugees remaining behind. Ultimately, the Ugandan Government recognized the movement back across the borders, and the last Ugandan citizen among the refugees left in November 1985.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Rwandans have no opportunity to change their government through a free choice of alternative legislative proposals and candidates from opposing parties for public office. All policy decisions and nominations of candidates for public office are made by the party, which is the "sole body permitted political activity." The party in turn is dominated by its president, who chooses the Secretary-General and central committee and is the only constitutionally recognized candidate for President of the nation.

Every citizen is automatically a member of the party and theoretically must pay party dues on a sliding scale representing 1 or 2 days pay per year. Delegates are elected and appointed to the governing National Congress, which meets every 2 years (most recently in December 1985). The essential function of the congress is to endorse the programs presented by the party leadership.

Only candidates approved by the party may run for public office. The President can veto candidates for the legislative seats of the National Development Council. At the local level, representatives are expected to be responsive to the voters, as demonstrated by the fact that many incumbents were defeated in 1985 elections.

Rwanda's preindependence traditional feudal society, dominated by the Tutsi ethnic group (10 percent of the population, according to the 1978 census), was transformed in 1959 by a revolution of the majority Hutu (89 percent of the population) into a society with a stronger emphasis on individual rights. An ethnic majority government confirmed these internal changes at independence in 1962. During the next decade, Hutu efforts to redress the social, economic, and educational imbalance led to division and corruption among the Hutus and to sporadic ethnic strife. This gave rise to the coup d'etat which brought President Habyarimana to power.

Women play a marginal role in political life. Nevertheless, there is 1 woman in the party's 21-member central committee, 9 of 70 legislative deputies are women, and there are a good number of women council members at the local level.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Rwanda has made a concentrated effort in recent years to participate in human rights activities and to improve its human rights record. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) have made periodic visits to prisons. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International was concerned about the continued imprisonment of a number of prisoners of conscience but also noted that some had been released and that the Minister of Justice and Kigali's Roman Catholic Archbishop had investigated allegations of harsh prisons conditions. The results of this latter investigation have not been published. There were no reports of requests for outside investigations of alleged human rights violations in 1985. Freedom House rated Rwanda "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Rwanda is one of the world's poorest and most densely populated countries (6.3 million people and 3.8 percent annual population growth in 1985). Gross national product (GNP) per capita has more than doubled since 1970, but still totaled only $270 in 1983. Some 95 percent of Rwandans earn their living from subsistence farms averaging less than two acres. Urban residents are marginally more prosperous than rural farmers but suffer unemployment, with wages lagging behind moderate inflation. In the mid-1970s, 30 percent of urban dwellers and 90 percent of rural inhabitants were estimated to be living below the absolute poverty level.

Rwanda's principal export crop is coffee, which accounts for about 70 percent of foreign exchange earnings and provides the bulk of government revenues. The country has little industry and must pay high transportation costs to move goods along a 1,100-mile road and railroad link to the sea via Uganda and Kenya. The 1985 coup and fighting in Uganda effectively blocked this route, forcing Rwanda to transport its imports and exports via the less well-developed roads of Tanzania, thereby incurring even higher transportation costs. Real economic growth in recent years has stayed ahead of population growth, but prospects that it will continue to do so in the long term are dim. Rwanda's trade, investment and banking policies encourage private-sector economic activity. About 85 percent of Rwanda's small businessmen are Rwandans, and the proportion is growing. The Rwandan Government has undertaken a series of reforms aimed at stimulating labor intensive industry as well as encouraging privatization and trade liberalization. Foreign investment is currently stagnant, due primarily to the inadequate transportation infrastructure.

Development goals and projects address all regions and population groups equally. Life expectancy has increased from 41 years in 1968 to about 47 years in 1985, while infant mortality has remained at a level of about 124 per 1,000 live births. In 1977, Rwandans received about 87 percent of their caloric nutritional requirements, and 54 percent of the population had access to safe water in 1980. Adult literacy was estimated at 50 percent in 1980, and primary school enrollment as a percentage of primary school age children in the population expanded from 49 percent in 1960 to 83 percent in 1982 (male 87 percent, female 81 percent).

Children under 18 are not permitted to work without their guardian's authorization, and they may not work at night except under exceptional circumstances on a temporary basis. The Minister responsible for labor affairs may grant work permission to a child under 14. This Minister also sets the minimum wage and overtime rates. Hours of work and occupational health and safety are controlled by law and enforced by labor inspectors.

Women perform most of the agricultural labor and have benefited less than men from social development. Despite the language in the Constitution, women's rights to property are limited, and women are not treated equally in divorce proceedings. Moreover, women have fewer chances for education, employment, and promotion, often because men prefer them to remain in uneducated traditional roles at home. Family planning services are still inadequate but are improving. There are virtually no day care services for children of mothers who wish to work. There are few organizations promoting women's interests, and efforts to establish a national union of Rwandan women within the political movement have been unsuccessful to date. However, in 1985, the Ministry of Public Health and Social Affairs held a 3-day seminar to examine the problems of women working in urban areas, possibly indicating increased attention to this subject by the Government.

The Constitution states, "all citizens are equal before the law, without any discrimination, notably that of race, color, origin, ethnicity, clan, sex, opinion, religion or social position." However, the requirement that ethnic origin be listed on identity documents helps to ensure that informal quotas corresponding to the Hutu/Tutsi ratio in society are not exceeded. The Tutsi minority has in fact been relegated to a minor role in government, civil service, and the military but is better represented in private business.

SAO TOME & PRINCIPE*

Sao Tome and Principe has been a one-party state since gaining independence from Portugal in July 1975. Effective political power is concentrated in the Presidency and the party, the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe. The country is composed of two small islands off the west coast of Africa with a total population of about 105,000. At independence, Manuel Pinto Da Costa, the leader of the political party, was chosen President without opposition by the party and the Popular Assembly, constitutionally the supreme organ of State and highest legislative body. The party reconfirmed him for a third 5-year term in September 1985.

No political opposition is permitted outside the party. Small opposition groups in exile in Portugal and Gabon have thus far shown no evidence of being able to influence events on the islands. There is no known organized political opposition in Sao Tome itself. There are a few Soviet and Cuban military advisors, and the small Sao Tomean army is reinforced by troops from Angola.

In the past the Government drew heavily on Marxist-Leninist principles, stressing state control of the means of production. With a deteriorating economic situation, state control was reduced in 1984-85, and the private sector was strengthened. The steady decline in cocoa exports, which account for 90 percent of Sao Tome's exports, reflected both lower world prices and serious management problems on the nationalized plantations. Lack of adequate rain since 1983 has further reduced all agricultural crops, resulting in serious food shortages and the need for food assistance from the United States and other Western countries.

There was no known change in the overall human rights situation in 1985. Freedoms of speech, press, and assembly are circumscribed, but some public criticism of government policies is permitted. All news media are under government control.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

No reports of such abuses were received in 1985.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Eight Sao Tomeans were arrested in 1984 and detained without trial because of public criticism of the Government. These included persons detained for expressing open dissatisfaction with the Government's handling of the food situation. These detainees may have been released. Also, in late 1984, the appearance of antigovernment tracts in Sao Tome led to the cancellation of a number of exit permits and reported imprisonment of those persons held responsible. However, there have been no recent reports of people being detained.

There have been no reports of the use of forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution does not address the right to a public trial, but there have been instances of public trials of persons accused of common crimes in recent years. Criminal trials are occasionally reported by the local media. In most cases, however, common criminals are given a hearing and sentenced by a judge. To date the only political prisoners given trials were those accused of coup-plotting in 1977. In those trials and in criminal trials since that time, the accused were assigned counsel by the Government. There is no tradition of independent defense counsel. Common criminals are given a hearing and sentenced by a judge.

As of the end of 1985, the Government claimed that it held no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Because of Sao Tome's geographic isolation and its small population, the Government does not have a highly intrusive security system to detect opposition opinion. However, the Government's loosely organized system of informers, and its monitoring of political activities ensure that potential dissidents are identified.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The security services are alert and react quickly to public expressions of opposition or dissatisfaction with the Government. All Sao Tomean media are government organs and consist of one television station which broadcasts 2 days per week; a radio station which carries music, government news releases, and instructional programs; and a weekly two-to-four page newspaper of government news releases. No public written criticism of the Government seems to be tolerated, but oral criticism at party-sponsored meetings exists. The only foreign wire service items are occasional items from Soviet and Angolan sources. Voice of America Portuguese language programs reach Sao Tome and are listened to without interference. Sao Tome Radio also uses VOA taped music programs.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political assembly and activity are legal only within the country's sole political party, the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe. Cultural and social organizations require government approval, which is believed to be easily obtained.

In the past, the sole trade union, which was affiliated with the party, existed mainly on paper. Recent efforts have been undertaken to organize a new union, which will be theoretically independent of the Government, but the Minister of Justice is spearheading this organizing effort, and the rights of this new union to bargain collectively are as yet undetermined. Its plans for international affiliations are also not yet known. There is no explicit legislation forbidding strikes, but no strikes have taken place in recent years.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious freedom is guaranteed by the Constitution. The three religious communities--Roman Catholic, Evangelical Protestant, and Seventh-Day Adventist--are allowed to practice freely. The Government provides some funding for a school and a social services center managed by the Catholic Church.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The geographic isolation and poverty of the country severely limit foreign travel and emigration. In addition the Government closely controls exit visas for the few people who do travel. Almost all trips outside the islands are for governmental missions or medical evacuation. Domestic travel is not controlled by the Government, and people move freely on the islands of Sao Tome and Principe. The lack of reliable and affordable air service severely limits interisland travel.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Government policy is determined by President Da Costa, in consultation with his key cabinet and security officials. The leadership uses the single political party to consolidate its rule at the local levels and to assist in selecting candidates for the Popular Assembly. In the 1985 elections to the Popular Assembly, persons at local levels were allowed, even encouraged, to speak out and to give their opinions on various government policies. In many districts, the voters rejected the official party candidate in favor of another candidate. There are small exile groups in Portugal and Gabon. Internal security is reinforced by Angolan troops.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

The extent to which the Government is cognizant of or influenced by international human rights organizations is not known. Amnesty International did not have an entry on Sao Tome in its 1985 Report. Several persons cited by Amnesty International in its 1984 Report have been released, including Albertino Neto, the former Chief of the Armed Forces, who was imprisoned from 1977 until July 1983, when he was one of nine detainees who were amnestied. Freedom House rated Sao Tome "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sao Tome's population of 105,000 is growing at the rate of 2 percent annually. The country's per capita gross domestic product, which had been estimated as high as $450 in the late 1970's, is believed to have dropped to about $364 by 1983 as a result of the steady deterioration of the economy, due largely to the decline in value and volume of cocoa exports.

SAO TOME & PRINCIPE

The country is dependent on imported foodstuffs for a varied diet, and the lack of foreign exchange in recent years has caused shortages of many staple foods and consumer products. Malnutrition was emerging as a problem, but large amounts of international food assistance sent to Sao Tome in 1984 have alleviated the situation.

The Government has made a major effort to improve social and educational services reportedly including free basic medical care. In 1985, life expectancy at birth was 66 years, and infant mortality was 64 per 1,000 live births. Approximately 80 percent of the population has access to potable water. Adult literacy is about 43 percent. The primary school enrollment ratio for 1982 was 111 percent, (male children 112 percent and female 108 percent). There is also an active adult evening education program.

Legislation requires that a minimum wage of approximately $65 per month be paid to workers. A legal minimum employment age of 18 years is apparently observed in practice. Basic occupational health and safety standards are established in the Social Security Law of 1979. Members of the island's small educated class appear to enjoy advantages in government employment possibilities.

Women have constitutional guarantees of equality, and several are active in public life. One senior official, the Minister of Education and Culture, is a woman, as is the President of the Popular Assembly. There are at least two female members of the central committee of the party. Cultural factors, rather than legal or political restraints, limit the actual participation of women in government.

The Sao Tome population is relatively homogeneous, and there have been no reports of policy discrimination on a tribal, regional, sexual, or religious basis among Sao Tomean citizens. As energetic outsiders, Cape Verdeans in Sao Tome do suffer some informal discrimination.

SENEGAL

Senegal is a Republic with a democratically elected President and a unicameral Parliament. After acceding automatically to the presidency in January 1981, when former President Leopold Senghor retired, Abdou Diouf was elected in his own right in freely contested elections in February 1983. A new Parliament was elected at the same time with President Diouf's Socialist Party winning 111 of the 120 seats. Senegal has longstanding democratic traditions which predate independence, and there is wide public interest in, and debate on, political matters. While the Socialist Party has dominated the political scene since independence from France in 1960, Senegal is a true multiparty state and has 16 legal political parties.

The Senegalese military has a reputation as an apolitical and professional organization, respected by the population. The civilian security forces are generally well-trained and disciplined and respect the laws they enforce.

Although the Senegalese Government describes the nation's economy as Socialist--and the Socialist Party is a member of the Socialist International--the private sector is important and growing. Economic concerns grew again in 1985 as the Government began to implement a series of policies--raising prices while keeping wages down--aimed at reducing deficits and subsidies.

Long and short-term trends in the human rights context remain positive. The legal system is active and effective in protecting human rights. Concerns about the fairness of the political system are regularly raised by opposition party leaders, but on the whole the system works well. The growth of Islamic fundamentalism and the increase in the crime rate due to economic pressures remain worrisome because of their potential impact on human rights. There were no credible reports of major human rights violations in 1985, but an editor of an opposition newspaper was arrested on charges of defamation of the President. The Government continues to support the work of Dakar-based human rights organizations in Africa.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

There is no evidence of any killings at government instigation or for political motives.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of abduction of individuals by official, quasi-official, opposition, or vigilante groups.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Government officials in Senegal generally respect the constitutional theme that the person is sacred and they adhere to the section of the criminal code prohibiting physical abuse. There have been, however, instances reported of the use of force by lower level police officials in the interrogation of suspected criminals. In its 1985 report, Amnesty International noted that it had received information suggesting a number of those arrested in late 1983, following the Casamance separatist riots, had been subjected to torture, including severe beatings and electrical shocks. Prison conditions are crowded and food is little above the subsistence level. Harsh prison conditions are to some extent alleviated by the access to prisoners by clerics, friends, and families, who are permitted to provide food and amenities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The constitutional prohibition against arbitrary arrest or detention is respected in practice. Persons are not detained, punished, or tried for the expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government. However, preventive detention is permitted when civil authorities determine that there is a threat of civil disturbance or the person is a danger to himself or others. Amnesty International in its 1985 report expressed concern about the prolonged pretrial detention of people arrested in connection with the autonomist movement in Casamance. The Senegalese legal system is patterned after the French system and does not include habeas corpus. A person suspected of a crime may be legally held without charge for 48 hours after arrest or up to 72 hours if ordered by a public prosecutor. The limitations of this provision of law are in almost all cases respected, and charges are formally and clearly drawn. By law, every citizen has access to legal counsel of his choice in every aspect of legal procedure. In practice, persons with means will have private legal counsel, and the law makes provisions for public defenders for those without funds. There is no forced or compulsory labor in Senegal.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Senegal has an active, independent, and well-trained judiciary, which is constitutionally independent of the executive, the legislature, and the military. Court officials are trained lawyers who have completed a number of years of required apprenticeship. Trials are open to the public, and defendants have the right to a defense counsel, many of whom are very skilled and aggressive in the protection of their clients. Ordinary courts hold hearings which are presided over by a panel of judges and, in the case of criminal charges, include a jury. There are three categories of courts: the High Court of Justice, the security ("political") court, and the military courts.

The High Court of Justice was created for the sole purpose of trying high government officials for treason or malfeasance. This Court has not been convened since the early 1970's. The security (or "political") court consists of a judge and two assessors. It has jurisdiction over cases referred to it by the Government when it is suspected that a crime has been committed for a political motive. The security court has not been active since 1984 when it met to hear cases arising out of a series of separatist riots in the Casamance region.

The military court system has jurisdiction over offenses committed by members of the armed forces during peacetime (in wartime, courts martial could be convened). Civilians may not be tried by military courts.

SENEGAL

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Senegalese bureaucracy, patterned after the French system, is highly centralized and requires of Senegalese citizens a fairly extensive array of documentation for purposes of education, obtaining social security benefits, etc. The intent, however, is not coercive and there is otherwise little government interference in the private lives of Senegalese citizens. There is no coercion to join a particular political party or to participate in political demonstrations. A wide variety of political expression is possible and is not subject to restrictions other than those relating to public order. There is no evident pattern of monitoring the private written or oral correspondence of Senegalese citizens. Foreign publications are not banned or censored. There are inviolable constitutional and legal safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home. Search warrants are required and may be issued only by judges and in accordance with procedures established by law. There is no evidence that public security forces have violated the law in this regard.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Senegal enjoys freedom of speech and press in theory and in practice. The Constitution guarantees the right of each person to express and disseminate opinions freely. There are several regularly published newspapers and magazines and a number of publications which appear sporadically, reflecting a broad range of opinion from conservative to Marxist. The country's most professional and informative newspaper is controlled by, and supports, the majority Socialist Party. However, articles critical of government policies and officials regularly appear even in this newspaper.

In August 1985, the editor of an opposition publication was arrested and charged with defamation of the chief of state and the Government after his magazine published an article accusing members of the President's family and entourage of corruption. Opposition leaders described this as an attempt to muzzle the media. Other publications, representing other viewpoints, are sometimes vociferously critical of the Government.

Academic freedom is enjoyed without hindrance by the schools and the country's sole university. Television and radio stations are owned by the Government, but coverage is regularly given to the activities of all political parties.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Senegalese freely and frequently exercise their constitutional right of assembly. Prior authorization for public demonstration is required. Demonstrations or protest meetings against government policies are closely monitored by the security services. In August 1985, the Government refused permission for a protest march organized by the opposition parties, not because it objected to the march (which was to criticize apartheid), but because the Government believed the timing and route of the planned demonstration were calculated to cause the maximum disruption to normal business and traffic in downtown Dakar. When a few opposition supporters assembled at the scheduled time and place, police quickly moved in, dispersed the group, and arrested several opposition leaders, including two National Assembly deputies. They were charged with holding an unauthorized demonstration. When the case came to trial, the magistrate dismissed it, saying that the police had moved so quickly that no demonstration had ever started. In October, the Government again refused authorization for a demonstration by the same group of opposition parties, because it allegedly posed a threat to public safety.

Workers have the right of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively and strike if negotiations are unsuccessful. The major trade union confederation, the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers (CNTS), is affiliated with the ruling Socialist Party. There are also small independent trade unions which are important to the society and economy of Senegal. Less than 25 percent of the labor force is unionized. The CNTS is entitled by law to ministerial posts, but rather than fill them itself has chosen to retain the right to veto the President's nominations. In the past, the Government has used its connection with the Confederation as a useful means of informing workers of government policies, gaining better understanding of worker grievances, and ensuring that strikes are legal and called only over significant grievances. A wildcat strike by a nonaffiliated union of transport drivers reduced traffic in Dakar considerably for a few days during September. The leader of the union was sentenced to a year in jail for leading the strike. In that instance, as in most union activities in Senegal, economic and work-related issues are the principal concerns. The International Labor Organization maintains a regional office in Senegal.

Senegal is constitutionally a secular state, and freedom of religion is a legal right which exists in fact. Islam is the religion of over 85 percent of the population. Other religions, primarily Catholicism, are freely practiced. Missionary activity is permitted, and foreign Protestant missionaries are active in several regions of the country. Conversion is permitted; there is no discrimination against minority religions; and adherence to a particular religion confers neither advantage nor disadvantage in civil, political, economic, military, or other sectors.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Senegalese Constitution states that all citizens have the right to move and establish themselves freely anywhere in Senegal, a right that is respected in practice. In 1981, the Government abolished a requirement for exit visas to travel outside the country. There is no restriction on emigration, nor are there sanctions, official or otherwise, against intending emigrants. Repatriates are not officially disadvantaged on return to Senegal.

Senegal is host to 5,140 recognized and assisted refugees. Prior to the April 3, 1984 coup in Guinea, there were an estimated 500,000-600,000 Guineans in Senegal most of whom were not recognized as refugees. Most appear to have returned to Guinea. There is a regional office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) office in Dakar. Senegal continues to make places available for refugee students from other countries at the University of Dakar and other educational institutions. There are no known cases of forcible repatriation by the Senegalese Government.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Senegal is a functioning multiparty democracy. There are currently 16 legally registered parties, ranging from conservative to Trotskyite. Presidential and parliamentary elections were last held in February 1983, with rural and municipal elections in November 1984. While there has been a long tradition of democracy in Senegal, political life throughout the post-independence period has been dominated by the Socialist Party, which won the presidency and 111 of the 120 seats in the National Assembly in the 1983 elections. There were some complaints at that time, and again during rural and municipal elections, that voting irregularities had favored the Socialist Party. While the consensus was that the voting was on the whole free and fair, the largest opposition party, with eight seats in the assembly, maintains that the lack of stricter controls on vote identification and voting sites made some of the results questionable.

Senegal has universal suffrage. Women are active participants in the political process, and several parties, including the dominant Socialist Party, have sections promoting women's rights. Twelve women are deputies in the National Assembly and there are four women in President Diouf's cabinet. In addition, a number of government ministries employ women in key positions, i.e., the Political Director in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In other ministries key agronomists, statisticians, and economists are women.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Senegal is a leader among African countries in the establishment and promotion of international standards for human rights practices. Senegal was the original sponsor of the Human Rights Charter of the Organization of African Unity, and is also an active member of the Human Rights Commission. Dakar is the headquarters of the African Bar Association's Institute of Human Rights, an organization which trains lawyers and judges in translating general human rights principles into practical legal and judicial procedures. A number of Senegalese are prominent in African and international human rights activities. Senegal maintains a dialogue with organizations such as Amnesty International, which was noted in Amnesty International's 1985 report (see also sections 1c and 1d above). Freedom House rates Senegal "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Senegal, whose population of 6.8 million is growing at the high rate of 3.3 percent each year, has suffered significant economic reverses during the past few years. The quality of life has been affected by poor performance in the agricultural sector, which provides a livelihood for about 70 percent of Senegal's population. Per capita GNP reached $486 in 1982, but dropped to $440 in 1983.

The decline in the local currency's value against the dollar during the past three years has directly affected the economy, despite only modest trade linkages with the United States. Approximately 40 percent of Senegal's foreign debt and all of its oil and gas purchases are denominated in dollars. Payments on external debt and the energy import bill consumed almost all foreign currency and earnings accumulated in recent years. On the positive side, the rains were exceptionally good in 1985, the best since 1973, thus ending 2 years of drought which had severely reduced yields of groundnuts (peanuts), Senegal's traditional major cash crop and foreign exchange earner.

Health conditions have improved over the past decade. Senegal provided 97 percent of caloric requirements per capita in 1977, and probably held this level in 1985, despite two years of drought, in part through a continuing influx of foreign food and assistance. Nearly half of Senegal's population now has access to safe water. The number of physicians and nursing personnel per 100,000 population has doubled since 1960. Infant mortality has declined from 150 per 1,000 live births in 1972 to 101.6 in 1985. Life expectancy at birth has risen from an estimated 40 years in 1969 to nearly 47 years in 1985. These improvements are particularly marked in the urban centers to which there is a steady migration of people from the rural areas. The Government is continuing its efforts to increase enrollment in primary and secondary schools and to find employment for graduates. Almost 58 percent of primary school-aged males and 38 percent of females in the same age group are presently enrolled in primary education, and approximately 12 percent of secondary school-aged minors attend school. Adult literacy remains low (estimated at 5-10 percent), however, especially in the rural areas.

While there are industry-wide statutes on the minimum age for employment of children, the economic situation in Senegal has created an environment wherein a substantial number of underage workers are employed, particularly in cottage industry. Through collective bargaining, principally by the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers, there are legal guidelines for occupational safety and health, minimum wages, and limits on working hours.

Traditional values, both societal and religious (chiefly Islamic), have limited women's access to certain types of employment and higher education. There are, however, no legal hindrances to advancement for women and, as noted, they are present in respectable numbers in the governmental and private sectors. Women, including several professors at the University of Dakar, are prominent among Senegal's intellectual elite. Senegal also has several active organizations promoting women's rights, including the Federation of Women's Rights which held a two-week conference in March 1984. The Federation has ties to a number of women's groups in Africa and, since 1979, has been a sister organization of the National Council of Negro Women in the United States.

SEYCHELLES

The Government of Seychelles is led by President France Albert Rene, who took power in June 1977 in a military coup d'etat and forced into exile a number of former leaders, including ex-prime minister James Mancham. In 1979 a new Constitution was promulgated which formally abolished all political opposition to the Socialist ruling party, the Seychelles Peoples' Progressive Front (SPPF). This Constitution provides for a strong presidential executive, who appoints ministers, and a People's Assembly of 23 selected members and several appointed members. The 1985 changes in the constitution of the SPPF brought greater consolidation of power in the hands of President Rene.

Since the 1977 coup, the Government has faced numerous security threats from opponents living in Australia, the United Kingdom, and South Africa, and it had to call on the assistance of Tanzanian troops to put down an internal mutiny by some members of the armed forces in 1982. While all Tanzanian troops were withdrawn by mutual agreement in 1984, some North Korean military advisors remain in Seychelles to train the small (about 1,000 persons) Seychelles Defense Forces. The Seychelles also has a uniformed police force of 500, and a People's Militia of about 2,000.

The Seychelles economy relies predominantly on tourism for foreign exchange. The tourism industry, which fell dramatically in the early 1980's has now revived, and some 75,000 foreigners visited the country during 1985. The Seychelles Government has actively sought to diversify the economy by granting fishing licenses to French, Spanish, Korean, and Japanese trawlers and by expanding the fishing port in Victoria through donor assistance. Fishing, if fully developed, could replace tourism as the largest earner of foreign exchange by the end of the decade.

There was no marked change in the Seychelles' human rights situation during 1985. The Constitution does not guarantee fundamental human rights but rather states them in a preamble as the intention of the people of Seychelles. At the party conference in 1985, the President reaffirmed his determination to put down opposition elements, and the Government continued to use exile as a means of suppressing dissent. On the positive side, the President reaffirmed his commitment to freedom of religion and promised that the Government would neither interfere in church affairs nor restrict the right of religious groups to speak out including through their influential media outlets.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported instances of any domestic killing for political motives or other instances of arbitrary deprivation of life in 1985. It has been alleged however, that Gerard Hoarau, leader of the London-based Seychelles National Movement, might have been assassinated by government agents in London in December.

SEYCHELLES

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of other disappearances during 1985. Two persons who disappeared in 1984 have not been found. Amnesty International noted in its 1985 Report that it has received allegations that these persons were abducted and killed by government security agents. President Rene has denied these allegations. Amnesty International has also written to the President regarding five other cases since 1977 in which people either disappeared or died in apparent accidents.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution explicitly forbids torture and there have been no recent reports that torture has been practiced. There have been some isolated reports of rough treatment by police. Prison conditions are satisfactory. Prisoners are well fed and supervised by professional wardens. Prisoners are normally incarcerated on isolated islands, but family visits are routinely arranged.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

At the end of 1985, nine persons were reported under detention, held under the provisions of the Public Security (Detention) Act, which allows indefinite detention upon order of the President. This Detention Act, enacted in December 1981 following an attack by mercenaries, was used, for example, to arrest 41 persons in 1984 for unlawful assembly. In October 1984, 38 of the detainees were fined and released, but the remaining 3 are still held in detention. Moreover, police have not hesitated to take persons into custody and keep them overnight for "questioning" in regard to suspected antigovernment activities. In particular, persons who seek to mobilize public opinion against the Government run a serious risk of being arrested for "questioning." Some who have worked for the Government have been fired without recourse to appeal or review. Others have faced social and economic harassment and received direct or anonymous threats which they believe originate from government officials as signals to leave the country. Frequently, opponents of the Government have been urged to emigrate, an option that many have chosen over the years.

There is a prohibition against the use of forced or compulsory labor, and such practices have not been employed in Seychelles. There is, however, National Youth Service (NYS) for all persons 14 to 16, which has elements of military training and discipline, as well as academic study.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Defendants in nonpolitical cases (both civil and criminal) have access to counsel and have enjoyed speedy and fair trials. Right to trial is patterned in large measure on English common law, although there is also a heavy influence of Napoleonic customary law. Judges are provided under arrangements with the British Commonwealth and, except for security cases, they have exhibited considerable independence from both the executive and legislative branches of the Government. The Chief Justice, who is appointed by the President, stressed in two addresses during 1984 that it is the judiciary's responsibility to impose sentences as required by law and that it should reflect the will of the people as expressed in laws passed by the legislature. Seychelles' law requires that member of the armed forces be tried by courts-martial unless the President decrees otherwise.

Amnesty International is investigating the case of Royce Dias in order to ascertain whether he is a prisoner of conscience, notwithstanding his conviction for a criminal offense. Dias' 7 year sentence for possession of drugs was recently reduced by the Appeals Court to five years.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The authorities have broad powers of search and seizure without need of a warrant. The Seychelles Marketing Board Act, passed in 1984, allows police to enter any premises, private or public, and seize any documents which they believe may violate this Act. Legislation exists which allows the Government to open mail, domestic as well as international, and it is widely believed that the Government does so. The party conference in 1985 adopted a resolution which supported President Rene's efforts to quell opposition elements "by whatever ways and means he deems suitable." Since June 1983 the Government has embarked on a campaign to nationalize private land, ostensibly to claim unused agricultural land. There have been four seizures of hotels, as well as private residences and at least one foreign-owned corporation. Although the Government has stated that compensation will be paid, negotiations with previous owners are continuing.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although theoretically protected under the Constitution of 1979, freedom of speech in public is exercised sparingly.

The Government controls the major newspaper in the country, as well as all radio and TV broadcasting. Legislation provides for up to 3 years' detention for anyone "who with intent to bring the President into hatred, ridicule or contempt, publishes any defamatory or insulting matter whether in writing, print or word of mouth or in any other manner." This same Act authorized a 2-year sentence for anyone who "prints, supplies, distributes, reproduces, or has in his possession or control" any publication banned by the Government for security reasons. No charges are known to have been brought under this Act. The Government has sought to prevent the importation of pamphlets printed by its opposition abroad.

Despite the restrictions, there has been an improvement in the situation since the President's 1984 speech in which he promised not to interfere with the church's right to speak out against the Government. The Catholic church publishes a lively paper, Echo des Isles, which is not subject to Government control or censorship. This paper continues to publish some articles which obliquely criticize the Government. The two largest religious denominations in the country, the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches, are each provided 2 free hours per month of uncensored broadcasting. Both churches have taken advantage of the monthly broadcast to comment on social and political issues. Seychelles has granted a license for many years to a Protestant radio station which broadcasts religious programs throughout Asia and Africa. Foreign broadcasts are widely listened to, and foreign publications, including those critical of the Government, have been imported and sold without hindrance.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

A law dating from 1959 inhibits the right of peaceful assembly without government permit. The Government has been quick in moving against unauthorized demonstrations and has made arrest under an ex-British colonial law which prohibits unlawful assembly (i.e. without a government permit). All associations, clubs, and other organizations require government permission to organize.

There is one legal union (the National Workers Union) which is under direct control of the ruling party. It does not function as a free trade union, although it plays an advisory role for workers and seeks better working conditions for its members. Changes adopted at the party conference in 1985 further restricted the election of labor union officials who, in the future will be appointed by the Government. A 1983 law restricts an employer from dismissing workers. There has been no official strike in Seychelles since 1977.

c. Freedom of Religion

There has been no religious persecution in Seychelles, and church services are widely attended. The Roman Catholic and Anglican churches have flourished, and Muslims and Hindus are unrestricted in their religious practices. There is a clear separation between church and state. Religious instruction in schools has been limited. The Government has addressed the churches' complaint that artificial impediments have made it difficult, if not impossible, for children (ages 14-17) in the National Youth Service (NYS) to attend church on a weekly basis, by allowing services to be held at NYS Camps. As recently as 1984, the President publicly reiterated his support for religion and said there would be no government interference in the right of people to worship.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on internal travel. Passports may be acquired by virtually any citizen, although Seychellois traveling abroad for study at Government expense are required to sign a bond which enables the Government to recoup the cost of their education should they fail to return. Such persons who are "bonded" must have government permission to travel abroad following their return. In 1984, the Government granted a passport to a suspected dissident who wished to emigrate to the United States. There are no restrictions on voluntary repatriation for those who are willing to accept the present one-party political system.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

There is no possibility of citizens changing their government through democratic means. Since 1979 there has been only one legal political party, the Seychelles People's Progressive Front (SPPF). All political and much social activity is channeled through this institution. President Rene, both as President of the country and as Secretary General of the party, wields great power and influence. Opponents of the party can neither organize nor express public opposition. The party has a number of regional offices called "branches" which are responsible for organizing and supervising discussion about current government policies and for reporting on public opinion in their regions.

The Government remains the largest employer in the country. Some persons who are believed by the Government to oppose official policies have found it difficult to gain employment.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Amnesty International is investigating alleged human rights violations in the Seychelles. Requests for information are sent to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who acts as an interlocutor between human rights groups, such as Amnesty International, and the Seychelles Government. It is reported that all such inquiries have been answered and that inquiries have led to the release of some detainees. In addition to its concerns mentioned in 1b, Amnesty International in its 1985 Report, was concerned because suspected opponents of the Government, including prisoners of conscience, were held under legislation providing indefinite detention without trial. Freedom House rated Seychelles "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Seychelles' population of 65,245 enjoys a relatively high standard of living for an underdeveloped country, with a per capita gross domestic product of $2,300 (1983). The population growth rate is currently estimated at only 0.8 percent annually. The Seychelles economy remains largely dependent on tourism, which has increased markedly in 1984 and 1985. Nutrition requirements of most Seychellois are easily met as an abundance of food is available throughout the country. Seychelles has the highest per capita consumption of fish in the world. Local diets are amply supplemented by a variety of fresh fruits and vegetables. Unemployment remains a serious problem, although the Government has emphasized development plans which are extremely labor intensive. A "full employment scheme" also provides manual employment for anyone who desires to work for fair compensation.

Free health services of a high standard are available to all persons. Infant mortality is 13.8 per 1,000 live births, one of the lowest rates in Africa, and life expectancy at birth, estimated at 66 years for men and 73 years for women, approaches that found in many Western European countries. Free education is available for all children and, in the case of academically qualified students, a minimum of 13 years' education is provided by the State. Recent changes in the National Youth Service (NYS), a 2 year program which is virtually compulsory for all children ages 14 to 16, have reflected an emphasis on the importance of academic training. Children in NYS are now granted one weekend leave per month, in part to dampen parental concern that the influence of the family was being diminished in the program.

Labor laws have not yet been promulgated, but written guidelines published in 1980 establish the minimum working age at 14. The guidelines cover leave, dismissal, overtime, minimum wages, reports of service injury or death, and salary deductions. According to officials of the National Workers Union, occupational safety and health conditions are a part of the union's inspection program.

Women enjoy high status in this essentially matriarchal society. Women have the same legal, political, economic, and social rights as men. Although there are no women currently serving in the Council of Ministers, two women are serving as central committee members of the party. Many senior government officials, up to and including the rank of principal secretary, are women.

SIERRA LEONE

Sierra Leone has a one-party system of government in which the President is the predominant executive authority. The term of President Siaka Probyn Stevens, who first assumed executive power in 1968 following two military coups, expired in 1985 under the 1978 Constitution, and Stevens handpicked military force commander Major General Joseph Saidu Momoh as his successor. In a national referendum October 1, 1985, Momoh became President-elect. Authority was transferred to him in a ceremony on November 28, 1985. A Cabinet, selected by the President from elected as well as appointed members of Parliament, meets with the President regularly and has influence on the President's decisionmaking. Sierra Leone's unicameral Parliament usually takes its direction from the executive. The government security structure, which includes the police, the military forces, and the special security division used primarily for presidential protection, does not generally interfere with the rights of individuals, although certain army units were criticized in 1985 for trying to force merchants on occasion to sell rice at fixed government prices only.

Sierra Leone is considered by the U.N. to be among the least developed countries. About 70 percent of its 3.9 million population is engaged in agriculture, mainly at the subsistence level. The Constitution recognizes the right to own private property. Most of the modern sector of the economy is privately owned. There is also government ownership in certain key sectors, particularly mining and transportation.

Human rights in Sierra Leone during 1985 were basically respected, and the ongoing peaceful transition of executive authority was a positive element. The eight privately-owned newspapers enjoy considerable though not complete freedom, and articles on sensitive political and economic topics, including investigative reporting into government shortcomings, have been published. The judiciary generally maintains its independence from the executive and has been reasonably effective in protecting legal rights, although there are continuing allegations that some court officials are subject to political manipulation or bribery. For the first time, members of the Sierra Leone Bar Association organized a society for the preservation of human rights and held a well-attended inaugural seminar July 12.

There were no reports of political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abduction of individuals by the Government or hostage taking by nongovernmental groups.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no specific reports of torture. However, harsh physical treatment of prisoners by police is probably common, and attorneys occasionally have been shown bruises and other marks of violence on detainees' bodies that attorneys believe could have been caused by police beatings. There is dangerous overcrowding of the prisons, and stories have appeared in the local press deploring prison conditions. Prison deaths due to malnutrition, pneumonia, diarrhea, and gastroenteritis are said by journalists and lawyers to be common.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Habeas corpus is part of Sierra Leone common law and generally observed in practice. It is widely believed in Sierra Leone legal circles that as a form of harassment persons are picked up by the police and held for short periods without charge before being released. Under the Constitution, the President may take measures to detain any person who is, or is reasonably suspected to be, dangerous to the well-being of the Republic. Writs of habeas corpus granted by the court during a state of emergency would not extend to suspects detained pursuant to an order under the Public Emergency Act. A state of emergency must come into force within 28 days after the detention, or a detainee not charged with an offense must be released. There is no one currently detained under Public Emergency regulations.

Following violence in the Pujehun district in late 1983, the army detained from 100 to 150 persons in its efforts to restore order. While a state of emergency was not declared, some detainees were held for considerable periods before criminal charges were filed. In mid-1984, most of those originally detained were released or charged with various criminal offenses. However, press reports in 1984 and 1985 have suggested that between 10 and 20 of those detained ultimately died of malnutrition while still in prison. Several individuals originally detained in the Pujehun incident and charged with serious criminal offenses, including murder, still have not been brought to trial. While some in legal circles contend that the complexity of the legal cases and the overburdened legal system account for the delay, other observers claim that political pressure from the Government is responsible for the judicial lethargy.

Exile is not practiced, nor is forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary has generally maintained its independence from the Government, although some critics charge that the legal system is increasingly subject to political manipulation, often before cases reach the courts. The 1978 Constitution gives the President power to retire Judges after age 55. This controversial provision was used most recently by President Stevens in mid-November to retire Chief Justice Ebenezer Livesey Luke. Luke's predecessor was retired by the same provision. This surprise move against Luke provoked considerable public criticism, particularly among the local legal community. Sierra Leone's courts have a reputation for providing fair public trials. Defendants are allowed counsel of their choice, and convictions may be appealed. However, many poor defendants cannot afford counsel, and a public defender is provided only in capital offense cases. Persons detained under the Public Emergency Act are not guaranteed a hearing unless charged with a capital offense. There are no political prisoners, although informed observers suspect that some of the individuals sentenced for criminal activity in the 1983 Pujehun incident were originally held for political reasons.

SIERRA LEONE

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Legal safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home are generally observed. Rights of the individual are not abused by the state. Censorship of mail and electronic eavesdropping by the state on private conversations through wiretaps have not been reported. Some organizations have claimed that informers report to the Government on their activities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although freedom of speech is legally guaranteed, this can be abridged under the Constitution if the proper functioning of the Government is deemed to be in jeopardy. In practice, the Government generally tolerates public criticism of individual citizens, and academic freedom is fully respected. However, since 1978 no opposition party has been permitted, and there have been no reports of opposition groups inside Sierra Leone attempting publicly to criticize the party or Government. Political propaganda occasionally circulates clandestinely within the country from opposition groups based in Western Europe or the United States.

There is in practice considerable press freedom and no prior press censorship in Sierra Leone. Newspapers report on sensitive political topics such as misuse of government funds, bribery, and bureaucratic indiscipline. The Government, in the person of the President or Minister of Information, regularly issues press releases stating that there is no press censorship, but usually adds that critics should be fair and place events in the context of the development process. President-elect Joseph Saidu Momoh met the press the day after his nomination August 2 and, while reaffirming his support for freedom of the press, warned that press freedom must not lead to excessive criticism of the country. The Government thus expects journalists to exercise some self-censorship. Most editors avoid publishing articles portraying the country in a critical light or attacking the personality of the head of state. This approach is embedded in the Newspaper Act of 1983, which set qualification standards for editors and a fee for registration of newspapers.

In 1985, two journalists were imprisoned for contempt, and the editor of an independent newspaper, For Di People, was imprisoned for over 70 days without charge or due process after publishing an article on the excesses of the special security division.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the rights of freedom of assembly and of forming or belonging to trade unions or other economic, social, or professional associations. However, it places limits on these rights, most significantly where assembly or association would conflict with the "proper functioning of the party" or public order. In practice, freedom of association in the nonpolitical sphere is respected.

Trade unions normally operate freely and exercise the right to organize, to negotiate, to strike against employers, and to join in confederations and affiliate with international organizations. When trade union activities publicly challenged government policy in 1981, the Government arrested approximately 180 union members. Late in 1982, the Labor Congress was allowed to elect a new executive committee. It is now functioning independently of the Government and most sectors of the Sierra Leone economy, except agriculture, are unionized. The Labor Congress is a member of the democratic International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Private associations of citizens can and do make representations to the Government on policy issues and are not subject to reprisals.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is a tradition of religious tolerance in Sierra Leone. Muslims (the most numerous religious group), Christians, animists and adherents of other faiths practice their religions freely and publish their religious documents without government interference. The state is nonsectarian and does not discriminate on the basis of religious belief.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The only official restriction on travel within the country is in diamond mining areas and is intended to control smuggling. There are few regulations restricting foreign travel. Sierra Leone, a signatory to the UN Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, is host to approximately 200 refugees, most of whom are students. There have been no reported incidents of forced repatriation.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Stevens remained the dominant authority in Sierra Leone in 1985, although he arranged for his retirement and for his succession by Major General Joseph Momoh. The Parliament, at Stevens' behest, amended the Constitution to allow Momoh to become President without resigning his commission, and in August the single party, the All Peoples' Congress, under the control of Stevens, nominated Momoh as president-elect. Since independence in 1961, the clear trend in political development has been the increase in executive power and the decrease in constitutional checks on that power. The Constitution provides that the leader of the party will be the sole candidate for the office of President. The unicameral Parliament is subservient to the executive branch of the Government. Candidates for Parliament are chosen in each constituency by the party's local executive committee. The executive committee chooses three candidates from the list of citizens who seek nomination. The central committee of the party has the power to disapprove the nomination of any candidate selected by the local executive committees if it believes that candidacy would be inimical to the State. In addition to the national political system, there is also a traditional system which operates in the provinces outside of the urban area. Paramount chiefs are elected for life by the member of the chiefdom council. They have considerable authority in local affairs and in resolving traditional disputes.

There is universal suffrage, and no groups are precluded from voting because of gender, tribe, race, or religion.

SIERRA LEONE

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In 1985, members of the Sierra Leone Bar Association formed a society for the preservation of human rights. The Government did not interfere with the effort nor with the inaugural seminar held July 12 and attended by members of Parliament, judges, medical doctors, academics, civil servants, trade unionists and the media. Local chapters of Amnesty International exist. Amnesty International in its 1985 report expressed concern about reports of ill-treatment of prisoners, in some cases said to have resulted in death. Freedom House terms Sierra Leone "partly free".

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sierra Leone is a nation of almost 3.9 million with a per capita gross domestic product (GDP) of $330 a year (1983 figure). From 1970 to 1982, its population growth rate of 2.6 percent per annum exceeded GDP growth, which averaged 2.0 per year. About 70 percent of the population is involved in agriculture, primarily at the subsistence level. Sierra Leone has relied upon the mining sector in general and diamonds in particular for its economic base.

Since 1981, the economic situation has worsened due to depletion of alluvial diamond deposits, rising fuel import bills, and declining world prices for mineral and agricultural exports. Government economic policy and mismanagement have also contributed to the situation as budget deficits have led to high inflation (about 70 percent in 1984). The chronic overvaluation of the leone, despite a major devaluation in February 1985, has accelerated and with it, corruption, smuggling, and black market activities. Low rates of domestic savings and investment have left the country heavily dependent on external assistance for development efforts.

Life expectancy at birth is only 38.5 years (1985 figure) and the infant mortality rate is 195 per 1000 live births. Calorie supply as a percent of basic requirements was estimated in 1977 at 83 percent. Adult literacy is estimated at 15 percent. Primary school enrollment was estimated at 53.1 percent by a 1980 estimate. Access to education for women remains more limited than it is for men. For example, from the group of primary school age girls, only 37 percent are enrolled in primary school; yet this figure indicates that gradual improvement has been made since independence.

There is no minimum age for the employment of children. The work week is defined as 7 hours for 5 weekdays plus 3 1/2 hours on Saturday. There is an established code outlining acceptable conditions of work, but in actual practice in the very limited manufacturing sector of Sierra Leone, maintenance of machinery, safety procedures, and sanitary conditions probably does not conform to the code.

Women in Sierra Leone are guaranteed equal rights by the Constitution, but their status varies substantially in different parts of the country and depends upon the cultural values of various tribal groups. In some areas of Sierra Leone women have been elected to the prestigious position of paramount chief. In the modern sector, women are prominent in some professions, and one woman is a Supreme Court Justice. The political sphere continues to be male-dominated.

SOMALIA

Somalia has been ruled for the past 16 years by President Mohamed Siad Barre, head of the armed forces and Secretary General of the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party, the country's single political party. The formal government structure includes a Supreme Revolutionary Council formed in 1969, the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party formed in 1976, a People's Assembly established in 1980, and a 45-member Council of Ministers. The President also regularly convenes the party politburo, a close circle of advisers composed of the most powerful four or five ministers. Informal and formal consultations between the leadership and Somali clans and clan groups also have a major impact on internal politics. However, the ultimate source of the President's political authority is the military, which brought him to power in 1969. The primacy of the military in Somali society is reinforced by continuing conflict between Somalia and Ethiopia in the Ogaden frontier region, an area within Ethiopian territory but populated largely by ethnic Somalis. The army's occasional role, in collaboration with the police, as keeper of civil order further underscores the importance of the military in Somali society.

Ethiopia and Somalia support armed dissident activity against one another. Dissident activity against the Somali Government, led by the Democratic Front for the Salvation of Somalia and the Somali National Movement, both based in Ethiopia, flared up during the winter of 1984-85 and the fall of 1985. Somali incursions into Ethiopia are more difficult to monitor than Ethiopian activities directed against Somalia. Many ethnic Somalis live in the neighboring states of Kenya and Djibouti, as well as Ethiopia. Both external and internal security are thus major concerns of the Government. The principal arm of the internal security apparatus is the National Security Service, which can arrest and detain people indefinitely pursuant to the comprehensive National Security Act.

Somalia is a poor country with few natural resources, and most of its 7.6 million people earn a bare subsistence living as herdsmen or farmers. The country's economy suffers from frequent drought, and recurrent conflict with Ethiopia has brought about heavy defense expenditures and a massive refugee problem. Most of the modern sector of the economy is government-controlled and plagued by bureaucratic inefficiencies, excessive patronage, and a lack of adequately trained personnel. In recent years, new government policies have encouraged development of the private sector, foreign investment, and financial reform with the assistance of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank which have had salutary effects on production, exports, and lowering of inflation.

There was no significant change in the human rights situation in Somalia in 1985. Although the 1979 Constitution has been reinstated, civil and political rights remain tightly circumscribed, and organized criticism of the Government is not permitted. The Government shows little hesitation in imprisoning those whom it sees as a threat to security. Political prisoners occasionally have been held for several years, then released and rehabilitated, with some of them assuming responsible positions in the Government. The exact number of political detainees is unknown but is estimated at 350 to 500, with new prisoners being incarcerated as others are released. Periodic discussions continued in 1985 with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) regarding the welfare and repatriation of Ethiopian prisoners of war and the status of Somali prisoners of war held in Ethiopia.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported political killings by the Government in 1985. However, during the winter of 1984-85 when rebel dissidents staged attacks in the northwest region of Somalia, 38 persons suspected of being dissident sympathizers reportedly were killed in the fighting.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of disappearance during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are periodic but unsubstantiated allegations of the use of torture. There is evidence that Somali police authorities apply rough treatment in order to obtain confessions from criminal suspects. Living conditions in prison can be harsh.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Despite a constitutional provision that accords Somali citizens the right to formal charges and a speedy trial, the Government frequently makes arrests without warrants and detains indefinitely persons whom it views as a threat to national security. Habeas corpus or its equivalent does not exist in national security cases. In some instances, political prisoners are held incommunicado and denied access to lawyers prior to being formally charged. Delays in bringing charges can be lengthy in criminal cases as well as political cases.

At least 200 of the 350-500 political prisoners are being held without charge, including 6 high government officials arrested in June 1982. A seventh ranking official arrested at the same time died in prison. Seven youths were arrested in the autumn of 1984 for antiregime activities and later sentenced to death, although their death sentences have not been carried out. In 1985, the Government arrested and detained without charge 22 members of the Muslim Brotherhood. It has released only two of them, who departed Somalia upon their release.

In July 1985, the Government detained 90 youths for antigovernment activity that included poster/slogan manufacturing, group meetings, and conspiracy to subvert the current regime. These youths were not formally charged but subsequently were inducted into the army. In August 1985, approximately 30 businessmen in Mogadishu were arrested and detained without charge. Most were released within 1 week with the remainder being released in October 1985. These arrests had a demoralizing effect on the private business community.

SOMALIA

Compulsory labor is expressly prohibited under the Somali labor code.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Somali judicial system, in both criminal and political cases, is subject to review and control by the executive branch of government. Since 1970, the Supreme Revolutionary Council has nominated all judges, and Council members occupy all positions on the Higher Judicial Council, the highest body of judicial review. The 1979 Constitution designated the President as Chairman of the Higher Judicial Council and added amnesty matters to its jurisdiction.

The National Security Court, established in 1969, has authority over cases involving crimes against the State, the Government, or public order and is subject to control by the Government. There is no right of appeal in these cases. The Court's deliberations are secret. Presidential consideration of amnesty is still pending for the seven youths in Hargeisa sentenced to death in 1984 by the National Security Court for antigovernment activity. In the northwest region, where dissidents remain active, there have been reports of the regional military commander prevailing over the court system. For example, in July 1985, a Tanzanian-born Somali was executed for antigovernment activity following a summary trial presided over by the regional military commander. This trial occurred at the same time that 90 youths were being detained for antigovernment activity and presumably was intended to serve as a warning to other citizens who harbored antigovernment sympathies.

In civil courts, judges refer to the Koran in rendering legal decisions pertaining to family matters such as marriage and inheritance.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

"Mobilization campaigns" are organized by the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party to promote public participation in, and enthusiasm for, various civic and national programs as well as general support for government policies. Participation in these campaigns is urged but not strictly enforced.

The National Security Service (NSS) has the authority to search homes without warrants and detain anyone suspected of being a political dissenter. This authority extends to wiretapping and opening of mail although there is no evidence that such practices are broadly used. The NSS can effectively track the movement of persons through its comprehensive network of informants. The NSS is widely feared for its ability to collect detailed information on private citizens and detain suspects without charge.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government forbids public expression of dissenting views. The media are owned and operated by the Government. They are devoted to disseminating information and opinion that is acceptable to the Government. The Central Censorship Board retains control over publications, foreign and local, circulated within the country, films, plays, concerts, and other means of communication such as videotapes imported into the country.

Currently, the only publication subject to frequent censorship is the magazine Africa Report, published in New York, but in the past some Italian publications have been banned, as well as the quarterly journal, Horn of Africa, published in New Jersey by Somali and Ethiopian intellectuals who reside in the United States.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All nonreligious organizations and public gatherings are subject to government control or supervision. Rallies or meetings of a direct political nature are organized only by the Government, usually to promote its own programs.

The country's single labor confederation, the General Federation of Somali Trade Unions (GFSTU), is government-controlled, and its members do not have the right to strike. The GFSTU's main function is to monitor the work force and provide a conduit for worker grievances. The GFSTU is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, and the International Labor Organization.

The Union of Somali Cooperatives Movement is controlled by a bureau of the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party. Other state-controlled associations are taking small and tentative steps toward privatization.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is Somalia's state religion and is followed by over 95 percent of the population. There is little government interference in religious matters. Other religious groups such as the Sufi orders enjoy religious freedom, but they have learned from past experience not to involve themselves in political matters. The Government has kept radical Muslim sects in check by detaining members without bringing charges. Members of religions other than Islam may freely practice their faith but may not proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal travel is not formally restricted but is controlled through police and military checkpoints in towns, border areas, and regions noted for interclan violence. Although any Somali citizen can obtain a passport, the Government denies exit visas to categories of people it prefers to keep in country, such as young men of military age. Emigration is permitted for all but government employees. The Somali Government does not exile its opponents. Somalis who have left the country to reside abroad have done so voluntarily, usually in search of greater economic opportunities or because of political disaffection. The Government allows repatriation and in some cases provides former dissident exiles with official government or military positions. In other cases, the Government has interrogated returnees and detained them indefinitely without trial for alleged antigovernment activities.

SOMALIA

Over 500,000 refugees from Ethiopia, most of whom are ethnic Somalis, live in Somalia. The Somali Government purports to encourage repatriation of these refugees, but many unofficial obstacles are placed in the path of those who wish to return to their native regions. There has been considerable controversy over the number of refugees, with many living in camps suspected of being local Somalis seeking food assistance. Conditions in the camps are often better than conditions among the local inhabitants. There have been reports that some ethnic Somalis with ties to the Ogaden region have agitated to receive preferential treatment in third-country resettlement programs. This agitation included an episode in early 1984 when a Canadian immigration inspector, who was interviewing Amhara refugees for resettlement in Canada, was harassed by a number of Somali refugees. In May 1985, four Amharic refugees who were scheduled for resettlement in Canada were arrested and detained without charge.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Siad Barre rules Somalia and controls political participation through a single legal political party, the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party. The party directs participation in Somali political affairs for individuals and organizations, such as the General Federation of Somali Trade Unions, the Somali Women's Democratic Organization, and the Somali Revolutionary Youth Organization. Elections for the People's Assembly in December 1984 entailed only a vote for or against the party's designated national slate of candidates. The Constitution stipulates that elections be held every 5 years, but the President has the power to delay elections.

There is no legal opposition to the Government, and public criticism of its policies is forbidden. Somalia has only one ethnic group, the Somali, which is subdivided into clans and clan groups. Although the country is ethnically and linguistically homogeneous, clan divisions exert a major impact on domestic politics. President Siad recognizes the continuing strength of the traditional, clan-based political coalitions, and government officials frequently hold formal and informal consultations with various clan leaders. President Siad has used clan politics to maintain his rule by placing members of his own clan, the Marehan, in key positions. He is conscious of clan constituencies, and members of other clans also occupy important positions. Clan identification is very strong, and for many Somalis, the traditional clan system is the accepted vehicle of political expression. Clan politics and clan rivalries occasionally erupt into violence.

Women and minorities participate in politics and government. The Somali Women's Democratic Organization, though subordinate to the party, has advocated greater political participation and mobilization for women. A number of women are members of Parliament. Other women occupy important positions within the party and in various ministries. Several vice ministers and one ambassador are women.

SOMALIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Somali Government has refused requests by foreign officials and human rights organizations to visit political prisoners. Although the Government has occasionally allowed an ICRC team to inspect facilities for prisoners-of-war from the conflict with Ethiopia, including in 1985, there has so far been no repatriation of these prisoners. There are no Somali organizations that actively address human rights issues. In international forums, official Somali remarks on human rights are usually restricted to general statements and criticism of human rights practices in Ethiopia. The International Parliamentary Union has approved resolutions calling on the Somali Government to release the six Parliamentarians who have been detained without charge since 1982.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report, expressed concerns over prisoners of conscience, some of whom had been detained without trial for more than 6 years; and the indefinite detention without trial of other political prisoners or their conviction after unfair trials. Freedom House rated Somalia "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Somalia is one of the poorest nations in the world, with a per capital gross national product of about $250. Its population of more than 7.5 million is growing at the rate of 3 percent a year. Its economy is pastoral and agricultural, the main forms of wealth being livestock--principally camels, cattle, sheep, and goats. The modern sector of the agricultural economy consists primarily of plantations along the rivers utilizing widespread irrigation and up-to-date farm machinery. Approximately 60 percent of the Somali population is nomadic; another 20 percent lives in small villages, and the remaining 20 percent lives in urban areas. Estimates in 1978 showed that 40 percent of urban dwellers and 70 percent of rural dwellers lived below the absolute poverty level.

The health of the Somali people is poor. Life expectancy at birth is slightly more than 43 years, and the infant mortality rate is 163 per 1,000 live births. About 33 percent of the population has access to safe water (58 percent in urban areas, 22 percent in rural areas). The principal causes of morbidity and mortality are malnutrition and infectious disease including diarrhea, malaria, measles, whooping cough, and respiratory infections. Somali nomads in particular suffer limited access to education, health, and social services. The livelihood of this group is also subject to the greatest degree of risk because of recurrent drought.

The literacy rate is estimated at slightly more than 6 percent (male 10.6 percent, female 2.7 percent). Primary school enrollment is about 35.5 percent (45 percent of males are enrolled and 25 percent of females).

Somalia has comprehensive labor legislation which establishes for the modern or cash sector of the economy minimum conditions for safety and health in the work place. The minimum age for employment of children is 15, and persons under 18 years are not permitted to work at night or in certain hazardous occupations. Even though child labor is prohibited, children often find odd jobs such as selling cigarettes on the street corner or watching and cleaning parked cars to support themselves or supplement family income. The work day is 8 hours or a total of 48 hours a week with stipulations on the amount of overtime that can be worked. Workers are entitled to paid holidays, annual leave, and holiday bonuses. However, the salary scale is extremely low, especially for civil servants. Workers resort to second jobs, bribes, misuse of public funds, assistance from other family members, and remittances from abroad to support themselves and their families.

President Siad has long been an advocate of greater rights for women, despite Muslim opposition to this policy. In this respect, Somali culture remains overwhelmingly traditional, based around extended clan families. Long-established practices such as female circumcision remain prevalent despite government opposition. The Somali Government has improved the legal and political status of women in recent years. For example, in 1975, women were given equal rights in several respects, including equal inheritance rights. The Government also promotes universal coeducational schooling, to the extent resources allow, which is mostly limited to urban centers.

SOUTH AFRICA

South Africa is a multiracial society whose laws codify the doctrine of apartheid, which prescribes the basic rights and obligations of people according to their racial or ethnic origin. The country's black majority (72 percent of the population) suffers from pervasive, legally sanctioned discrimination based on race in political, economic, and social aspects of life. The country's other nonwhite racial groups (principally "coloreds" and Asians) also suffer from extensive racial discrimination, although to a lesser degree than South Africa's black population. The South African Government is now publicly committed to the concept of common citizenship in a united South Africa and to negotiation with blacks to shape a new constitutional structure, including political participation by all groups. Currently, however, the political rights of the black majority are confined to participation in tightly controlled urban councils in the country's black residential areas ("townships") and through the 10 government-designed and sponsored tribal areas known as "homelands."

In 1985, the South African Government continued an incremental reform process, with the new 1984 Constitution featuring a strong chief executive, the State President, and a Parliament with three chambers (a white House of Assembly, a colored House of Representatives, and an Indian House of Delegates) based on a racial ratio of 4.2.1/white, colored, Asian. Blacks do not have the right to vote in national elections and have no representation in Parliament. As a practical matter, the parliamentary system allows any chamber to block legislation, but ensures white domination by giving ultimate decisionmaking power to the white controlled President's Council. The new Constitution remains a highly controversial instrument. Parliamentary elections in 1984 marked the beginning of widespread civil unrest, detentions, and police actions that continued in 1985.

In 1985, Parliament passed a series of changes in the apartheid system, including the repeal of long-standing legislation banning marriage and sexual relationships between whites and nonwhites and of a statute that banned multiracial political alliances. In 1985, the Government also announced that it planned to introduce a freehold system of land ownership for blacks, and that it would review "influx control" legislation, which was designed to keep most blacks in their homelands and make them, by law, temporary sojourners in "white" South Africa. In addition, the Government made further changes in the area of so-called "petty apartheid", including the limited desegregation of trains and some other public facilities under a "local option" system. Notwithstanding these changes, race still remains the basis for the organization of South African society. Discriminatory laws and practices are woven throughout the fabric of South African life, notably in the Constitution itself.

The South African economy has slowed perceptibly in the past 4 years, due in part to low world prices for its exports, and a serious economic downturn in 1984-85 was a major contributing factor to political unrest during 1985. The South African Government has estimated that an annual real growth rate of 5 to 6 percent is necessary for the economy to absorb the approximately 250,000 black entrants to the labor market each year. An even higher rate of growth would be necessary to reduce present black unemployment, privately estimated at 25 percent or more. There seems to be little possibility that South Africa will experience such growth in the foreseeable future, especially in the absence of capital inflows from abroad.

Against the backdrop of slow, incremental change and a deep economic recession, political discontent and ferment increased dramatically in the nation's black and colored townships during 1984-85. According to the South African Institute of Race Relations, 843 people died because of political unrest, and almost 11,000 persons were detained during the course of the year. By the end of 1985, approximately 1,000 persons remained in detention under all security legislation, including the homelands. While the majority of deaths occurred as the result of police action, many others were caused by politically motivated "black-on-black" violence. Black trade union leaders suffered frequent harassment, persecution, and detention. In 1985, one black union leader died of head injuries after a short detention period, under circumstances that clearly suggested physical abuse by the police. At least three other deaths of detainees occurred under similar circumstances in 1985. Several documented allegations of torture by police were also made in 1985, and several injunctions against physical abuse were granted by the courts.

On July 21, 1985, the State President proclaimed a state of emergency in 36 of South Africa's 265 magisterial districts, including key black urban areas. Only the province of Natal is untouched by the emergency regulations. These give extraordinary arrest, detention, and other powers to police and military, who are also fully indemnified against prosecution for all acts committed "in good faith." Under these emergency regulations, any member of the South African Police, the military (South African Defense Force-SADF) or South African Railways Police, on his own authority, may arrest and detain any person whom he believes to be a threat to the public safety. The SADF was given new police powers in December to assist police in quelling unrest in areas not covered by the state of emergency. The press is outspoken, but its freedom to report is circumscribed by security legislation, official censorship, and self-censorship. In November, the Government banned TV, photography, sound recording, and sketching of events without police permission in areas covered by the state of emergency.

The banned African National Congress (ANC), most of whose leadership is in exile or detention, continued to demonstrate its opposition to the South African Government during 1985. It hit a variety of targets and urged black South Africans to overthrow the apartheid system by concerted acts of violence against police and black township government officials, with the stated purpose of making South Africa's townships ungovernable. The SADF launched a cross-border attack into Botswana in June, in what the Government claimed was an effort to destroy an ANC training base. Fourteen people were killed in this attack. While the South African Government has denied responsibility, the Lesotho Government claims that South African commandos killed nine South African political refugees in Maseru on December 20. In February 1985, the State President offered to release jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela, now serving a life sentence for sabotage, conditioned on Mandela's renunciation of violence as a means of political change. Mandela refused the conditional offer, citing the South African Government's own failure to renounce violence in the enforcement of the apartheid system.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Widespread unrest in South Africa's black townships claimed an estimated 843 lives (nearly all of whom were black) in 1985, according to figures compiled by the South African Institute of Race Relations (SAIRR). Security forces were responsible for the majority of these deaths. Police often quelled demonstrations with excessive force, utilizing teargas, birdshot, whips, and rubber bullets. Police have also used live ammunition to disperse demonstrators. According to press accounts, some 322 deaths attributable to political unrest occurred between July 21 (the effective date of the declaration of a state of emergency in 36 of 265 magisterial districts) and the end of October. While most of these deaths were the result of police action, some of the killings took the form of black political faction-fighting; others were attacks by blacks against township government officials and other suspected "collaborators." In October, the Government said that between September 1984 and August 1985, 210 blacks had been killed and 884 hurt by "radical elements" within the black community. Among those killed were 14 black policemen.

In 1985, because of restrictions on other forms of gatherings, funerals became a principal means for blacks to express discontent with the political system, and these gatherings led to confrontations with police. On March 21, 1985, police opened fire on a group of black mourners at a funeral in Langa, near Uitenhage, killing at least 19 and injuring 36. Amid allegations that the police grossly overreacted to an alleged planned attack by the demonstrators, the Government appointed a special commission to investigate the incident. The commission concluded, inter alia, that, while no one person could be held responsible, it was a matter of grave concern that riot control equipment such as rubber bullets and birdshot was not available at the scene at the time of the Langa incident. The commission also concluded that a magistrate's banning order of the funeral set the scene for a confrontation between police and mourners. In August, all funerals were restricted by the Minister of Law and Order under the state of emergency regulations.

Other examples of violence included: On November 21, in the township of Mamelodi, near Pretoria, police fired live ammunition to disperse a group of women who had marched on the town hall that day to present grievances to the township government. The incident left at least 19 people dead, some as a result of the stampede that followed police action in dispersing the demonstration. Some eyewitnesses alleged that police continued to shoot people without warning and without provocation while the crowd fled. In June, four United Democratic Front (UDF) leaders, including Cradock community leader Matthew Goniwe, disappeared shortly after a meeting in Port Elizabeth. Their charred bodies were found several days later. There was widespread suspicion that government forces or rival blacks under official sanction may have been responsible for these deaths, but the Government denied any involvement. In October, white police in a black township near Pretoria allegedly beat to death a 13-year-old black boy, Moses Mope. Local residents claimed that the attack was unprovoked. As a result of this incident, the police suspended a white police constable, and in November the Government began prosecution of the officer for culpable homicide. In February, violence broke out in Cape Town's squatter area of "Crossroads" when people feared the police would attempt to remove residents to Khayelitsha, a nearby resettlement area. Eighteen people died in the ensuing violence between police and residents and in fighting between different factions within the community. Many more suffered injuries.

There were at least four known cases of deaths of detainees in 1985 that occurred under circumstances suggesting police abuse. Chemical Industrial Workers' Union official Andries Raditsela was arrested in Johannesburg May 4 and died 2 days later of head injuries, shortly after he was released from police custody. Also in May, Sipho Mutsi, a member of the Congress of South African Students (COSAS), died of head injuries while in police custody in the Orange Free State. In September, a UDF organizer, Mbuyiselo Mbuty, died under similar circumstances after 1 day in detention in the Cape Province. In another incident, Bheki Mvolane was admitted to a hospital in a coma some 10 days after his arrest on charges of public violence. He died in April without regaining consciousness. As of the end of October, the Government had not undertaken prosecutions in any of these cases, although it did have each one under investigation. In October, the Government charged two white policemen with homicide arising out of the death of Mphiwa Ngwenya in police custody in November 1984.

The African National Congress (ANC), a revolutionary organization that openly advocates the violent overthrow of the apartheid system, claimed responsibility for a number of acts of sabotage in 1985. The ANC primarily targeted installations and offices involved with the administration of apartheid, although some civilian targets were also hit. Durban and Johannesburg suffered the largest number of incidents. At the beginning of 1985, the ANC's stated policy was to avoid civilian deaths and to concentrate only on noncivilian targets. In the course of the year, the ANC modified this stated policy, blurring the distinction between civilian and military targets and calling for an extension of violence to white areas. A December 23 bomb explosion at a shopping center near Durban claimed the lives of five people and injured many others. While the Government alleged that the ANC was responsible for the blast, ANC officials in Lusaka denied this but acknowledged that it may have been the work of renegade elements within the organization. A land mine explosion killed six civilians December 15 in the Northern Transvaal. The ANC claimed responsibility for the incident. Much black township violence--in particular, attacks on the homes and persons of black policemen and township government officials--was probably inspired, at least in part, by the ANC, whose current public strategy is to render the townships ungovernable and to attack so-called "collaborators" in the black community. In June, the houses of two colored members of Parliament were the targets of hand grenade attacks attributable to the ANC. The South African security police and the University of Pretoria's Institute of Strategic Studies said that from January to October 1985, there were 48 instances of assassination and attempted assassination of police, state witnesses, and other individuals that could be attributed to the ANC.

b. Disappearance

South African law does not require notification of a detainee's family, lawyer, or any other person in the event of a detention or arrest. The Second Police Amendment Act of 1980 prohibits the unauthorized publication of the name of any person detained for "the prevention of or combatting of terroristic activities." Many people have disappeared, reportedly into police custody, for long periods. Some, missing for very long periods of time, are suspected by friends and associates to have been killed by security forces. On May 8, three leaders of the Port Elizabeth Black Civic Organization disappeared after they left their homes for the Port Elizabeth airport. On July 15, families of the missing men filed an action in the Supreme Court in Port Elizabeth, alleging that the men had been seen alive in police custody and that their charred bodies were subsequently seen in the murder and robbery squad office of the Port Elizabeth police station. The missing men were still not definitively accounted for by the end of the year.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Security legislation, in particular the Internal Security Act, allows police considerable latitude and generally unsupervised discretion in the arrest and detention of suspects, and in the interrogation of detainees. Lengthy periods of detention, during which authorities are not obliged by law to present formal charges, are a frequent occurrence and offer considerable potential for police abuse of detainees. Some persons detained under the state of emergency have presented affidavits to the effect that they were tortured while in police detention. The types of torture alleged include: beatings, eardrum perforations, whippings, forced ingestion of foreign substances including gasoline and human hair, and the application of electrical shocks to genitals. In September, the South African Supreme Court (South Eastern Cape local division), acting on the affidavit of a prison physician, found reason to enjoin police in the Port Elizabeth area from assaulting state of emergency detainees. Denis Neer, General Secretary of the Motor Assembly and Component Workers Union of South Africa (MACWUSA), an affiliate of the UDF, won a restraining order against police after he had been assaulted while detained under the state of emergency regulations.

Provisions indemnifying law enforcement officials from both criminal and civil liability for acts undertaken in enforcing the state of emergency are cited by some human rights activists and other observers as giving police the impression that they have license to engage in abusive conduct.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Internal Security Act authorizes detention without charge or trial for varying--and in some cases potentially unlimited--periods. The Minister of Law and Order must personally issue orders under Section 28 of the Act, which he has characterized as preventive detention. Senior police officials may detain people for interrogation under Section 29 of the Act when offenses such as terrorism, sabotage, or inciting a revolutionary situation are suspected. Access to detainees is severely restricted, and no court may challenge arrests under the provisions of this law. There have been reports of some improvement in access since the Minister of Justice invited parliamentarians to visit detainees arrested under the state of emergency. According to the Detainees Parents' Support Committee, 1,633 people were detained under the security legislation from January to October of 1985, 392 of whom were still in custody as of the end of October (these detention figures do not include those being held under the state of emergency, discussed below). Section 30 of the Internal Security Act provides that the right of bail may be foreclosed from judicial determination by unilateral action on the part of the prosecuting attorney general in certain security cases. A decision by the Natal Provincial Attorney General to refuse bail under Section 30 to 16 political and labor union activists in a treason case in Pietermaritzburg was nullified on technical grounds by the Natal Supreme Court, which then ordered the defendants to be freed on bail. The Natal Attorney General did not follow up, thereby permitting the court decision to stand. A similar challenge to a Section 30 certification by the Transvaal Provincial Attorney General succeeded in the Transvaal Supreme Court on behalf of 22 defendants in another treason case. The Transvaal court, however, refused the bail application.

On August 27, UDF patron and World Alliance of Reformed Churches President Allan Boesak, an outspoken critic of the Government, was detained under Section 29 of the Internal Security Act. The arrest took place on the eve of a march that Boesak was planning to lead on Pollsmoor Prison to demand the release of Nelson Mandela. A magistrate had previously banned the march. Boesak was held incommunicado until his release on bail September 20. The court subsequently eased the conditions of his bail, which amounted, in substance, to a "banning" order against Boesak.

On July 20, 1985, citing increasing violence and disorder in black townships, State President P.W. Botha invoked the Public Safety Act of 1953 and declared an official state of emergency in 36 of South Africa's 265 magisterial districts effective July 21. (The Government's only other such use of the Public Safety Act was in 1960, following rioting in Sharpville.) While the state of emergency applied to less than 15 percent of the country's magisterial districts, it covered nearly all of South Africa's urban black population, including numerous townships in the eastern part of Cape Province and Soweto, the nation's largest black township on the outskirts of Johannesburg. Starting in late October, the State President lifted the state of emergency in some districts, but extended it in others.

A person detained under emergency regulations may be held incommunicado and without charge for up to 14 days, following which the detention may be reordered for an extended period or for the duration of the state of emergency. By the end of 1985, more than 7,000 detentions had taken place under state of emergency regulations. Almost all state of emergency detainees were black. Police figures indicated that 452 of these persons were still being held in detention at the end of the year. Many of those released ultimately were not charged with any offense, a circumstance suggesting that the police had engaged in an arbitrary use of detention powers. The South African Police and the South African Defense Forces were the major security personnel responsible for enforcing the state of emergency. Some analysts have claimed an apparent attempt by the Government to use state of emergency regulations to round up and detain opposition UDF figures.

Under both state of emergency and other security legislation, detentions of children under the age of 16 occurred during 1985. In August, at one Soweto school, police detained some 800 school children, most of whom were under the age of 14. Most of these detainees were released to the custody of their parents within 48 hours. Human rights groups have frequently criticized the Government for longer-term detention of children under the age of 16.

Available evidence suggests that at least 36 trade unionists were detained without charges or trial (primarily under Section 29 of the Internal Security Act) during 1985.

The Internal Security Act of 1982 authorizes the Minister of Law and Order to issue "banning" orders. Under such orders, any person judged by the Minister to be endangering law and order, threatening state security, or promoting the aims of Communism or an unlawful organization can be (1) made to resign as an officer or member of any organization; (2) restricted to or excluded from certain areas; (3) prohibited from meeting with more than one person at a time; (4) ordered to report regularly to a police station; and (5) prohibited from being quoted or published. No court can challenge the Minister's power to issue banning orders, although the Internal Security Act does provide for administrative review of such orders. According to the South African Institute of Race Relations, over 1,400 South Africans have been banned at one time or another since 1950. Approximately 370 of these persons left the country. One prominent banned person is Winnie Mandela, wife of jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela. Mrs. Mandela's banning order, in effect since 1977, continued in 1985. Its terms confined her to Brandfort, Orange Free State, until the Government modified the order in late December to provide for her to be barred only from two judicial districts in the Johannesburg area. Police arrested Mrs. Mandela twice in December for alleged violations of this new order. As of the end of December, she was free on bail pending a hearing on her arrests for these alleged violations. At the end of 1985, a total of 9 persons were officially banned, compared with 11 as of the end of December 1984.

Forced labor is not used in South Africa as a means of political coercion or education, nor as a sanction against political or ideological opinions. A 1984 International Labor Organization (ILO) report notes, however, that under the Prisons Act of 1959, the Commissioner of Prisons can "contract with any authority or public body or with a person or body of persons for the hiring and employment of prisoners under sentence." The report further noted that a large portion of the prisoners designated for such work are blacks who have been convicted of pass law offenses and that the agricultural sector has made the greatest use of this convict labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The power of the South African judiciary at all levels is circumscribed by stringent security legislation and by the jurisprudential principle of parliamentary supremacy, which renders judges powerless to alter, strike down, or refuse to enforce properly passed acts of Parliament. All of South Africa's judges in both the Magistrate's and Supreme Courts are white. The country's only nonwhite members of the bench, two colored magistrates, resigned in September, stating that they did not want to be involved in the adjudication of "political" cases.

South Africa has an adversarial system of criminal justice drawn from a mixed heritage of Roman-Dutch and British jurisprudence. Trials of lesser offenses are adjudicated by magistrates, who are career employees of the civil service in the executive branch and who are widely believed to be progovernment in their views. More serious offenses, including capital crimes, are tried in the Supreme Courts. Determination of guilt or innocence is made by the presiding judge or magistrate. There are no juries. Persons charged with common crimes are presumed innocent until proven guilty, although Parliament has modified this general presumption of innocence for many security offenses. The Internal Security Act effectively places the burden of proof of innocence on an accused for a number of offenses enumerated in the Act. Both security and common crimes cases are tried in civilian courts.

The independence of the judiciary is often questioned in South Africa, particularly at the magistrate level. Some judges of the Supreme Court, appointed to the bench from the ranks of the elite corps of South African Supreme Court practitioners ("advocates"), are believed to demonstrate considerably more intellectual and political independence than do magistrates.

Defendants in all criminal cases have the right to counsel. If a person cannot pay for his or her defense, limited funds for legal assistance are available through the publicly supported Legal Aid Fund and through various private organizations. These sources, however, are insufficient to meet the need. The vast majority of defendants prosecuted for pass law violations appear in court without legal counsel. Courts usually appoint counsel in capital cases where the defendant cannot afford his or her own lawyer. Security trials are often held in remote locations, far from metropolitan areas. Because of case backlogs, postponements and the practice of hearing cases concurrently, criminal trials can often take months, even years, to complete. This is particularly true in security cases.

The Government undertook two significant high treason prosecutions in 1985. One case involved high treason, murder, and other security charges against 22 South Africans associated with the United Democratic Front, Azanian People's Organization [AZAPO], and other groups, arising out of widespread civil unrest in the Vaal Triangle region of Transvaal Province in September 1984. By the end of the year, the trial proper had not yet begun and all defendants were in custody, the courts having refused bail. In another significant security case, 12 UDF figures and four labor union activists were charged with high treason in Natal. In December, the State, in a surprise move, dismissed all charges against the 12 UDF defendants but continued its prosecution of the four labor union leaders, who remained free on bail as the trial continued. The American Bar Association Trial Observer Program has sent monitors to these proceedings.

SOUTH AFRICA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The system of apartheid necessarily involves the Government in extensive regulation of social, personal, and family life. Membership in an ethnic group or race is based on definitions and decisions of the Government under the Population Registration Act. In borderline cases, racial classification is determined administratively by a racial classification board, empowered to weigh evidence and to issue a verdict on an individual's race when the parents' racial classification is not known. Under apartheid, association in many social settings is not a matter of free choice. The Separate Amenities Act allows public premises to be reserved for the exclusive use of persons of a particular race. In recent years, the Government has expanded the scope of administrative exceptions to apartheid laws, and has allowed some restaurants, hotels, theaters, cinemas, drive-in theaters, private hospitals, parks, libraries, intercity railroad coaches, and other public amenities to admit persons of all races upon application. In 1985, the Parliament repealed long-standing statutory bans on marriage and sexual relationships between whites and nonwhites, and the Government also announced that it would consider amendments to the Group Areas Act to accommodate the residential needs of mixed-race couples.

Despite substantial reforms in the area of so-called "petty apartheid" in recent years, a substantial degree of social segregation still exists in South Africa, which is mandated by numerous statutes, provincial ordinances, and municipal by-laws providing for social segregation of the races in a wide range of public facilities, including trains, buses, taxis, parks, cinemas, hotels, and beaches. Social segregation, however, is now being enforced with less rigidity than has been the case in the past and is gradually becoming a matter of local option. State theaters are now desegregated, and in 1985, motion picture theater owners succeeded in persuading authorities to allow them to follow suit for some cinemas. Some local authorities have made use of the limited discretion they have to desegregate facilities under their control, while others have not. Desegregation is thus carried out on an ad hoc rather than on a blanket basis: for example, the Johannesburg City Council desegregated public parks but not public swimming pools. Two examples of desegregation on a national basis took place during 1985: effective September 1, the Department of Transportation desegregated intercity railroad coaches on a limited basis. While "whites only" coaches are still available for those who wish to use them, whites can ride in mixed race cars, if they desire. Many major hotels in South Africa's larger cities now have "international" (i.e., desegregated) status, and the trend here and elsewhere in the area of public accommodations appears to be toward greater desegregation.

Freedom to choose one's own associates is also limited by the Group Areas Act, which holds that the different races must reside in separate areas. In the case of blacks, even the right to reside in a segregated urban "township" is not available unless one has employment and government permission to reside in such an area. Most nonwhites who live in urban township houses rent them from the Government, which owns and subsidizes them. Since 1983, however, blacks have been able to obtain renewable 99-year leases on land in many urban townships for home construction. In 1985, the Government announced that it would introduce a freehold system of land ownership for nonwhites. Many urban townships and portions thereof are still lacking in some or all modern amenities, such as electricity, running water, indoor plumbing, paved roads, and recreational facilities. Townships are often located at inconvenient commuting distances from cities, where most employment opportunities for South Africa's nonwhites are found. Perhaps most importantly, the townships, even where equipped with acceptable amenities and where occupied by prosperous elements of the nonwhite community, exact an immeasurable cost in human dignity from their residents because they are legally segregated communities.

The Government has forcibly relocated many people because the blueprint of group areas, dictated by the apartheid system, did not always correspond to the actual location of the various racial groups. Since 1961, the forced resettlement of an estimated 3.5 million nonwhites has taken place, according to figures of the South African Council of Churches. Government figures issued in 1984 confirmed that 2 million blacks had been resettled since 1960. In early 1985, the Government announced a suspension of forced removals pending a review of its resettlement policy and stated that relocations in the future would only come after negotiations with residents concerning the terms of removal. In several instances, however, the Government has refused to negotiate with recognized black community leaders and has negotiated with representatives chosen by the Government. Resettlement areas, particularly when located in the homelands, usually have inadequate infrastructure and insufficient land and water for profitable agriculture. The Government has also forced some white farmers to sell their land and relocate to allow for creation of the homelands.

The Black Urban Areas Consolidation Act allows police to enter homes without a warrant if any black is suspected of residing or working in the area illegally. The Criminal Procedures Act of 1977 authorizes a judge or magistrate to issue a search warrant if there is some reason to believe that "the internal security of the republic or the maintenance of law and order is likely to be endangered by or in consequence of a 'meeting' being held in a given place." Under this same Act, a police officer may enter, search, and question without a warrant if the officer has reason to believe a warrant would be issued but the delay caused by first obtaining the warrant would defeat the purpose of the search.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of the press deteriorated in 1985 even though South Africa's largely white-owned press continued, when possible, to engage in vigorous criticism of the Government and its policies. Press freedom, however, is seriously circumscribed by several acts of Parliament, including the Publications Act, the Defense Act, the Police Act, the Prisons Act, the Internal Security Act, and the Protection of Information Act. These laws severely restrict reporting on the operation of various departments of government and the publication of views that are radically critical of the status quo. While there were no known convictions of journalists under these Acts in 1985, the Government used these laws throughout the year--pursuing, then dropping charges in some cases--in such a way as to ensure a degree of self-censorship. South Africa's press is sensitive to the aforementioned laws because they render thousands of persons potentially liable to criminal prosecution. Among proscribed areas of reporting are "official secrets" and energy supplies, including petroleum and nuclear energy. An example of the Government's use of these Acts occurred in November, when the Government brought charges under the Internal Security Act against Cape Times Editor Anthony Heard, after his newspaper published his interview with ANC Leader Oliver Tambo. In 1985, following the state of emergency declaration in July, the Government also moved to reduce international as well as national coverage of political unrest in the nation's black and colored townships. On numerous occasions, it barred both foreign and local reporters from areas of unrest or detained them for brief periods for alleged refusal to obey a police order to leave an area. Among the numerous foreign and domestic journalists so arrested were two American correspondents for the Dallas Morning News, and a Kenya-based British journalist for Newsweek magazine who had written an article particularly critical of police conduct in handling unrest in South Africa. The Government also banned the Newsweek issue in question under the Publications Act. South African visas for foreign journalists are often unduly delayed when subjected to lengthy processing procedures.

In September, the Government established an information bureau under the leadership of a Deputy Minister. While the stated purpose of establishing the bureau was to facilitate visits by foreign media representatives, some observers saw the establishment of the bureau as a signal that the Government planned a clampdown on foreign media in South Africa. In November, amid claims by security police that some members of the press had instigated violent acts to obtain sensational photo coverage and that the presence of TV cameras attracted and incited rioters in areas of unrest, the Government banned TV coverage, photography, sketching, and radio recording from areas under state of emergency regulations. Heavy penalties for infractions include fines of up to $7,200 and/or imprisonment for up to 10 years. As a result, media coverage of ongoing black unrest in South Africa, especially through television, has been greatly reduced.

In addition to official censorship and self-censorship, an institutionalized voluntary system of self-regulation of the press exists. The Media Council, formed voluntarily in 1983, has upheld the principle of self-regulation by newspapers. In 1985, the Media Council conducted lengthy proceedings involving a claim brought by the security police against the Johannesburg Star. The issue presented was whether two Star reporters had correctly quoted two security police officers as having been involved in a clandestine campaign to discredit Rev. Allan Boesak, a vigorous critic of the South African Government. The Council found in favor of the two newsmen.

The government-appointed board established under the Publications Act may prohibit the distribution or possession of publications, films, or other materials that in its view are "obscene" or "blasphemous"; that bring any section of the public into ridicule; that harm relations between sections of the public; or that are prejudicial to the safety of the State. Decisions of the Publications Committee may be appealed to the government-appointed Publications Appeal Board, but not to the courts.

SOUTH AFRICA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Internal Security Act seriously obstructs freedom of assembly as it gives magistrates the power to prohibit or impose conditions on the holding of meetings and to close off areas to the public to prevent prohibited gatherings. In response to widespread unrest in 1976, the Minister of Justice banned all outdoor gatherings except sports or specially authorized meetings. The Government has renewed this ban on an annual basis since 1976 and did so again in 1985. Police frequently arrested persons in townships on charges of participating in illegal gatherings.

In addition, the Government has banned other sorts of gatherings, such as indoor meetings of a variety of organizations, and funerals in areas of unrest. In June alone, public meetings of 29 organizations, many affiliated with the UDF, were banned. Also in 1985, the Government banned the Congress of South African Students (COSAS), the country's most extensive and influential organization of black students.

During 1985, some human rights groups charged that government policy, both before and subsequent to the state of emergency declaration on July 20, was to arrest and detain key leadership elements in the opposition UDF. UDF leadership in Natal, Cape, and Transvaal provinces was largely decimated by detentions in 1985. Founded in 1983, the UDF is a loosely organized national movement of several hundred community groups, church and civic organizations and labor unions. Although the movement contains elements that adhere to the more revolutionary values of the African National Congress, most of its member organizations describe themselves as advocates of nonviolent change. There have also been a number of instances of police harassment of legally held meetings.

The South African Labor Relations Act recognizes the right of employees to form and to join trade unions. Amendments to the Labor Relations Act passed between 1979 and 1981 granted South African blacks full status as employees for the first time and removed impediments to the legal operation of black trade unions. Trade union members, approximately 50 percent of whom are black, constitute 13-15 percent of the total labor force of about 12 million. In 1979, less than 100,000 blacks were trade union members. In 1985, black trade union membership stood at nearly 800,000, according to government estimates. In December, 34 black trade unions with an estimated membership of more than 400,000 combined to form a national labor federation, the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU).

Notwithstanding recent reforms in South African labor law, significant race discrimination still exists in the mining industry, where a long-entrenched "job reservation" policy continues to ban blacks and Asians from high paying skilled positions such as blaster, mine manager, and mine overseer. The Labor Relations Act does not cover farm workers and domestic servants, who together comprise approximately 2 million workers (about one-sixth of the total labor force). Workers in these two categories, nearly all of whom are black, enjoy few protections under the law.

With the qualified exception of KwaZulu, none of the homelands has labor legislation to match the post-1979 reforms passed by the South African Parliament. Ciskei has banned a major trade union active in the Eastern Cape (the South African Allied Workers Union), and Bophuthatswana has prohibited unions headquartered elsewhere from operating in its territory.

The right to strike exists under the Labor Relations Act but is qualified by a mandatory prestrike arbitration process that can take as long as 2 months to complete. Nearly all strikes occurring in recent years have been staged by emerging black unions, and most of them have been technically illegal. In addition, the right to strike is seriously modified by the common law right of an employer to fire any striker (whether the strike is legal or illegal) on grounds of breach of the individual's employment contract. In September 1985, a large mining company fired nearly 1,000 legal strikers after they failed to report to work for 2 consecutive days. The strikers' union, the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM), appealed these dismissals to the Industrial Court, which ruled in November that management had committed an unfair labor practice in dismissing the workers. A general prohibition against outdoor meetings for other than sports or cultural purposes has impeded both strike activity and union organizing efforts.

Organized labor's effectiveness in representing workers has grown substantially since 1979. This growth has been evident in a number of ways, among them the following: unionization of key economic sectors (especially mining, metals, and transportation); a steady increase in the number of recognition agreements; black union participation in industrial councils; and increased recourse to the Industrial Court and Conciliation Boards. In addition, the increase in the number of strikes, which reached record levels in 1984 and 1985, reflects the success of black trade unions in mobilizing workers and in articulating grievances.

South African trade unions are independent of the Government, and most of them have no links, official or unofficial, to any political party or movement. Some exceptions are: the all-white South African Confederation of Labor, with about 100,000 members, which is widely believed to have ties to the right-wing Herstigte Nasionale party; a collection of about 11 black trade unions, with a total membership of close to 100,000, which are affiliated with the UDF; and 9 other black unions, with a claimed total membership of 75,000, which are officially affiliated with AZAPO.

South Africa has not been a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) since the early 1960's. The Government monitors but does not prohibit trade union relations with the international labor movement. Government passport and visa policy, however, sometimes impedes these relations. The 75,000-member Council of Unions of South Africa (CUSA) is the only South African labor organization that is a full-scale affiliate of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). The Federation of South African Trade Unions (FOSATU), which was incorporated into the new federation COSATU, had observer status in the ICFTU.

c. Freedom of Religion

South Africa's multiracial society has a wide variety of religious denominations, and the Government generally respects freedom of worship. Religious organizations are allowed to hold meetings and other activities without interference as long as they do not seriously challenge government policies. As with other aspects of South African life, churches are often divided along racial lines, but many churches (including a growing number of white churches) challenge apartheid on moral grounds. The Defense Act provides alternative service options for religious objectors to national military service. Conscientious objectors on nonreligious grounds continue to be subject to a maximum 6-year sentence for refusing to serve.

The Government is often at odds with some of the country's leading churchmen, who are outspoken and vigorous critics of the apartheid system. These include Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg Desmond Tutu, Rev. Allan Boesak, and Archbishop Dennis Hurley, head of the Catholic Archdiocese of Durban. Rev. Boesak was detained under the Internal Security Act from August 27 to September 20. The bail order defining the terms of his freedom, pending the outcome of charges against him under the Internal Security Act, specifically permitted him to address bona fide religious gatherings, while seriously hampering his movements and contacts. In November, a court lifted an earlier requirement that Rev. Boesak surrender his passport, but the Government nevertheless suspended his passport. In February, Archbishop Denis Hurley was acquitted of charges under the Police Act. The Government had charged that he had made false statements concerning atrocities allegedly committed by the Namibian special police unit, Koevoet, but opened the trial against him with an admission that the Archbishop had not committed any violations of the Police Act.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Black residence and travel are regulated by "influx control" or "pass" laws that severely restrict the right of blacks to remain in a given urban area for more than 72 hours at a time. Periodically, police conduct raids or sweeps of restricted areas during which all passes are checked. Persons illegally residing in the area are arrested. Upon conviction of a pass law offense, a person is subject to being transported to his or her assigned homeland. In 1983, in the landmark "Rikhotso" case, the Supreme Court held that black migrants who have worked 10 years or more for the same employer, or 15 years for successive employers, are entitled to permanent residence in the area of employment. The decision was not self-executing, and blacks must undergo a lengthy administrative process to document their claim to these rights. Conditions for obtaining these rights were eased in 1985. The Government has linked the granting of such rights to the availability of housing, and many people eligible for permanent urban residence are prevented from living in urban areas due to housing shortages. Arrests for pass law violations decreased markedly in the latter part of the year.

In 1985, a study by the President's Council recommended the abolition of influx control, a long-standing and central pillar of apartheid policy. State President P.W. Botha subsequently pledged that the influx control laws would be replaced by a program of "orderly urbanization," the content of which is not yet known. The pass laws are a major irritant in the daily lives of blacks.

The Government announced that it would support repeal of an existing "whites only" provision in the immigration law during the 1986 parliamentary session in favor of a provision allowing nonwhites to immigrate to South Africa if they can be assimilated into an existing racial group.

In 1985, the Government also announced it would drop a legal requirement for whites to obtain permits to visit nonwhite areas (in practice, the Government had seldom enforced this restriction on travel). As part of state of emergency regulations, however, police often restricted entry into townships in emergency-affected areas.

Whites must possess valid travel documents in order to travel abroad and to emigrate legally. With the exception of banned persons, these documents are not difficult for whites to obtain.

The South African Supreme Court has declared that a citizen's access to a South African passport is a privilege and not a right. Under a 1982 court ruling, the Minister of Home Affairs has an unchallenged right to revoke a passport without giving any reasons for his action. In October 1985, State President P.W. Botha ordered the refusal of passports to a group of eight white students of the University of Stellenbosch who wished to travel to Zambia to hold talks with members of the African National Congress. A group of Dutch Reformed Church ministers was refused passports for similar purposes. In November, Rev. Allan Boesak cancelled plans to travel to the U.S. when the Government held his passport. The South African Government frequently refuses passports to black trade union figures wishing to travel abroad, including to the United States. The incidence of passport refusals to trade union officials appeared to increase after the declaration of the state of emergency.

The Government generally requires that any individual assigned to an "independent" homeland must travel on a homeland travel document when traveling abroad. Legal restrictions exist for Asians who wish to reside in or visit the Orange Free State and certain parts of Natal province. A ruling National Party congress in the Orange Free State voted in 1985 to begin the process of lifting these restrictions on Asian residence.

Although the South African Government is not a signatory to international conventions on refugees, it provides informal sanctuary to as many as 40,000 refugees from Mozambique. Relief assistance is provided to these refugees by South African private and voluntary organizations, and the Government permits access by international observers to areas where refugees are found.

There are approximately 22,000 South Africans who have been granted refugee status in other African countries. Despite a significant increase in domestic violence during 1985, there has been no marked emigration of black South Africans at the level observed in 1976. While there are no generally accepted statistics on the outflow of white South Africans, reports indicate that a substantial increase in emigration occurred, in part at least as a reaction to domestic violence, in 1985.

SOUTH AFRICA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Until 1984, South Africa's national political institutions were reserved for whites only. Under the new Constitution that came into effect in September 1984, the right of political participation at the national level has been extended, albeit on a limited basis, to South Africa's colored and Asian citizens. The Government continues to deny national political rights to South Africa's black majority, who comprise 72 percent of the population. Under the new Constitution, all officially registered political parties operate as freely as the ruling National Party. The new Constitution created a tricameral parliament with separate chambers for whites, coloreds, and Asians. Members for each house are elected by separate, racially based constituencies. Each house has primary responsibility for legislation affecting its own racial constituency. A strong chief executive, the State President, decides which issues of general concern are to be treated by all three chambers. If efforts at consensus on general affairs matters fail, they are referred to the President's Council, a body composed of whites, coloreds, and Indians, for an advisory opinion. The lines between "own affairs" and general affairs are not always very precise. Matters that appear to be exclusively general affairs include foreign policy, defense, national security, and black affairs. Education is normally dealt with as an "own affair" but is subject to general laws prescribing norms and standards for salaries, curriculum, and examinations. The terms of the new Constitution and the existence of a white majority in Parliament work to ensure control by the white House of Assembly over key general affairs. While there is a vigorous, outspoken opposition in the House of Assembly, the ruling National Party, which has dominated South African political affairs since its first parliamentary victory in 1948, dominates legislative affairs by sheer force of numbers. Within the National Party, viewpoints range from "verligte" (enlightened) to "verkrampte" (reactionary), with internal differences resolved in party caucuses.

Lacking a role in the national Parliament, political participation for blacks remains limited to a franchise in one of the 10 homelands, to which all blacks are assigned through ethnic or linguistic identification. Such assignments take place irrespective of the wishes of those assigned and without regard to the fact that they may not have been born, nor ever lived in, nor even visited their putative homeland. When a homeland "requests" and is then granted "independence" by the South African Government, blacks assigned to that homeland lose their South African citizenship and receive the "citizenship" of the homeland. Approximately 8 million blacks have been denationalized under this policy by South African legislation granting "independence" to four homelands: Transkei (1976); Bophuthatswana (1977); Venda (1979); and Ciskei (1981). The South African Government stated in 1985 that it had no intention of abolishing the homelands system. It did indicate, however, that it would propose legislation in the 1986 parliamentary session that would extend an offer of South African citizenship to all of the country's blacks, including "citizens" of the so-called "independent" homelands, who would presumably have dual citizenship. The exact terms of this potential citizenship arrangement remain to be defined in new legislation.

SOUTH AFRICA

Nearly 10 million blacks live in townships near white urban areas. The only voting rights blacks are able to exercise are those granted under the Community Councils Act of 1977 and the Black Local Authorities Act of 1982. The Black Local Authorities Act of 1982 elevated the status of black municipal authorities to that enjoyed by white municipal governments. It did nothing, however, about the critical problems of inadequate financial resources and the lack of political credibility faced by black local government. Much of the violence that took place in black townships in 1985 was directed at black town councils and councillors, underscoring the weakness of these local authorities. In 1985, Parliament passed legislation to replace all-white provincial councils with multiracial regional services councils, to include representatives of black, Asian, and colored local governments. It is expected that the first of these multiracial bodies will be formed during 1986.

No women presently serve as ministers in the Government. Two women serve as members of the State President's Council. Three of the 178 seats in the Parliament's white House of Assembly are held by women. The colored House of Representatives has two women members, and the Indian House of Delegates one. In 1985, 9 women served alongside 167 men in provincial councils. Generally speaking, women have achieved more success in electoral politics at the local than at the national level.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The South African Government extends little or no cooperation to various United Nations bodies or private organizations attempting to investigate the Government's human rights record. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is permitted access to convicted security prisoners but may visit them only annually. The ICRC does not visit security prisoners sentenced to death because the South African Government refuses to permit the ICRC to speak to the prisoners in private. Access to most, but not all, security detainees is denied. In 1985, the Government granted access to several Western interviewers, including British citizens and Americans, to jailed ANC leader Nelson Mandela. The Government permitted an American Bar Association representative entry into the country to observe proceedings in two significant treason trials that were pending in Natal and in Transvaal provinces. The Government refused numerous other requests to interview Mandela, including requests from some members of the U.S. Congress.

A number of South African organizations observe, report, and contest human rights violations in the country. In addition to black political organizations, the Lawyers for Human Rights, the Black Sash, the Legal Resources Center, the South African Council of Churches and the Detainees' Parents' Support Committee are active on a wide range of human rights issues and assist persons who have been incarcerated under security laws. The South African Institute of Race Relations' (SAIRR) annual report is a primary source on human rights questions in South Africa. Amnesty International, in its 1985 report (covering 1984), expressed concern about the imprisonment or restriction of prisoners of conscience. It was also concerned about the detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government and of local administrations in the South African "homelands." Freedom House rates South Africa "partly free."

SOUTH AFRICA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

According to the World Bank, the South African population was 32.5 million in 1985 (whites 16 percent, blacks 72 percent, coloreds 9 percent, Asians 3 percent), with an overall growth rate of 2.4 percent. The most recent census of the country's population, taken in 1980, records average annual population growth rates by racial group from 1970 to 1980 as: whites, 1.7 percent; coloreds, 2.2 percent; Asians, 2.4 percent; and blacks, 2.7 percent. More than half of South Africa's blacks reside in the country's 10 homelands, which are for the most part resource-poor and lacking in job opportunities. Per capita gross national product was $2,490 in 1983. Income distribution has traditionally been skewed along racial lines.

The South African economy is dualistic in nature, containing both a highly sophisticated modern sector and a large, underdeveloped rural sector, where the vast majority of people is engaged in subsistence agriculture. Virtually the entire white and Asian populations receive their income from the country's "first world" economy. The black population also participates in the "first world" economy, generally at significantly lower rates of skill/authority and remuneration levels than whites. Job reservation has been lifted, however, apart from some job categories in the mines. The modern economy has been hard hit by 4 years of recession and this downturn has exacerbated black unrest.

Subsistence agriculture, supplemented by remittances from relatives working in "white" South Africa, is the most prevalent source of livelihood in the homelands. Since many, if not most, of the economically active males from the homelands seek employment in the modern sector of "white" South Africa, a disproportionate number of dependents (women, children, and the elderly) reside in the homelands. Though agricultural progress is being achieved in some rural black areas, the homelands as a whole do not produce enough food to feed their resident populations.

Black unemployment is not measured directly. Government figures show an increase in unemployment among the economically active population throughout 1985. These figures do not reflect conditions of unemployment and underemployment in the rural areas. The official unemployment rate among blacks was recorded at 7.8 percent in June 1985. Private estimates of total black unemployment (including the 10 homelands) range up to 25 percent. In some townships, unemployment is thought to be dramatically higher.

Official World Bank statistics indicate an overall infant mortality rate of 85.6 per 1,000 live births in 1985. Official government statistics on infant mortality by racial group in 1978 were: whites, 14.9; coloreds, 80.6; and Asians, 25.3. Records for blacks are incomplete, but estimates of infant mortality among this sector of the population range up to more than 200 per 1,000 live births, especially in rural homelands such as Ciskei. The much higher rate of infant mortality among blacks is ascribed largely to poor nutrition, exacerbated by drought, to poor sanitary conditions, and to a lack of sufficient hospitals and doctors for blacks, especially in the homelands. A respected university study done in 1981--before the drought became serious--found 2.9 million children (mostly black) suffering from at least mild forms of malnutrition. These factors also account for the difference in life expectancy among the different population groups. World Bank statistics for 1985 show a life expectancy of 62.5 years for all South Africans. A 1983 South African Government report indicates whites have a life expectancy of 70.3 years, Asians, 55 years, coloreds, 59 years, and blacks, 57.5 years.

The effects of the drought continued, despite improved rainfall at the end of the year. Farmers remain uncertain whether the rainfall will be sufficient to ensure a return to normal harvests. The South African Government has provided drought relief of $20 million to the homelands and is currently spending $13 million for job creation and training to combat the effects of the recession and the drought. Many government critics believe these amounts fall far short of what is necessary and have called upon the Government to provide money for emergency feeding schemes.

The most recent World Bank data available indicate that as of 1960, 57 percent of the adult population of South Africa was literate. As school attendance for whites, coloreds, and Asians has traditionally been compulsory, it is likely that most adult members of these groups are literate. The Government began to implement a system of free compulsory education up to the fourth grade for blacks in 1981. This system is now in effect at 250 schools, with a total of 100,000 students affected. Some surveys have claimed that 50-60 percent of all adult blacks are literate. Such findings are difficult to corroborate, given the rural location of so much of the black population and disagreement over standards used to gauge literacy. In 1981, black pupil enrollment was just over 5 million in regular primary through high school grades. Only slightly more than 1 percent of enrollment was in the last grade of high school, illustrative of the high drop-out rate. Having announced the goal of equal education for all population groups, the Government has increased the total education budget so that it exceeds that for defense. While the Government has increased outlays for black education from $35 million in 1972 to $354 million (not constant dollars), there remains a high disparity between spending on education, with outlays for white students far exceeding those for blacks. The South African Institute of Race Relations estimates per capita spending on education as $661 for whites, $435 for Asians, $227 for coloreds, and $94 for blacks. Black enrollment at "white" universities has been growing slowly. SAIRR figures indicate that in 1983, 14 percent of the students at South Africa's 4 English-speaking universities were nonwhite, while there was a sprinkling of nonwhite students at the country's 5 Afrikaans universities.

Political unrest that swept many of the country's black and colored townships in 1985 took the form of school boycotts in many areas, including Soweto, the nation's largest black township. This has compounded the problem caused by an already poor educational system for blacks.

South Africa suffers from a housing shortage that continues to worsen, with the black population being the hardest hit. Early in 1985, the Minister of Cooperation and Development announced that the black housing shortage had reached 364,270 or an estimated 196,000 houses outside the homelands. Despite this enormous need, the housing situation is worsening. A 1-year program to sell 500,000 government-owned houses (most of which are occupied by blacks) at discounts of up to 40 percent, begun in July 1983, was extended beyond its original 1 year timeframe and continued through July 1985. During the first 14 months of the program, however, only 32,000 homes were sold. The granting to urban blacks of 99-year leasehold rights, which are renewable and inheritable, has not been widely utilized because of inadequate access to finance and because the sites offered were often distant and inconvenient. The Government has announced the intent to enact freehold land tenure for blacks; its entire urbanization policy is reportedly under review.

The Labor Relations Act of 1956 provides a mechanism for negotiation between labor and management of industry-by-industry minimum wage standards. At present, some 101 industries come under the provisions of the Act. There is no universal minimum wage in South Africa. The Occupational and Safety Act prohibits the employment of minors under the age of 16 in certain industries. The Act on Basic Conditions of Employment sets forth certain minimum standards for employment, including provisions for a standard work week of 46 hours in most industries, as well as mandatory provisions for vacation and sick time. The Machinery and Occupational Safety Act mandates minimum standards for the design and use of certain types of industrial machinery.

Women of all races in South Africa suffer varying degrees of legal, cultural, and economic discrimination, most of which is based on tradition rather than codified in law. In 1984, South African statistics showed that women constituted 41.1 percent of the work force, but held only 12 percent of managerial positions. Women traditionally earn lower wages than men and are, generally speaking, underrepresented in the country's political and business establishment. At school, they are often encouraged to take traditional "women's courses" in such areas of study as nursing, education, and the humanities. As noted in Section 3, women are, for the most part, not prominent in government. Like their male counterparts, black women suffer from extensive legal handicaps and acts of discrimination that stem from South Africa's system of apartheid. Black women also suffer from other legal disabilities based on sex. They are regarded by South African law as perpetual minors. There is some movement, however, to extend provisions of the Matrimonial Property Act of 1984 (which abolished the marital power of the husband and substantially increased the property rights of white, colored, and Asian women) to black women. Maternity benefits are not guaranteed under South African law, and a pregnant woman can be legally dismissed from her job. Against a backdrop of traditional sex and race discrimination, a nascent women's rights movement has taken hold in South Africa. Women's organizations, often multiracial, have been at the forefront of the struggle against both race and sex discrimination.

NAMIBIA

Formerly German South West Africa, Namibia has been ruled by the Republic of South Africa since 1915. The United Nations lifted South Africa's 1920 League of Nations mandate in 1966. However, South Africa refused to relinquish its possession and has ignored a 1971 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice upholding U.N. authority over Namibia and calling for South Africa's immediate withdrawal. In 1978, the United States, United Kingdom, France, Federal Republic of Germany, and Canada drafted a proposal for Namibian independence worked out in talks with South Africa, the South West Africa Peoples Organization (SWAPO) insurgents, and the neighboring states (known as the "frontline states"). This proposal became United Nations Security Council Resolution 435. It calls for the cessation of all hostilities, the phased withdrawal of South African forces, and free elections under U.N. supervision. South Africa has said that it will not implement Resolution 435 without a satisfactory commitment by the Angolan Government on the parallel withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola. In the fall of 1984, the Angolans made a formal proposal on the numbers and timing of Cuban troop withdrawal. South Africa responded with its own proposals. The United States is committed to the U.N. plan and has been playing a mediating role in negotiations between South Africa and Angola.

A South African Government proclamation in June 1985 gave considerable autonomy over internal affairs to a group of internal political parties, known as the Multiparty Conference (MPC). The MPC formed a "Transitional Government of National Unity," more widely known as the "interim government." A number of parties opposed to South African rule refused to join the MPC. Among these parties was SWAPO, which is waging a guerrilla war against South African rule from outside the country but is still allowed to operate as a political party in Namibia, despite harassment by the authorities. A number of other parties, including a major part of The Southwest Africa National Union, the oldest nonviolent opposition group, also refused to join the MPC. A South African appointed Administrator General still sits in Windhoek but with drastically reduced powers. The United States and the rest of the international community do not recognize the interim government and hold the Republic of South Africa responsible for the actions of the Namibian authorities it has appointed.

A majority (60 percent) of Namibians live by subsistence agriculture. The economy relies on mining, ranching, and fishing. A weak and unstable market for minerals, persistent drought, and overfishing by some foreign concerns--particularly from the Soviet bloc--have caused a lingering recession. Uncertainty about Namibia's political future has discouraged potential foreign investment. Tourism is one of the few bright spots on the economic horizon. Meanwhile, the South African Government provides almost $400,000 a day in direct aid to Namibia.

Most reports of human rights violations by government authorities or SWAPO involve actions taken in the war zone in the north. Low-level guerrilla conflict has focused on northern Namibia since 1966 when SWAPO first turned to violence. Sporadic incidents of violence plague the entire country, but most of the fighting takes place along Namibia's border with Angola, especially in the Ovamboland region. The Ovambo ethnic group comprises about 50 percent of Namibia's population and provides the main support for SWAPO. In recent years, the combat has been conducted by small groups belonging to SWAPO's military branch, the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN). SWAPO uses the denser foliage of the rainy season to infiltrate annually northern Namibia from bases in Angola and to carry out sabotage missions. The South African Defense Force (SADF) and the South West African Territorial Force (SWATF) attempt to root out the SWAPO teams and on several occasions in 1985 conducted major "hot pursuit" operations across the border into Angola. A police counter insurgency force known as "Koevoet," (meaning crowbar) has played a prominent role in combat operations.

There were a number of civilian deaths attributed to both government security forces and to SWAPO, including a number caused by mines or bombs planted by SWAPO in public places. 1985 saw a continuation of arbitrary detention without access to counsel or visits by family members and of torture and other abuses by security forces. However, in 1985 a number of prisoners were released.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1. Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political killing

As an arena of guerrilla conflict, Namibia has seen a number of deaths due to terrorist bombings. Post offices, schools, and other government buildings in the north are heavily barricaded and patrolled. According to security forces, land mines planted in roads in Ovamboland and even farther south have claimed the lives of 15 civilians, with an additional 41 civilians killed in other SWAPO actions. SWAPO guerrillas have reportedly murdered some Ovambo civilians, apparently in an attempt to intimidate others from cooperating with the South African Government.

The SADF and SWATF and the police have themselves been accused of murder. It is a familiar axiom that SWAPO guerrillas who are captured rarely see the inside of a courtroom, and killing or disappearance of captives who refuse to cooperate with authorities have been reported. Defense officials insist that they investigate all charges of murder. They also assert that the murders they have confirmed are acts of indiscipline and not policy. Critics contend that the SADF/SWATF sometimes do nothing, even when informed of instances of misconduct. In October, in a case given considerable publicity, two SADF servicemen were convicted of murdering an Ovambo shopkeeper in February. The two men were given jail terms of 22 and 18 years respectively.

Some clergymen and human rights activists have accused the police paramilitary unit known as "Koevoet," of numerous atrocities, including murder (the name "Koevoet" was dropped in mid-1985 when the unit came under the authority of the Southwest Africa Police, reporting to the interim government). On January 26, 1985, the South African Government agreed to pay $35,000 in damages, along with legal costs, to settle claims of an alleged unlawful killing and a series of assaults by Koevoet. No criminal prosecutions, for which a higher standard of proof is required, have resulted from these cases.

NAMIBIA

On January 27, 1985, Thomas Shindoba Nikanur, a contract miner with Consolidated Diamond Mines in Oranjemund, died while in detention in Osire. Nikanur had been detained under security legislation and, according to security police, allegedly had hung himself with his own socks. An official inquest into his death was launched on September 30 but was later postponed to January 27, 1986.

The security forces are not obliged to notify anyone when a person is detained and often hold detainees incommunicado. They are sometimes accused of ignoring requests for information from family members and friends of those who have been detained. As a result, some Namibians have "disappeared" only to turn up in detention cells.

SWAPO reportedly uses abductions to win recruits, although SWAPO officials contend that all its recruits join voluntarily. In May, news accounts reported that SWAPO forces had abducted some 80 Ovambo school children from a school near Oshakati. Sixteen of the children subsequently escaped. The reported number of those involved was later revised downward. Nevertheless, the episode seemed a large-scale revival of a tactic which SWAPO had apparently discontinued several years ago because of the negative publicity which ensued. A SADF officer said smaller scale SWAPO abductions remain a common feature of life in Ovamboland.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Political leaders, clergymen, and others regularly make detailed allegations that the police and security forces have engaged in brutal treatment against civilians, both in and out of detention, including the use of solitary confinement and beatings. Several civil cases in 1985 confirm at least a few of these allegations. Documents filed in a court case in 1985 contained statements that the plaintiff, a Mr. Katofa, had, during the initial stages of his detention, been "assaulted from time to time by members of the security police." Security officials point to these court cases as proof that claims are investigated and, if valid, pursued in legal channels.

Several attorneys and journalists have asserted that security forces in the north are ruthless when extracting information from alleged SWAPO sympathizers or agents.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Two key articles of security legislation, enacted into law via proclamations by the Administrator General (AG 9 and AG 26), give security forces to broad detention power. AG 9 of 1977 constitutes the legal basis for most detentions and permits 30-day detentions without charge of anyone deemed to have committed an offense, to be planning an offense, or to have knowledge of an offense. Security forces are considered to include the police, the railway police, the South African Defense Force, and the South West Africa Territorial Force. Namibians detained under AG 9 are denied access to legal counsel, except with permission from the cabinet of the interim government. AG 9 initially applied only to the far northern areas of Namibia. However, since 1979 the "security districts" have been extended south to include most central areas, including Windhoek. Altogether, more than 80 percent of the population is subject to AG 9.

In security cases another provision, AG 26, allows indefinite detention without trial, under authorization from the cabinet (previously from the Administrator General). AG 26 also provides several constructive guarantees not provided by AG 9. It states that detainees are entitled to a copy of the arrest warrant and to reasons for the arrest in writing. It further stipulates that they are also entitled to visits by medical practitioners and magistrates. AG 26 also provides for a review committee, but the cabinet is not required to follow review committee recommendations. The record in enforcing AG 26 rights is mixed. Persons detained under AG 26 are rarely aware of their rights and even more rarely have access to legal counsel prepared to pursue those rights. However, in at least two cases taken up by attorneys legal action or the threat of such action won releases. The Katofa case was one instance. Until mid-1985 Namibians detained under security legislation had no recourse to the courts. In 1985, however, attorneys for Mr. Katofa, who was detained under AG 26, applied in the Windhoek Supreme Court seeking legal access. They pointed out that the Administrator General had been replaced by the interim government, which owed its establishment to a South African Government proclamation containing the MPC's "bill of fundamental rights." These rights included one that guarantees "no one shall be detained for an indefinite period of time without a fair and proper trial by a court." The Windhoek Supreme Court found that the cabinet had failed to show sufficient cause and ordered Katofa's release. In another 1985 case, the threat of legal action won release of an AG 26 detainee, Mr. Abed Christian. Section 6 of the South African Terrorism Act 83 of 1967 still applies in Namibia. However, it is rarely invoked as grounds for detention.

South African State President P.W. Botha stated in Parliament that as of February 1985, 54 persons were being detained without trial for periods of more than 30 days. He also said that another seven were being held indefinitely under provisions of AG 26. On November 14, 1985, interim government Minister of Justice Fanuel Kozonquizi stated that 50 Namibians were being held under AG 9, primarily because they are "witnesses" in pending trials, and that another 6 were being held under AG 26.

The Newspaper, The Namibian, publishes a weekly column listing those known to be in detention and those believed to be in detention. Its November 8 edition listed those figures as 22 and 23, respectively. Among those known to be detained without trial is Petrus Haimbondi, reportedly detained in 1981, who was the only known intern of the Keikanachab Camp outside Mariental not released from custody when the camp was closed in late 1984. On October 22, 1985, a senior member of the Evangelical Lutheran church, Rev. Junius Kaapanda, was taken into custody under security legislation. He was still being held at the end of the year.

In the recent past some detainees were released subject to certain restrictions, as under the South African Internal Security Act. These restrictions usually entailed strict curfew hours, confinement to the city of residence, and a prohibition on meetings with more than four other persons. In 1985, 19-year-old restrictions were lifted against Nathaniel Maxwillili, a SWAPO acting president living in Walvis Bay. In late October, the interim government lifted the ban on a Roman Catholic priest, Father Herman Klein-Hitpass, who had been exiled from Namibia to Walvis Bay in 1978. No reliable statistics exist on others who remain in restriction.

In late 1983, the Administrator General established a commission of inquiry to make recommendations on the "adequacy, fairness and efficacy of legislation pertaining to the internal security of the territory." The commission was chaired by Justice H.P. Van Dyk and conducted hearings throughout the country during 1984. In late 1985, the commission's report was handed to the interim government cabinet. The report has not yet been made public.

There is no forced labor in Namibia.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

On November 14, the interim government released 21 SWAPO members who had been transferred several months earlier from Robben Island prison in South Africa. Robben Island is reserved for political prisoners. All but four of the released men had been serving life sentences for violations of the Terrorism Act. Fourteen of them had been sentenced together on February 9, 1968, after one of the most important political trials affecting Namibia. SWAPO Secretary-General Toivo Ja Toivo, who was released from Robben Island in 1984, was also sentenced at this 1968 trial. The interim government cabinet said it had taken the decision to release the prisoners "within the spirit of national reconciliation." Also on November 14, the interim government released from Windhoek central prison another SWAPO member who had served 5 years of a 7-year sentence.

Many detainees are held without charges under AG 9 and AG 26. However, persons brought to trial can expect a hearing based on the legal merits of their case. They have access to legal counsel and can expect the charges against them to be clearly stated. The judiciary has demonstrated independence from government intimidation.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Security legislation allows the security forces almost unlimited powers of search and seizure. In the operational area--the sectors along the northern border--invasion of home is said to be routine. On May 27 security police raided the homes of 11 senior SWAPO members in Windhoek and the southern city of Gibeon. This night raid saw the confiscation of SWAPO literature, pamphlets, and badges. Cars are regularly stopped and searched when entering checkpoints to the northern region; they are also periodically stopped and scrutinized when entering or leaving government installations in the operational area.

Politically active Namibians regularly complain that the authorities keep them under surveillance. Security police, often disguised as businessmen, reportedly have offered money to activists' friends in return for information on their movements. In December 1984, a prominent Namibian journalist found in her mail a top secret instruction from the Pretoria police to the postmaster in Windhoek ordering that her mail be screened. The journalist revealed the letter to the press and was promptly arrested for violating the Official Secrets Act and the Post Office Act. The charges were withdrawn January 31, 1985.

In 1977, Judge T. Marthinus Steyn used his tenure as Administrator General to ease apartheid in Namibia. Laws prohibiting interracial marriage and sexual relations were repealed, and laws restricting the movement of individuals based on race were abolished. Today integrated facilities are the rule. Most hotels and restaurants are officially open to all races. However, at least one Windhoek restaurant blatantly maintains a whites-only admission policy. Several others seem to use more subtle methods to discourage nonwhite patrons. Nonwhites reportedly face open hostility from white thugs when attempting to use the municipal swimming pool. Poverty restricts most blacks and coloreds from moving out of their respective townships into the white neighborhoods of Windhoek. In December 1985, Namibia's libraries, including the Windhoek public library, which were operated by the second-tier Administration for Whites were opened to nonwhites.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Namibian newspapers are subject to South African press laws, including the Internal Security Act of 1950. These laws limit reporting on certain matters such as military affairs and prisons. Yet even with this restriction, the Namibian press often contains lively and irreverent reporting, and its editorial writing regularly includes anti-South African and even pro-SWAPO comment. Newspapers have embarrassed the interim government with disclosures of the salaries and perquisites provided to MPC representatives. The installation of the interim government, whose bill of fundamental rights guarantees the freedom of expression, suggested a looser rein on the press. However, the cabinet required an $8,000 deposit from the owners of The Namibian newspaper before allowing them to publish the newspaper's inaugural edition on August 30, 1985.

Publications which are banned in South Africa are also banned in Namibia. However, Windhoek book and periodical retailers carry many publications which one would not find in South Africa. Censorship laws seem to be less stringently applied in Namibia than in South Africa.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

On June 17, 1985, critics of the interim government organized a peaceful demonstration to protest the installation of the government. The demonstration took place in Katutura, a subsection of Windhoek. Security police, many of them "Koevoet" members, disrupted the event and brutally dispersed participants. Church observers reported that over 70 people had been injured: one was a pregnant woman who subsequently suffered a miscarriage. The interim government pledged to pursue the matter, but no convictions resulted.

All political parties must apply for permission to convene meetings. The Prohibition and Notification of Meetings Act of 1981 bars any political party from holding a public meeting of a certain size if that party advocates violence as a means of changing the status quo. This provision has allowed the government to limit the political activities of SWAPO members. In 1985, applications of the faction of the South West Africa Union (SWANU) which refused to join the interim government were also denied. This group is an important part of the nonviolent opposition to the interim government. On August 25, 1985, police arrested 52 people during preparations for a commemoration in Katatura of the 19th anniversary of the "armed struggle" in Namibia. On August 26, police dispersed a demonstration which followed the court appearances of those arrested the previous day. The case was subsequently postponed twice. On September 30, the date of one postponement, police arrested 75 people outside the Windhoek magistrate's court under the Demonstrations in or near Court Buildings Prohibition Act of 1982. This law had been made applicable to Namibia on June 15, 1985,--2 days before the inauguration of the interim government, even though the interim government's bill of fundamental rights guarantees the right of "peaceful assembly."

Six labor unions are registered in Namibia, and all are nominally open to all races. Only one of the six has a sizable black membership: the Mine Workers Union (MWU) based in Tsumeb. The Department of Civic Affairs reports that only the MWU and the Municipal Staff Association are functioning labor organizations. The MWU is represented in only one of the three mining firms. Neither union has been noticeably active. Migrant labor is a staple of the mining and fishing industries. Many of the migrant workers are Ovambos unwilling to risk being discharged and forced back to the operational area by loss of their income, a situation which may discourage labor militancy.

In November, the Namibian national assembly approved a bill prohibiting outsiders from forming trade unions and employers organizations in the territory. A cabinet spokesman said the bill was not intended to restrict the right of Namibians to form trade unions but to ensure that they exercise that right on their own initiative free from outside influences.

Namibians enjoy complete freedom of religion. Almost all Namibians are Christians. The Lutheran church has by far the largest share of adherents: the 1985 merger of two Lutheran branches formed the Evangelical Lutheran Church, to which 7 out of 10 Namibians belong. The Catholic, Anglican, Methodist, and Dutch Reformed churches are also active.

Most church officials are openly critical of the South African and interim governments and complain that this stance causes them to be regularly harassed and inconvenienced by the authorities. Clerics have been affected by detentions and passport denials. The interim government reportedly delayed one education aid project sponsored by the Namibian Council of Churches until the project was taken over by a secular group. Several South African Defense Force officials have argued that the clerics are SWAPO sympathizers and supporters. The clerics deny allegiance to SWAPO, stating only that they wish to see Namibia become independent. Clergymen in northern Namibia complain that security regulations hamper their travel to outlying areas.

NAMIBIA

The military conscription system makes no provision for conscientious objectors.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

On February 26, 1985, the Administrator General issued an order under the Security Districts Proclamation which states that no person may enter six northern and northeastern districts without first obtaining a permit issued by the police. The districts are Ovamboland, Kavango, Kaokoland, Eastern Caprivi, Bushmanland, and Hereroland east. Everyone must apply in person at a police station and fill out a form giving their reason for travel. Approval of such applications can take up to 2 weeks. Since the order was issued, several people have been denied permits. In at least one case, the police refused to give reasons for the denial.

Clerics in northern Namibia complain that these regulations greatly restrict their ability to attend to their congregations, particularly when they must travel from Ovamboland into Kavango. One church leader was offered a multiple-entry permit, but he rejected it as an illegitimate special privilege.

Though enforcement of the requirement that travelers present permits at roadway checkpoints leading into the northern sectors has reportedly grown lax during the latter half of 1985, travelers without permits still risk being turned away. A dusk-to-dawn curfew in the operational area also restricts freedom of movement. In addition, the potential danger of land mines discourages travel on nontarred roads.

The authorities control travel beyond South Africa through denials of passports or "travel documents," which are required of Namibians seeking to journey overseas. Those persons deemed to be sympathetic to SWAPO or who are officially associated with SWAPO are usually given passports valid for only 1 year rather than the regular 5-year period. For example, Roman Catholic Bishop Boniface Haushiku has been denied written requests for a 5-year passport and issued passports valid only for one year. Editor of the Namibian, Gwen Lister, and SWAPO Secretary-General Toivo Ja Toivo are other examples. In some cases, individuals are refused passports altogether, as in the 1985 case of SWAPO internal Foreign Affairs Secretary Nico Bessinger. All persons entering South Africa or Namibia must have a passport and visa unless they can prove to be South African or Namibian by law or descent.

In November, the national assembly passed a law requiring non-Namibians to apply for special permits if they wish to reside in Namibia for longer than 30 days. The law also provides for the deportation of people deemed to be "detrimental to the welfare of the territory or its inhabitants."

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: the Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Namibians do not have the right to change their government. Ruled by an Administrator General prior to June 17, 1985, they are now ruled by South Africa through an interim government which they did not elect and which is not accountable to them. Ostensibly, the MPC interim government has full control over all government portfolios, excepting defense and foreign affairs, which the South African Government retains. The six parties of the MPC divided the cabinet seats among themselves after sustained negotiations. No elections were held. The cabinet enacts legislation through a national assembly, whose members were also appointed by the parties.

In 1978, the prospect of independence led to the creation of a number of political parties seeking representation via the election mandated by United Nations Resolution 435. At one period, some 44 political organizations existed, several of which had only a handful of members. About a dozen political parties have credible structures and membership rolls. Six of these "credible" parties take part in the interim government.

The interim government inherited a complex three-tier administrative structure. The first-tier is the central government level. The second-tier authorities are separate ethnic governing bodies representing each of the 10 officially designated population groups. Third-tier authorities, such as municipal governments and village management boards, provide local services. The control of facilities such as schools, hospitals, and libraries by the ethnic second-tier authorities tends to reserve the best available facilities for whites, who enjoy a much higher tax base. The issue of whether to dismantle the second-tier structure or if not, how to amend it, is the most divisive question facing the interim government. Unable to resolve the matter, the cabinet and national assembly in September 1985 created a constitutional council charged with arriving at a compromise on this and other constitutional issues.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Critics of Namibia's human rights situation have visited Namibia. U.S. Senator Edward Kennedy paid a 1-day visit to Windhoek in January 1985. A labor party delegation from the United Kingdom's House of Commons journeyed through Namibia in early 1985. The Namibian Council of Churches occasionally sponsors visits of individuals and groups critical of the internal situation. The Namibia Communications Center, an ecumenical agency based in London, chronicles reported human rights abuses in Namibia.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report (covering 1984), expressed concern about the detention without trial of political detainees and the allegations that some detainees were tortured and ill-treated. In its 1985-86 report, Freedom House upgraded Namibia to "partly free" based on the establishment of a "semblance of home rule and self-determination in 1985."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Namibia's population of 1.1 million (7 percent white, 93 percent black) is growing at the rate of 3.1 percent a year. Per capita gross national product was $1,935 in 1982 but is misleading because Namibia is a blend of two economies: one modern and sophisticated, the other traditional and based on subsistence-level agriculture. Some 60 percent of Namibia's labor force works in agriculture; the vast majority, particularly in the north, is employed in the traditional sector. Whites dominate the modern sector. Some blacks find work in the modern sector but primarily in the lower echelons.

Mining is the single most important economic activity, contributing over a quarter of the gross domestic product. Some mining firms--particularly in the diamond mining industry--have been accused of overmining in anticipation of Namibian independence. Other allegations are that Namibia has lost revenue on diamond exports due to schemes such as secret exchanges of high-quality Namibia diamonds for lower-quality diamonds from South Africa. An independent commission, chaired by Judge P.W. Thirion, conducted an inquiry into alleged maladministration and corruption in government and also examined the mining sector. In November 1985, the commission delivered its report to the cabinet of the interim government. The report will not be published until the cabinet authorizes its release. The fishing industry also faces concerns that its resources are being depleted. There has been large-scale indiscriminate fishing in Namibian waters by foreign fleets, particularly those from the Soviet bloc countries.

Life expectancy at birth is approximately 61.5 years, and the infant mortality rate (1985) is 113 per 1,000 live births. Calorie supply as a percentage of requirements was 99 percent in 1977, the most recent year for which data are available. Literacy figures (1983) are 100 percent for whites and 28 percent for blacks, with primary school attendance 100 percent for whites and 16 percent for blacks.

The South African Government gives Namibia direct budgetary aid of roughly $400,000 a day. In addition, it annually guarantees loans of $72 million to Namibians by third parties. Namibian government officials insist that the territory can become financially self-sufficient upon independence but concede that such an accomplishment will not come easily. The development of a gas field off the southern coast promises revenue and employment potential.

There is no minimum wage in Namibia. The minimum working age is 15. Reliable information about the extent to which occupational health and safety standards are enforced in Namibia is not readily available.

Women encounter considerable difficulties in both traditional and modern settings. Under traditional practice, a woman is usually the ward of her father or, when married, her husband. She is never independent. Women in the modern sector complain of discrimination in employment and in financial affairs. Women's groups have been formed generally under the auspices of the churches. Women are represented in the national assembly, though not in the cabinet. In 1985 the Council of Churches helped establish a women's organization, Namibian Women's Voice (NWV), whose representatives traveled to Nairobi for the U.N. conference marking the end of the U.N. decade for women. In Nairobi, these 18 women joined 18 Namibians in exile and sat together as a united delegation. The NWV has undertaken projects commemorating the role of women in Namibia's history.

SUDAN

Sudan is in transition. An era ended on April 6, 1985, when professional elites and senior military officers combined to overthrow the 16-year government of President Jaafar Nimeiri. The beginning of the end came with the public hanging on January 18 of a 76-year old religious thinker on charges of apostasy. Many Sudanese deemed the hanging an outrageous violation of Sudan's traditional tolerance. In subsequent months, unresolved civil war in the south, arguments over Shari'a law, a worsening economy, revelations about drought and starvation, and finally price increases on staples led to public demonstrations that triggered Nimeiri's fall. Military leaders set up a 15-member Transitional Military Council (TMC) chaired by Lt. General Abdel Rahman Sower el Dahab. In consultation with Sudan's leading political parties, unions, and professional associations, the TMC chose a civilian cabinet headed by Prime Minister Dr. el Gizouli Dafalla. The TMC, however, retains executive power. On October 10, the TMC approved a transitional Constitution providing for decentralization of government and observance of basic human rights, e.g., freedom of speech. Almost 40 political parties, representing all ideological and regional viewpoints, have emerged in anticipation of elections scheduled for April 1986, when the transitional period will end.

Despite the new Government's expressed desire for national reconciliation and unity, it has been unable to end the southern insurgency that resumed in 1983 after Nimeiri breached southern autonomy and imposed Islamic laws (Shari'a). In April, the TMC called on Col. John Garang de Mabior, leader of the Sudan People's Liberation Army/Movement (SPLA/SPLM), to negotiate, but he refused, claiming distrust of the TMC. The SPLM has, however, maintained contacts with the civilian Council of Ministers (CM), southerners, and other Sudanese. In October, Garang declared a cease-fire and hinted at sending a delegation to talk with civilians. In the south, many innocent civilians continue to suffer from the fighting and breakdown in law and order.

Despite vast agricultural potential, Sudan is in economic and social crisis. In 1985, drought-related famine affected nearly one-third of all Sudanese. Poor management, transportation, and communications hampered massive foreign relief. Strong rains started in 1985, but Sudan will suffer the consequences of the prolonged drought for years. Besides this natural disaster, overcentralization of economic policy, reliance on foreign aid for food and fuel, and a foreign debt exceeding $9 billion have contributed to falling living standards. Two promising projects in the south--an oil pipeline and the Jonglei Canal--were stopped indefinitely by the SPLA because southerners saw few benefits in them. Approximately 1.4 million refugees and displaced persons (mostly Ethiopians in eastern Sudan, Ugandans in the south, and Chadians in the west) add to Sudan's burden.

There were positive human rights developments in 1985. Since Nimeiri's overthrow, Sudan's leaders have advocated democracy and moved cautiously toward pluralism. The TMC dismantled the secret police, freed about 1,000 political prisoners, repealed laws banning strikes, and removed press restrictions. However, the Government imposed a state of emergency soon after taking power and banned marches after ethnic clashes in September. The Shari'a laws introduced in 1983 remain on the books and apply to Muslims and non-Muslims alike. Since April 6, five amputation sentences have been sustained by higher courts but none has been carried out. Former government officials currently face charges under the old security regulations that carry such penalties as amputation and posthumous crucifixion. About 264 political prisoners are currently in detention. Most of the detained are soldiers implicated in an alleged antigovernment plot in September. Others, perhaps 50, are former government officials.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The execution of Taha, the 76-year old religious thinker, though preceded by a trial before the standing courts, was widely viewed as a political killing. Although the legal system still functions under the September 1983 laws that condemned Taha, no executions have taken place since January 1985. The charges pending against former associates of President Nimeiri theoretically carry severe sentences, including capital punishment. Those accused have the right of defense and representation by an attorney.

Ethnic violence that may have political overtones persists and has resulted in recent deaths in Khartoum, south Kordofan, and parts of southern Sudan. During September, an estimated seven Sudanese died in demonstrations in Khartoum, organized by the National Islamic Front with participation of TMC members. The riot police acted with restraint; the deaths resulted from clashes between northern and southern Sudanese. In the south, where ethnic rivalries prevail, political killings have also taken place. In August 1985, the SPLA announced that it had killed William Abdulla Chuol, leader of the insurgent Anyanya II forces which last year opted for cooperation with Nimeiri. The SPLA viewed Chuol as a traitor. In the upper Nile region and eastern Bahr al-Ghazal, where government forces control only the garrison towns, killings result more from robbery and cattle rustling associated with traditional ethnic rivalries than from politics. Nevertheless, civilian deaths caused by SPLA penetrations into eastern Equatoria near Lafon, Kabuyta, and Torit and in south Kordofan are politically related. Government and insurgent troops have also traded accusations of human rights violations.

There were no known abductions by Sudanese government agencies, but one German citizen is being held by the guerrillas. The possibility of disappearances from areas outside government control cannot be excluded; Equatorians in particular have accused the SPLA of abducting persons during raids in their region.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Sudan's new Government has committed itself to ending torture by the Government. Some state security officials were tried for the torture of Ba'athist politicians under the former regime. One of the accused was acquitted, but was subsequently rearrested (now released pending new charges). There have been no reported cases of torture since April 6. Amnesty International noted in its 1985 Report that over 65 people had been sentenced to amputation and over 200 to flogging in 1984.

The criminal code introduced as Shari'a legislation in 1983 contains penalties based on Koranic injunctions. Public lashing of both men and women is prescribed for such offenses as drinking/possessing liquor, blasphemy, gambling, illegal possession of commodities, and public disturbance. A fine or imprisonment may supplement the sentence. Newspapers have reported sentences involving both fines and lashings since April 6. Sources suggest that lashing continues but is used less frequently and in a milder form than that applied by the former regime. In any case, no public pronouncements about it have been made, in contrast with the practice of the former government. No sentences with penalties exceeding 25 lashes have been made public; the maximum possible lashing sentence is 100 lashes. The law also mandates right-hand amputation for thefts exceeding $40 and cross-limb (right hand, left foot) amputation for more serious and repeat offenders. Although five amputation sentences have been confirmed by higher courts since April 6, none has been carried out. Persons injured through commission of a criminal act by another may invoke the right of retribution instead of accepting monetary compensation. Since April 6, no case of this type has been reported. Adultery by Muslims and recurrent homosexuality are capital crimes, but the stringent requirements for proof (four male eyewitnesses for adultery) have precluded such severe sentences. The new Government appears not to be prosecuting "moral" crimes with the zeal of the former regime. Indeed, HADD (Islamic) punishments virtually disappeared following the hanging of Taha in January.

Conditions in Sudanese prisons are poor. Food and care meet minimal standards. Because of overcrowding and lax security, prisoners are sometimes shackled. On the other hand, authorities may permit prisoners to go home during the day, requiring them to return only at night. Sudanese authorities also allow relatives to bring food to detainees.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Sudanese Constitution guarantees habeas corpus and requires a court-issued warrant to arrest a citizen. The State Security Act of 1975, however, authorizes arrest without a warrant and preventive detention for renewable 90-day periods on security grounds. At the end of 1985, these practices remained in force, following the recent upholding of the Act by the Supreme Court. The Act's recent incorporation into the penal code extends the harsher penalties of the code to a variety of offenses not considered grave unless linked to security concerns. For example, the Act permits the State to charge individuals accused of economic subversion or corruption with treason.

In the Taha case, the distribution of antigovernment leaflets would have brought a maximum penalty of 5 years imprisonment under the Act, but the charge under the penal code for the same offense, recast as waging war against the Government, carried the death penalty. Former presidential advisor Baha al-Din Muhammed Idris was recently tried by a state security tribunal for "high treason and espionage" on nine charges which arose from various alleged economic deals and which carry a possible death penalty. He was sentenced on charges of corruption to 10 years in prison and a fine of roughly $1.2 million. Likewise, the Government, with prosecution led by the Attorney General himself, charged former Vice President Omar Mohamed el Tayyeb with treason for the transport of Falasha Jews to Israel. The 9 charges against him entailed violations of 18 articles of the penal code. His trial continued into 1986.

Because of the state of emergency in force since April 6, the impact of constitutional guarantees remains questionable. The attorney general, magistrates, or police officials may arrest persons without warrants although all arrests are made public. Under the former government, the President appointed judges. Although the judicial structure remains in place, a panel of qualified persons now selects magistrates. This panel also administers preventive detention. The law still mandates use of tangible property as bail. Financial disputes require bond until settlement. Traffic injury or death cases may require bonds of up to $1,000. Bond may also be required for nonphysical charges such as defamation.

Well-informed and reliable sources estimate the number of political detainees at about 264, most of them interned after the revelation in September of an alleged antigovernment plot involving mainly Nubans and southerners. Among those held initially were university professors and persons formerly alleged to have plotted coups such as Nuban priest Philip Abbas Ghabboush who was later released in January; Ghabboush was previously jailed by Nimeiri between October 1984 and January 1985 when he was amnestied. The other political detainees--former government officials, state security organization personnel, ex-leaders of the Sudanese Socialist Union (formerly the sole political party) and ex-governors--include those under house arrest as well as those in prison. There is no incommunicado detention and no forced labor in Sudan.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The new Government did not rush into a series of quick trials of former government officials. Many of those detained following the revolution were soon released. Lengthy investigations preceded the formulation of charges against those now being tried. Both the Idris and al Tayyeb trials have been televised. Cross-examination of both prosecution and defense witnesses has taken place. During the Idris trial, however, the defense was refused the opportunity of cross-examination of a prosecution witness on at least one occasion. The case is now on appeal. The other four potential defendants in the Tayyeb case have turned state's evidence in exchange for a pardon. The Government will also try former President Nimeiri in absentia.

Theoretically, defendants may choose their own lawyers. In the Baha al Din Idris case, however, the attorney general called on attorneys to refuse to serve as defense counsel. Persons charged with minor crimes often go without counsel; the Government sometimes provides legal aid to those charged with serious crimes if they cannot afford a lawyer. Khartoum university students maintain a legal aid service. A new legal aid society, formed by practicing lawyers, has found office space but has not yet begun to function.

SUDAN

In more common cases, the judicial process involves a police or magistrate investigation, a field report, an arrest warrant, the arrest, and a trial before a panel of three judges. Sudanese now view the judiciary in Sudan as independent because judges feel less subject to arbitrary removal. Some of the judges displaced following the institution of the Sharia system have regained their former positions. Like the country in general, judicial proceedings remain in a state of flux. The Islam-based penal code remains the law of the land under the present Government. With the exception of the fundamentalist National Islamic Front, all major political parties advocate some modification of the former legal system in a way that would moderate application of HADD punishments. The predominantly Muslim groups, however, favor retention of an Islamic-oriented legal system. No persons have been sentenced to imprisonment for political beliefs or acts under the new Government, and none has been sentenced to exile.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The only documented cases of arbitrary interference reported since April involved searches of homes following the revelation of an alleged antigovernment plot in September. Refugees and drought victims constitute the only population movements in Sudan. The Government has periodically moved refugees to new camps, and returned drought victims to their home regions. There is no solid evidence, however, that these people objected to the movements.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although radio and television, as well as some magazines and newspapers, remain under government ownership, Sudan's new leaders vigorously defend the freedoms of speech and the press embodied in the transitional Constitution. In the aftermath of the coup, party newspapers, notably the Ba'ath (al-Hadaf), the Communist (al-Maydan), and the National Islamic Front (al-Rayah) rushed into print. Trade unions and other groups plan to publish papers soon. The press is carefully monitoring Sudan's progress toward democratic rule and will undoubtedly protest if there are delays. Criticism that was formerly heard only in private is now voiced openly and loudly. Academic freedom is not restrained. Shortly after the change in government, however, a number of journalists closely associated with the Nimeiri regime were purged.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Prior to April 6, Sudanese gathered in public to protest acts such as the execution of Taha. Antigovernment demonstrations that preceded the change of government were met with restraint by the authorities. In the aftermath of the coup, freedom of assembly prevailed until the National Islamic Front-inspired "security" march in September resulted in seven deaths. Since that time, public marches have been officially banned, but some have taken place without interference. There is no ban on meetings.

The new transitional Constitution guarantees the right of workers and political parties to organize. In the past, the unionized work force was estimated at 7 percent. Among the Government's first acts was to abolish legislation that prohibited strikes. The primary labor organizations are the Sudanese Workers Trade Union Federation (SWTUF), the Sudanese Federation of Employees Trade Unions (SFETU), and the Trade Unions Alliance (TUA), representing respectively blue collar, nonprofessional white collar, and professional white collar unions. The SWTUF and SFETU existed before the April change of government, but the TUA arose from an alliance of those professional unions that former President Nimeiri had abolished following the doctors' strike of March-April 1984. The TUA has joined with all major political parties (excluding the National Islamic Front) to form the National Alliance for the Salvation of the Country (NASC). Because the civilian Cabinet was drawn from among NASC supporters and was chosen in cooperation with them, the NASC maintains close ties to it. The SWTUF has complained periodically to the attorney general about his interference in trade union law, arrests of trade union leaders connected with the former regime, and support for the NASC which it views as a political rather than a labor organization. The National Islamic Front, excluded from the NASC, joined with others involved in the September "security march" to form a new "security alliance" to rival the NASC. Unlike the NASC, which favors negotiations with the SPLA, the new group tends to advocate a military solution if Col. Garang rejects present government overtures for dialogue. Trade unions from all parts of Sudan are represented in these federations.

The Sudanese labor union movement has a long and distinguished history. Today, the SWTUF participates in both regional and international labor activities. A number of strikes have taken place since the coup in April, and more can be anticipated as trade union workers strive to improve their status. Thus far, the Government has conceded substantial wage and benefit increases in settling or forestalling strike action.

Islam predominates in the northern two-thirds of Sudan, while traditional African religions and Christianity are the major beliefs in the south. Small Christian (Coptic, Greek, Syrian, Armenian) and minuscule Jewish communities in the north exist primarily in Khartoum. Non-Muslim southerners have migrated to northern cities in search of work. The new Constitution retains Islamic law and custom as the main source of legislation, although most southerners oppose it as inherently discriminatory against them. Both Islam and Christianity are recognized as religions of Sudan. However, adherents to other religious beliefs are not restricted.

The Sudanese Government supports mosques and Muslim educational projects; government schools include both Muslim and Christian religious education. Muslims, Christians, and Jews maintain centralized offices in Khartoum for administration and keeping records such as birth certificates. Both Muslim and Christian missionaries are active in Sudan. Christian education, health, and welfare projects operate freely, especially in the south. Christians are free to maintain strong ties with coreligionists outside Sudan. Sudanese of the major religious groups participate in all strata of government, security institutions, and private organizations. Religious groups do not face discrimination under the present Government.

The Umma, Democratic Unionist Party, and National Islamic Front reflect the memberships of the Ansar, Khatmiyya, and conservative Muslims, respectively. Anti-Christian tensions which existed in parts of south Kordofan in 1984 appear to have abated, and no harassment of Christian institutions has occurred recently. That area includes adherents of all major religious groups in Sudan.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The new Sudanese Constitution, like that of 1973, guarantees freedom of movement. Internal movement of both foreigners and Sudanese, however, is sometimes controlled. Diplomatic personnel must notify the Government and obtain permission in advance to travel outside Khartoum although the Government has withheld permission only on rare occasions. Some Sudanese now under investigation have been restricted to their home areas pending the filing of charges.

In order to travel outside Sudan, Sudanese and foreigners alike must obtain exit permits. Sudanese desiring to work outside the country for an extended period require a leave of absence from their employers. An active organization of Sudanese expatriate workers exists and held a conference in 1985 to discuss their mutual interests. Because education in Sudan entails heavy government subsidies, members of certain professions must spend a fixed term of service in Sudan before obtaining permission to work abroad. Exit permits are not available to all Sudanese.

Sudan currently hosts approximately 1.4 million refugees and other displaced persons from Ethiopia, Uganda, and Chad. The Government, in cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and other international bodies, strives to meet their needs. Private voluntary organizations, including American groups, have contributed substantially to improved health and sanitation. Refugees and displaced persons live in reception centers, camps, and settlements. Despite the burdens of hosting these people, Sudan has not impeded or discouraged their movement into Sudan. The Government prefers, however, that they remain in refugee centers rather than move to urban areas. The new Government has tried former Nimeiri officials for permitting Ethiopian Jewish refugees to resettle in Israel. During 1985, about 50,000 Tigreans returned to Ethiopia after the onset of rains, but their departure was more than offset by a new influx of Eritreans. The 120,000 displaced persons along the Chadian border interact with their compatriots on both sides of the frontier. Sudan hosts about 250,000 Ugandan displaced persons; this group remains generally stable. Refugees in Sudan must possess valid refugee documentation or risk detention, especially in Khartoum.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Transitional Military Committee (TMC) currently holds all executive power, subject to consultations with the civilian Council of Ministers (CM). There is no legislative body.

SUDAN

Sudan's leaders have repeatedly expressed their commitment to implement a multiparty constitutional democracy after elections now tentatively scheduled for April 1986. It is uncertain, however, if this timetable will be met. Organizing the election will take special efforts. Lack of government control in large areas of the south precludes the holding of elections in all parts of the country. The fundamental political structure of Sudan is also in question. Some Sudanese favor a federal structure, while others prefer centralized control. In the south, most residents of Upper Nile and Bahr al-Ghazal regions advocate southern unity as embodied in the 1972 Addis Ababa Accords, while most Equatorians want three separate southern regions. The present system--instituted April 6--theoretically reunites the south under a higher executive council but also retains features of decentralization. The only large group which at present refuses to participate in political discussion is the SPLA, but it remains widely heard through proxies, its own Ethiopia-based radio station, and almost daily discussion in the press, including interviews with SPLA officials, of its future role in Sudan.

The present Government has affirmed its commitment to help the south; southerners occupy three ministries in the Council of Ministers, including the Deputy Prime Minister position.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The present Government welcomes human rights investigations by international bodies. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has an office in Sudan while members of other international human rights bodies have made short visits. Both TMC and CM members have spoken frankly with visitors and avoided interfering with their investigations. In August 1985, a Sudanese human rights organization was inaugurated at a meeting attended by 150 members. Academics, lawyers, judges, and students--both men and women--participated in formulating the organization's objectives. The group plans to promote Sudan's adherence to international human rights conventions and to affiliate with the Arab Organization for Human Rights based in Cairo. The new organization is independent of the transitional Government but includes members of the labor group, NASC. International human rights bodies continue to express their opprobrium at the application of HADD punishments in Sudan. Amnesty International, in its 1985 report (covering 1984), was concerned about the Nimeiri Government's incarceration of prisoners of conscience and political prisoners, and the detention without trial of suspected opponents, as well as about allegations of torture. Freedom House rated Sudan "not free" but noted the progress in 1985 in restoring civil liberties since the coup.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sudan's economic and social indicators reveal a significant decline in recent years. In 1985, Sudan's estimated population was nearly 23 million; drought, famine, and disease led to a 0.2 percent negative population growth rate in 1985. The per capita gross national product in 1983 ($400) was 10 percent below the 1982 ($443) level. Despite its development potential, especially in agriculture, the Government's overly aggressive development efforts through much of the 1970's, combined with poor financial management, drought, and insurgency, have created staggering international debt obligations. Development in southern Sudan remains hampered by the insurgency and the lack of government control in many areas. Along with intermittent attempts to cooperate with the International Monetary Fund, Sudan's present rulers continue to press for debt relief and concessionary arrangements for commodity and food supply. At present, the country's financial future is grim.

Facing an infant mortality rate of 113.9 per 1,000 live births, the average Sudanese at birth can expect to live 48.3 years. In 1978, only 45 percent of Sudan's population had access to safe water, although the Government has subsequently promoted water projects to improve health and sanitation. The only available figure for calorie supply as a percentage of requirements (95) dates from 1977; famine afflicted over one-third of Sudan's population during the past year; and only massive international assistance averted widespread starvation. Primary school enrollment figures indicate that 39 percent of females and 55 percent of males, with a combined average of 47.5, attend school. These figures date from 1981 and obscure the educational deterioration in rural Sudan, particularly in the south. Also, many Sudanese teachers have left for better paying jobs in the oil-rich Arab countries.

Sudanese labor law and practice embrace international standards. The workweek is limited to 48 hours, with a full 24-hour rest period. Sudanese labor custom grants an extra month's pay for each year's labor, as well as allowances for transportation and sometimes housing. A new salary scale introduced in August 1985 prescribed a minimum wage of about $15 per month, but particular skills are rewarded with legally mandated supplements. Annual raises must be a minimum of 5 percent of annual salary. The salary scale for industries sets a higher minimum wage (about $16 per month) than that for government workers. Under Sudanese law, the minimum age for workers is 16. All workers, even domestic servants, enjoy paid annual holidays prescribed by law. Sudanese labor law also prescribes health and safety standards, but in a country where the general standards are so low, conditions are poorer than those found in the industrialized West. Many young people in Sudan are self-employed or employed in family enterprises.

While men and women retain traditional roles within Sudanese society, women play an active role in the professions and in higher education. In urban areas, they drive automobiles and work in offices with men. Separate educational facilities for men and women, however, are the rule. Sudanese women dress as they please. In urban parts of the north, they often wear the Sudanese female wrapping over Western clothing. Sudanese women participate in both national and international forums. A recent example was the the women's conference held in 1985 in Nairobi. Their writings and interviews appear in newspapers and periodicals. In the rural milieu, men and women also work side-by-side, although a division of labor does exist. Grandparents and other relatives often care for children, thus facilitating employment outside the home. Female circumcision, though illegal, is widely practiced throughout much of Sudan. Efforts to eradicate it have failed so far, despite significant concern among educated women.

SUDAN

Sudanese, especially those in the periphery, recognize and resent the Government's emphasis on central Sudan and the north, where the Arab population is concentrated. Non-Arab or non-Muslim groups such as the Fur in the west, the Beja in the east, or the Nuba in the Kordofan mountains resist efforts to compromise their unique identities. In the south, a rich mixture of ethno-linguistic clan groups exists. Generally speaking, however, the northern part of Sudan is Muslim and Arabized while the south is non-Arabized African and non-Muslim, with adherents to African religions outnumbering Christians and Muslims.

SWAZILAND

Swaziland is a modified traditional monarchy ruled currently by a queen regent in conjunction with advisers chosen from senior politicians and traditional leaders associated with the Swazi royal family, along with the ministers of the Cabinet. Swaziland's Government features both "modern" and "traditional" branches--a Cabinet, Parliament, and courts which follow Western law, and a tribal system with "national" courts, which follow Swazi law and custom. The Cabinet is appointed by the monarch after informal consultations with traditional advisers and is responsible to her. On the grounds that the 1968 constitution had introduced political practices i.e., parliamentary government, which are incompatible with the traditional Swazi way of reaching decisions by consensus, the late King Sobhuza II decreed its repeal in 1973, which resulted in repeal of the bill of rights as well. Parliament reopened in January 1979 with some members chosen through an indirect selection process, but the King continued to be vested with the country's executive authority. Since the death of King Sobhuza in 1982, there has been a dispute over the relative role and authority of the modern and traditional elements in government. This dispute resulted in the replacement of the prime minister and the eventual replacement of Queen Regent Dzeliwe by Queen Regent Ntombi. During the same period, Ntombi's son, Prince Makhosetive, was officially declared the heir to the Swazi throne and is expected to become King in April 1986 upon completion of certain traditional ceremonies.

Swaziland has an open market economy with limited government intervention, centered on trade, agriculture, and forestry. The modern sector is dominated by large export-oriented firms, which are frequently foreign-owned. The traditional farming sector employs about 80 percent of the population.

Human rights are generally respected in Swaziland, despite the unusual amalgamation of old and new. The authority of the Swazi crown covers a wide spectrum of Swazi life but is limited in practice by a complex system of traditional rights and responsibilities, which requires that attention be paid to unwritten Swazi custom. Swazi custom does not allow public dissent against the Government, and those who publicly criticize the Government or demonstrate against the authorities have, on occasion, been suppressed. The royal Swazi police are widely regarded as being honest, professional, and efficient, but there are occasional reports of violence against suspected criminals. The judiciary is independent. Individuals are free to associate with others, pursue private interests, and hold property, but political activity is discouraged. Women and minorities suffer from little formal discrimination, and representatives of both groups occupy prominent places in Swazi public life, but tradition restricts the opportunities available to most women. With the exception of five former officials who were detained without charges for most of the year and the banning of two South African publications, no controversial human rights questions arose in 1985.

SWAZILAND

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports or allegations of political killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance occurring in the country in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is, as a rule, not practiced in Swaziland. However, there were some reports of police threats and beatings in the handling of common criminals. Defendants often charge that confessions have been extorted by the police, especially in trials dealing with ritual murder. These charges by the defense are sometimes found to be substantiated by the judges.

Corporal punishment is permitted under Swazi law, and caning is occasionally administered to youths involved in petty or violent crimes. Police jails are often overcrowded and unsanitary, with low nutrition standards, which probably reflects the country's economic limitations rather than any intent to inflict punishment. The country's main prison includes facilities for teaching manual trades. Prisoners are allowed visits from family members.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

A 1978 law permits the Government to detain any individual without charge for renewable periods of 60 days. A parallel law, apparently used in routine cases, allows the police to hold an individual for a "reasonable time" without charges. In some cases persons have been detained for up to several weeks. Detention is not subject to appeal to the courts, although it may be appealed directly to the monarch. While some prisoners are held incommunicado, immediate family members are usually allowed to visit detainees. Some attorneys have had difficulties in gaining access to their clients. Five former officials, held incommunicado throughout most of 1985, were released on December 31. They were Col. Ndzimandze, former army commander; former minister of finance Nxumalo; former commissioner of police Msibi; former deputy commissioner of Police Hillary; and Major Abednego Dlamini.

Forced labor does not exist in Swaziland.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is provided for by law and is generally honored in practice. The judiciary consists of a court of appeals, a high court, and various subordinate magistrates' courts. The Head of State appoints members of the court of appeals and the high court. Parallel to this modern government structure is a traditional structure consisting of the Liqoqo (a council which advises the Queen Regent), traditional courts, and 40 regional councils.

SWAZILAND

In magistrates' courts, a defendant is entitled to counsel at his own expense. Court-appointed defense counsel is provided in capital cases. Defendants are made fully aware of the charges against them. Defendants and their lawyers are generally allowed to examine and discuss the evidence on which the charges are based. The courts are independent of executive and military control. Appeals from the magistrates' courts may be heard by the high court, and all final appeals are heard by the court of appeals, which is the highest judicial body. These rights are not guaranteed to persons held under the 1978 detention law or those persons charged with sedition. In traditional courts, where ethnic Swazis may be brought for relatively minor offenses and violations of Swazi traditional laws or customs, legal counsel is not allowed, but defendants are usually heard on their own behalf. Swazi traditional law has not been formally codified. Both offenses and punishments are limited and findings are subject to a review system and appeal to the high court and court of appeals. Accused who desire counsel can insist that their case be transferred from the traditional courts.

Although legislation passed in 1983 would allow sedition cases to be held in camera, no one has yet been tried under that measure.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

Swazi custom places a high value on home and family. In general, Swazi law requires a warrant issued by a magistrate before police may search homes or other premises. However, senior police officers are permitted to search for evidence without a warrant if the suspected crime is of a serious nature, and this exception is frequently used. There is no evidence that the Government censors correspondence or commits other violations of the home.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is limited. The Prime Minister and other officials have repeatedly directed that Swazis critical of the Government express their views only to their chiefs for discussion in traditional Swazi councils. Antigovernment demonstrations or leaflets are regarded as seditious and are treated accordingly. The Swazi radio and television stations are government-controlled. A private company publishes a daily newspaper with English and Siswati editions, and there is also a semigovernmental English-language paper. The Government does not precensor newspapers, but occasionally makes it known that certain stories should not be printed. The media, both government-controlled and private, practice self-censorship, refraining from critical comment on government activities or on problems dealing with the royal family. On several occasions in 1985, journalists were summoned before officials in connection with controversial stories. In one instance, a journalist was interrogated by the police and kept in custody overnight. The Government proscribes publications, including foreign publications, deemed to be prejudicial to the interests of defense, public safety or order, public morality, or public health. For example, in June two major South African publications were banned from Swaziland because of critical articles on Swazi domestic politics.

SWAZILAND

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The King's proclamation of April 12, 1973, prohibits meetings of a political nature and processions or demonstrations in any public place without the consent, sometimes withheld, of the commissioner of police. Except for the prohibition of certain antigovernment activity, however, freedom of association is generally permitted. Trade associations and professional bodies exist in Swaziland and maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields.

In labor matters, employees may and do organize. Under the Industrial Relations Act, unions are required to register with the Government and a number have done so. Unions are independent from government control and are fairly effective as representatives of their members, but since most Swazis are subsistence farmers, unions play a small role in Swazi economic life. Unions play no political role. The union umbrella organization, the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions, participates in the International Labor Organization and is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

Collective bargaining is legal and, while employers have resisted actual collective bargaining, a number have entered into recognition agreements. The Government generally intervenes to reduce the likelihood of a strike, which cannot be legally called until all avenues of negotiation are exhausted. The labor commissioner can then issue a 14-day postponement which can be extended when additional documentation is presented. Where the national interest or welfare is concerned, the Minister of Labor can forbid a strike or can refer the dispute to the industrial court.

Swaziland is traditionally hospitable to all religious beliefs, informally considers itself to be a Christian country, and permits a great variety of missionary activities. Following the death of King Sobhuza in August 1982, some difficulties developed between Jehovah's Witnesses and government officials over such items as the singing of the national anthem in schools. However, the question was brought to the courts and dismissed. In March of 1985, the Heads of the Anglican and Roman Catholic Churches circulated a joint pastoral letter criticizing social injustice, violence, and the use of arbitrary detention in Swaziland. Government officials objected that the churches were getting involved in politics, but the dispute subsided.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Swazis may travel freely within Swaziland and can generally obtain a travel document to travel throughout Southern Africa. Obtaining a passport is more difficult and more time-consuming. Occasionally the Government refuses to issue a passport if the applicant does not appear to have adequate means of support while abroad. Citizenship for nonethnic Swazis can be difficult to establish, creating problems in obtaining passports and other civil documents.

SWAZILAND

Swaziland is a signatory to the U.N. Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees. Swaziland accepts displaced persons from neighboring countries and treats them well. By far the largest number of refugees is from South Africa, primarily ethnic Swazis who fled Zulu administration in the black South African homeland of Kwazulu. In 1985, Swaziland also accepted over 2,000 refugees fleeing from military clashes in Mozambique. Refugees who leave Swaziland on U.N. travel documents are generally not allowed to return.

In 1985, Swaziland police arrested a number of non-Swazi African National Congress activists. They were turned over to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) representative for transfer to neighboring countries (primarily Tanzania) willing to receive them.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

Swaziland is ruled by the King-in-Council. This means that ultimate decisions concerning matters such as political policy, the appointment of ministers, or issuance of decrees are taken by the Queen Regent after obtaining the advice of senior members of the royal family, the senior chiefs, the Cabinet, or Members of Parliament. Such consultation takes place in private, and public debate of political matters under consideration by the Monarch is rare. Legislation is passed by the Parliament and is then submitted to the Monarch for assent--which may be withheld. While political power is not confined to the royal family, it is concentrated there. This system is essentially a version of the traditional Swazi government as modified during the reign of King Sobhuza, II. It provides for extensive consultation and depends on consensus-building. The people are encouraged to bring their views to their local chiefs in private or in meetings held to discuss various topics. The formation of opposition groups is discouraged.

Political parties are outlawed, and an organized political opposition to the Government in the sense of a multiparty system does not exist. Members of Parliament (a 50-member House of Assembly, and a 20-member Senate) are chosen in an intricate manner involving the interactions of 40 regional councils, 80 electors, and the Monarch's appointive powers. The Parliament has served occasionally as a forum for examination and criticism of government policies, but matters are seldom pressed to a vote and, when they are, unanimity is usually the result. One of the ministers is a nonethnic Swazi, as are a number of Members of Parliament. Several women are also Members of Parliament.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

The Government of Swaziland does not normally respond substantively to inquiries from representatives of human rights groups concerning the welfare and whereabouts of individual political detainees. There are no organizations based within the country that observe, report, or contest human rights violations. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International noted its concern about detention without trial of opponents of the Government. Amnesty International regards Douglas Lukhele, Arthur Khoza, Prince Sulumlomo Dlamini, and

Prince Thunduluka Dlamini as prisoners of conscience. Freedom House rated Swaziland "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Swaziland's population in 1985 was estimated to be 671,000 (though it may be higher) and growing by at least 3 percent per year. Given that growth rate, real per capita income has fallen over the past 5 years. Since independence in 1968, however, Swaziland's per capita gross national product (GNP) has risen from about $300 to an estimated $870 in 1983, but subsistence farmers, who comprise two-thirds of the population, have not kept pace. Total per capita income of rural homestead residents for crop year 1983/84 was approximately $375. In 1980, the World Bank estimated that nearly half the population was below the poverty line. The drought in 1982 and 1983 exacerbated the problem.

Since independence, the Government has invested heavily in improving and expanding health care services. Although life expectancy at birth in 1985 was 54.6 years, the infant mortality rate was estimated in 1985 to be 130 per 1,000 live births. There is a lack of clean, disease-free water; estimates in 1985 showed only 37 percent of the country had access to safe water.

The Government faces two interrelated and emerging economic challenges: The inability of traditional agriculture to generate consistent food surpluses or incomes comparable to those in the modern sector, and the decreasing ability to generate sufficient jobs in the modern sector. This is compounded by stagnant government revenues and the Government's own growing inefficiencies.

By far the biggest constraint to truly indigenous development in virtually every area is the shortage of knowledgeable technical and administrative leaders, professionals, and appropriate institutions. The Government is attempting to address this problem through emphasis on education. About 85 percent of primary school-age children are in school. The primary grades also have a substantial number of overage children. Standards have declined because emphasis has been placed on meeting the demand for additional school places, rather than on quality education. Intensive efforts have been made to increase the adult literacy rate. The World Bank estimated it at 45 percent in 1976; 1982 estimates show a 65 percent adult literacy rate.

There is extensive legislation protecting worker health and safety in Swaziland, and child labor receives special attention. The Employment Act of 1980 forbids employers to discriminate among employees based on race, religion, sex, marital status, or political affiliation. It requires equal pay for equal work. There are provisions covering the employment of children, maternity leave, and domestic employees. No one may employ a child below the age of 15 in an industrial profitmaking undertaking, except for cases where only family members are employed in the firm or in the case of technical schools where children are working under the supervision of a teacher or other authorized person. Legislation limits the number of hours which can be worked at night during school days, and in excess of 6 hours per day or 33 hours per week. However, such provisions may be difficult to enforce due to the small size of the enforcement staff.

SWAZILAND

Legally, women are not discriminated against in the job market but, in practice, discrimination occurs frequently. Around three-fourths of all wage-paying jobs are held by men and their average wage rate by skill category is higher than for females.

Traditional values are a major influence on the role of women in Swazi society. Since men are away from their homesteads much of the time, women perform most agricultural tasks and have responsibility for virtually all child rearing and domestic chores. However, they are not given authority to make necessary decisions, to make expenditures to acquire additional capital, or to try innovative agricultural approaches. Women are, in some cases, not legally equal to men, and a married woman is virtually a minor. She is not responsible for contracts she signs, and she cannot own real property or inherit property under normal circumstances. She must obtain her husband's permission to borrow money, to leave the country, and often to take a job. A divorced woman has no right to the custody of her children, although she may have to care for them with no support from their father. A small and growing number of women are beginning to participate in social, economic, and political life outside their traditional fields of teaching, nursing, and clerical work. Women have equal access to schools and constitute around half the student body in nearly all institutions.

TANZANIA

Tanzania was formed in 1964 when mainland Tanganyika united with the newly independent island of Zanzibar. Under the union, Zanzibar retains considerable autonomy. Tanzania is governed by a single political party, the Chama Cha Mapinduzi (CCM). Julius K. Nyerere served as President and party chairman almost continuously since independence in 1961 until November 1985, during which time the country enjoyed a remarkable degree of political stability. In elections held in October 1985, Ali Hassan Mwinyi, who had previously served as Vice President of Tanzania and President of Zanzibar, was elected to replace Nyerere as President while Nyerere retained the party chairmanship. Within Tanzania's one-party system, voters have some choice of contending political candidates for Parliament and local government but not for president or vice-president. The party controls activity at all levels of society. Through its system of 10-family cells, it monitors even the most remote areas of the country.

Tanzania is one of the world's poorest countries and is largely dependent on foreign aid for development. The economy has deteriorated steadily in recent years. Its 21.7 million people have an annual per capita gross national product of approximately $240. Sixty-one percent of the rural population lives below the absolute poverty level. Some economic reforms were initiated in 1984, but little additional progress was made in 1985.

During 1985, the Government took steps to improve its human rights record. It added a Bill of Rights to the Constitution, amended the 1962 Preventive Detention Act to limit abuses, and adopted a new criminal code which grants detainees more rights. These and other trends, including constitutional reforms which require that a majority of members of the Zanzibari and Union parliaments be directly elected by popular vote, indicate that Tanzania is moving toward greater liberalization. Nevertheless, legal rights embedded in the national and Zanzibar Constitutions have not always been observed, particularly freedom of speech. Both on the mainland and in Zanzibar, religion, custom, and rigid tradition, especially in rural areas, often work against the exercise of these rights, particularly with regard to the treatment and equality of women. Freedom of the press is severely restricted. Government policy prohibits the use of torture, but it occasionally occurs. Police officials have been sentenced to stiff terms of imprisonment for torture, abuse, and killing of prisoners.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports in 1985 of politically motivated killings.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reported cases of disappearance in 1985.

TANZANIA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Tanzanian Government opposes the use of torture as a matter of policy. Nonetheless, there have been allegations during the past year that torture has at times been used by police and prison authorities. During the 1985 trial of those arrested in early 1983 for their reputed participation in an attempted coup d'etat, several of them complained of torture during their interrogations by authorities. When beatings of persons arrested by the police occur, they almost invariably take place at the time of apprehension or when the person is first taken to the police station.

Tanzania's prisons are generally unsanitary and overcrowded. Prison conditions are largely a result of Tanzania's economic difficulties and not a deliberate government effort to subject prisoners to inhumane conditions. In 1985, the Government announced that it would take measures to reduce congestion in prisons by changing some of the legal procedures involved in bringing cases to court.

Traditional defense groups in central Tanzania called Sungu Sungu or Wasalama, encouraged by both government and party officials in recent years to help eliminate cattle rustling in some areas, often use extreme tactics and occasionally take on the appearance of vigilante groups. In September 1985, the Tanzania high court sentenced two Sungu Sungu members to death for the murder of two villagers in 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In January 1985, the National Assembly amended the 1962 Preventive Detention Act under which police and security officers could, with a written order from the President, arrest and detain indefinitely any person considered dangerous to the public order or national security. Previously, detainees had no recourse to the judicial system. Under the amended Act, the Government is now required to inform detainees within 15 days of the reasons for their detention. Otherwise, they must be released immediately. In addition, the order must be reviewed by an Advisory Committee within 90 days, and the names of the detainees are to be published in the Government Gazette. Detainees can also challenge the legality of the detention order in the High Court. The amendment also extends applicability of the law to Zanzibar for the first time. Approximately 15-20 people were held under the Preventive Detention Act in 1985, most of whom were accused of participating in a 1983 plot to overthrow the Government.

Approximately 1,000 people were detained in 1984 under presidential decree for alleged violations of the Economic Sabotage Act of 1983, such as hoarding and exchange control violations. However, new legislation adopted in September 1984 placed persons newly accused of economic crimes within the normal judicial process. Persons already charged under the previous law were tried by special tribunals which did not always provide full procedural safeguards.

Tanzanian law requires that a person arrested for crimes, other than security violations under the Preventive Detention Act, must be brought within 24 hours before a magistrate to be charged. Under the new criminal procedure code, enacted in 1985, the accused person is guaranteed bail either by the police or by the court. Also under the new code, the accused has the right to challenge the order for his arrest, his name must be published in the Government Gazette, and his case must be referred to a board of review within three months. If it is not referred within this time, he is entitled to be released. Although the new system has been in effect only a short time, it appears that it is being respected by legal authorities.

The 1983 Human Resources Deployment Act required local governments to ensure that every resident be engaged in productive or other lawful employment. Those persons not so engaged were subject to transfer to another area where they would be required to engage in gainful employment. In 1983 and 1984 there were large scale roundups of unemployed in Dar es Salaam who were then repatriated to their home villages or other areas for agricultural work. The roundups were ended in mid-1984 because they were ineffective, and the Government is no longer compelling individuals to return to the rural areas.

Tanzania's legal system is based on the British model with modifications to accommodate customary and Islamic law in civil cases. Criminal trials are open to the public, and the more sensational trials are covered by the press. Defendants have the right of appeal. While an independent judiciary is constitutionally mandated, some members of the legal community, including judicial officers, have complained that lower level officials of the legal system are highly susceptible to bribery. There has been no evidence that either the Court of Appeals or the High Court are corrupt. Judges are appointed by the Chief Justice, except those for the Court of Appeals and High Court, who are appointed by the President. Military courts do not try civilians, and there are no security courts. Defendants in civil and military courts may appeal decisions to the High Court. The Government offers legal counsel to all defendants charged with treason or murder. In Dar es Salaam, the Tanzania Bar Association and the Legal Aid Society also provide free counsel to indigent defendants.

Under the 1984 Zanzibar Constitution, People's Courts, which did not provide defendants the right of legal representation, were abolished. The court system now parallels the legal system of the United Republic of Tanzania. High Court judges are required to have both a degree in law and several years' practice prior to appointment to the bench. The right to appeal the original judgment is guaranteed within a specified time period. The new Constitution retains Islamic, or Kadhi, courts to deal with marriage, divorce, inheritance, and child care cases involving only Muslims. Cases concerning Zanzibar constitutional issues and Islamic law are justiciable only within Zanzibar's own courts. Beginning in 1985, for the first time, all other cases can be appealed to the Court of Appeals of the United Republic of Tanzania.

In January 1985, the Tanzanian Government began the civil court trial of 19 individuals (14 Army officers and 5 civilians) accused of plotting to overthrow the Government in 1983. Ten were acquitted (four in mid-1985 and six at the end of 1985) while nine were found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment. The nine are expected to appeal their convictions. The trial appears to have been conducted fairly.

TANZANIA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Through the party structure, the Government intervenes in the private lives of its citizens. The Chama Cha Mapinduzi has party cadres covering the smallest units of society. The "10-cell" leader is the party official responsible for monitoring events and resolving problems at the grassroots level. Individual cells vary in size from single family homes to large apartment buildings. Hence, individual 10-cells may contain from ten to several hundred individuals. Ten-cell leaders, who are unpaid, monitor store rationing to ensure "equitable" distribution and report to authorities any suspicious behavior or event within their neighborhood.

The Human Resources Deployment Act of 1983 empowered the Labor Commissioner or his agent to search any house for unemployed persons. Those who were not considered productively employed were not allowed to remain in urban areas. After widespread criticism of human rights violations under the aegis of this Act in 1983 and 1984, it was not actively implemented in 1985, and the instances of forced entry, search, and harassment of persons suspected of economic crimes were significantly fewer than during the previous 2 years.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedoms of speech and press are guaranteed under the Constitution but limited in practice. The mainland Government owns the only English-language daily newspaper, the National Press Agency, and the mainland radio facility. The Zanzibar Government operates a radio and television station. The Swahili-language paper, which has a daily circulation of 100,000, is owned by the party. The official media, as organs of the State, usually present a unified point of view on important policy matters and do not criticize the premises of government domestic or foreign policies.

Tanzanian citizens show few inhibitions about expressing criticisms of the system in private conversations. Visiting foreign reporters have considerable freedom, including access to government and party leaders. Academic freedom of inquiry is officially guaranteed, but in practice, most academicians, relying on the government-run educational system for their livelihood, appear to limit their exploration of sensitive subjects. The importation of foreign books and periodicals is acutely limited by the shortage of foreign exchange.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The nature of the one-party state limits the freedom of public assembly and association. Legal political gatherings may be organized only by the party or its subgroups. Student organizations are party-controlled, and students are inhibited from public criticism by concern that their future employment prospects may be jeopardized. A number of professional associations exist, including legal and medical associations, but they are careful to concentrate on nonpolitical topics.

There is one labor union, Juwata, which is an organ of the party. No other unions may operate. All business and government offices with more than a few employees are required to have a Juwata chapter. Juwata represents about 60 per cent of the workers in the modern, industrial, and government sectors. At the local level, it is charged with promoting employee welfare. As the workers' representative, Juwata can file grievances against employers. Those cases which cannot be settled at the workplace are referred to the Permanent Labour Tribunal, whose decisions are final. While strikes are not prohibited by law, they do not take place because the decisions of the Labour Tribunal are binding. The Government sets wages and Juwata, as an organ of the party, acts as an adviser to the Government on wages but does not engage in collective bargaining on behalf of the workers.

Juwata maintains relations with the International Labor Organization (ILO), and the Government has ratified most ILO conventions. During recent years the ILO was concerned about convict labor in prisons and several laws requiring work by adults in communal agriculture and development projects. However, the Government no longer enforces these laws, and ILO concern has lessened.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Missionaries are allowed to enter the country freely to proselytize, and Tanzanians are allowed to go abroad for religious purposes. There is one monthly Catholic newspaper, with a circulation of approximately 120,000, which covers mainly religious news.

The population of the mainland is roughly 50 percent Christian, 40 percent Muslim, and 10 percent animist. There appear to be no social or political advantages or disadvantages attached to membership in any given faith on the mainland. While there has been a degree of controversy in overwhelmingly Muslim Zanzibar regarding state support of certain mosques, Zanzibaris are generally free to practice any faith they choose without interference.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Apart from the Zanzibari requirement for travel documentation between Zanzibar and the mainland, the Government generally does not restrict travel within the country. Tanzania continues to require its citizens to follow national employment directives stipulating the nature of employment and where they reside. For years, city dwellers have been the subject of police checks for proof of employment. Those without proper documentation have, in some cases, been forced to return to the rural areas in an effort to control increasing pressure on urban resources and to reverse declining levels in agricultural production. The Human Resources Deployment Act of 1983 requires local government to ensure that every resident within its area of jurisdiction engages in productive or other lawful employment. Those persons who are not so engaged are subject to transfer to another area. Implementation of the Human Resources Deployment Act was suspended in 1985 while municipal authorities, under whose jurisdiction the Act now falls, searched for ways of enforcing it without the abuses which occurred in 1983 and 1984.

TANZANIA

In 1985, an incident was reported of villagers from one region of Tanzania being forced by the regional government to settle in another because of population pressures. The Government prohibits people from shifting their villages to other places without its permission, and peasants have been prosecuted for doing so.

There are no restrictions on repatriation. The Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act empowers the courts to try Tanzanians who commit offenses outside the country. Passports are required for foreign travel and can be difficult to obtain. Tax clearances and approval from the Central Bank are also required to buy airline tickets. In practice, those planning to emigrate are subject to intense scrutiny by police and tax authorities. Those who leave the country without authorization are subject to prosecution. Although it is legally possible for citizenship to be revoked, there have been no reports during the last several years that this has been done.

Tanzania has a liberal policy towards refugees and displaced persons. There are approximately 180,000 refugees and displaced persons in Tanzania of whom 80 percent are from Burundi, with the rest mainly from Uganda and Zaire. However, Tanzania's acceptance of refugees and displaced persons is largely limited to persons from contiguous countries. Refugees from other countries are required to find resettlement elsewhere. South Africans who enter Tanzania as members of liberation groups are in a special category and are allowed to remain in the country. However, those who leave the liberation groups are refused work and residence permits. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) is actively engaged in resettling over 70 former members of such groups.

Three thousand Banyarwanda refugees from Uganda, who were threatened with expulsion from Tanzania in 1984 and later placed in a camp, were finally given a locale within Tanzania in 1985 in which to settle. The UNHCR is assisting the Government to prepare the resettlement area for the refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political activity is forbidden except within the party. While he relinquished the presidency in 1985, chairman Julius Nyerere continues to direct the party structure and bureaucracy, which are the dominant forces in the country. President Ali Hassan Mwinyi, formerly President of Zanzibar and Vice President of Tanzania, remains party vice chairman. Mwinyi ran unopposed in national elections on October 27. He is a strong supporter of Zanzibar's union with the mainland. There are no overt opposition groups, although the alleged coup plot discovered in January 1984, and the publicity associated with the trial of the plotters, suggested at least some internal opposition to the regime. Some Tanzanian nationals living abroad, who consider themselves political exiles, advocate a change of government.

In addition to the smooth transition in the presidency, voters on October 27 chose 169 elected members of the 244-seat Parliament. Under the new Constitution, which went into effect in 1985, the proportion of representatives chosen by popular vote in those elections increased from approximately 50 to 75 percent. The remaining 25 percent is composed of members appointed by the Government and the various "mass organizations" associated with the party. All candidates for Parliament must be party members. The national executive committee of the party chooses at least two candidates from a list provided by each constituency to compete in the general election. Within this one-party system voters have registered dissatisfaction by sending incumbent members of Parliament to defeat. This happened again in the 1985 elections. In past years, there were reports of election fixing and intimidation of village leaders both on the mainland and on Zanzibar. This year, 23 petitions were filed, primarily by individual voters, challenging the results of the elections on both the mainland and Zanzibar. The petitions alleged a variety of voting irregularities. Party membership and, hence, active participation in the political process, is not open to anyone engaged in private business, which traditionally consists largely of Asians, but is slowly being joined by more and more Africans.

Zanzibar has its own House of Representatives. In 1985, for the first time, the majority of Zanzibar's representatives were elected directly, albeit within the one-party structure. This is a sharp break from the past in which all but 10 of the members were elected through district and regional "revolutionary committees" or directly or indirectly appointed by the Zanzibar President. Under the terms of the new Constitution, the House of Representatives consists of 50 directly elected members, 10 members nominated by the President of Zanzibar, 5 regional commissioners, 5 seats reserved for women, and 1 representative from each of the party's 5 mass organizations.

Women have been encouraged to take an active role in politics. Using its powers of direct appointment, the Government has ensured that about 20 percent of the membership of village councils is female. In late 1985, there were 2 women cabinet ministers, 1 woman on the 18-member central committee of the party, and 13 women on the national executive committee. Under the new 1984 Union and Zanzibar Constitutions, 15 seats are reserved for women in the 244-member National Assembly and 5 seats in the 75-member Zanzibari House of Representatives. This reform was instituted in recognition of the traditional obstacles women face in popular elections for constituency seats in Parliament.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Tanzania is a party to U.N. covenants on human rights and in 1984 ratified the Organization of African Unity Charter on Human and People's Rights, 1 of only 13 African states to do so thus far. In its 1985 report (covering 1984), Amnesty International was concerned about the short-term detention without trial of two prisoners of conscience and about allegations of torture and ill-treatment of prisoners. However, most of the report commented on Tanzania's efforts to improve its human rights practices. In the past, the Government has shown serious concern about international opinion regarding its human rights situation. The Government hosted a regional Amnesty International Conference in late 1984, which was opened by the Prime Minister. In contrast to 1983, there have been no outside investigations of human rights violations in Tanzania for the 1984-85 period. Freedom House rates Tanzania "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Tanzania has a population of 21.7 million people (600,000 on Zanzibar), growing at a high rate of 3.2 percent per year. Per capita gross national product in 1983 was $240, a 9 percent decline from 1982. Government pricing policies, traditionally designed to keep consumer prices low for urban dwellers, and a consistent pattern of late payments to producers and shortages of necessary items, such as fertilizers, have contributed to a decrease in the growth of export (cash) crops. Many farmers have increasingly reverted to food crop agriculture. Producer price increases, consumer price hikes, and more systematic payment to producers by state-owned enterprises represent government efforts to reverse this trend.

Industrial production continues to decline because there is a drastic shortage of foreign exchange which is needed to purchase raw materials and spare parts. The economy has suffered further in recent years from worldwide inflation, high energy costs, and continued low prices for export crops.

The Government continued efforts to expand health and education facilities. Since independence in 1969, life expectancy at birth has risen from 42 to 53 years. Infant mortality remains high, 110 in 1,000 live births (1980), largely as a result of malnutrition and the resulting lack of resistance to diseases. More than 42 percent of the population had access to clean water in 1982, up from 29 percent in 1975.

Since the institution of free and compulsory education for all in 1977, the vast majority of children of primary school age have been enrolled. There is a growing public demand for more emphasis on basic education and a growing concern over the severely restricted number of places in secondary schools and universities. Adult education is available and encouraged. According to World Bank and United Nations Education, Scientific, and Cultural Organization statistics, Tanzania has one of the highest adult literacy rates in Africa. In practice, tradition and social attitudes have seriously limited the participation of women beyond the primary school level.

Workers in Tanzania perform a 40-hour, 6-day workweek. Section 77 of the employment ordinance prohibits children under the age of 15 from working. This provision applies to the formal wage sector in both urban and rural areas only and not to children working on family farms or herding domestic livestock. A young person between the ages of 15 and 18 may be employed provided the work is "safe and not injurious to health." There is no legal discrimination in wages on the basis of sex, but in practice discrimination occurs. In general, women cannot be employed between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m., and young people are not allowed to work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. Several laws regulate safety in the workplace, including the Factories Ordinance, the Accidental and Occupational Diseases Notification Ordinance, and the Workman's Compensation Ordinance. The ILO is assisting Juwata with a 2-year project, scheduled for completion this year, on occupational safety. Employers in Tanzania are required to have insurance.

TANZANIA

For most of Tanzania's ethnic groups, women's traditional role has been that of mother and field laborer, and women are still underrepresented in government, the professions, and in skilled occupations. Social limitations on the roles women play are generally more pervasive on Zanzibar than on the mainland. Women in many parts of the country continue to suffer discriminatory restrictions on inheritance and ownership of property because of concessions to custom and Islamic law. These laws dictate in many areas that daughters receive smaller shares of their father's property than do sons. Although the practice is declining, female circumcision is still performed by a minority within approximately 20 of the country's 120 mainland ethnic groups. Despite the obstacles, the Government has made progress in its efforts to ensure equality for women, especially in urban areas where traditional values have a weaker hold on the population. The Union of Tanzanian Women, a wing of the party, is dedicated to the eradication of inequality for women in all spheres of society.

The Asian community, estimated at about 40,000, is both culturally and economically exclusive, a business-oriented minority in a society committed to "socialist" policies. Official government policy is one of equal rights for all citizens, and Asian entrepreneurs are being encouraged to invest in areas previously reserved for the public sector, including large-scale agriculture. In 1985, the Asian community did not face the harassments experienced in 1983 and 1984.

TOGO

The Government of Togo is authoritarian, and power is firmly centralized in the hands of President General Gnassingbe Eyadema. Eyadema is also head of the armed forces and of the only legal political party, the Rassemblement Du Peuple Togolais. The Eyadema Government has been in power since 1967. Its legal authority is based on a written Constitution adopted by national referendum in 1979. Only party members are permitted to participate in the political process. As head of the party, President Eyadema dominates the executive, legislative, and judicial functions of government. The Government's control of the elements of coercion, including the military, the Gendarmerie, and civil police (Surete), and the wide recognition that it is willing to use them, are important factors in maintaining its authority.

Togo's economy is heavily oriented toward subsistence agriculture, with most Togolese participating only marginally in the modern (cash) sector. Coffee and cocoa are the only significant crop exports. Togo exploits and exports one mineral product, phosphate. World prices for these three exports have been well below normal recently, and Togo has had to institute an austerity program, with attendant hardship on the population. Togo also has a small but flourishing commercial sector and encourages private enterprise, much of which is carried out by women.

The human rights situation in Togo changed little in 1985. Following a series of bomb explosions in August, about 20 people were arrested on suspicion of antigovernment activities, and most are still being held. There were about 40 persons being held without charge in late 1985 on general political grounds. There were also cases of death of several persons from unresolved causes while under government surveillance/custody.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The death of Colonel Koffi Kongo on March 29 while he was under government surveillance led to some speculation that he had been killed by security personnel. An Amnesty International team visited Lome 10 days later and met with the President, other government officials, and Kongo's family, including his French wife. All concerned--including the attending military physician--said that Kongo had died of a heart attack. Although President Eyadema had agreed to an autopsy, the family members refused to permit a postmortem examination. The causes of his death thus remain unverified.

During August, there was a series of three separate weekend bomb explosions in Lome. The primary purpose appears to have been to embarrass the Government. When a bomb went off at the national insurance office August 24, an employee who was working late was killed by the blast. Those responsible have not as yet been identified nor has anyone claimed responsibility for the blasts. In addition, the Government informed Amnesty International representatives who visited Lome in October that one of those who was arrested on suspicion of antigovernment activity died of hypertension and heart trouble while under detention. Amnesty International said that they had received reports that he died following electrical torture. As no judicial inquiry was held following his death, it too will likely continue to be surrounded by uncertainty as to the actual cause.

b. Disappearance

In 1985, there were no reports of disappearance in Togo.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

While the President has enjoined Togolese authorities to refrain from torturing prisoners, there is no specific Togolese law prohibiting torture. Some released prisoners and trial defendants have claimed to have been beaten or tortured and have alleged that their statements to the police were obtained either by threat or application of physical coercion. There were several such reports in 1985, particularly after the September arrests. Following the visit by Amnesty International in October, Amnesty representatives said that they had seen 14 of the prisoners, and they all had the general look of having been "badly treated." It appears to be the general belief of the populace that torture is practiced, particularly by the military and the Gendarmerie. Prison facilities are overcrowded and rudimentary with limited space, light, sanitation facilities, and ventilation. Food and medical care are reported to be barely adequate by local standards. Families are allowed to visit prisoners and to provide food. Only military and paramilitary personnel are granted access to Togo's four military prisons. Past reports have cited prisoner beatings and hard labor on state-owned farms.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Togolese legal system does not include the right of habeas corpus, nor does this right exist in practice. Prisoners accused of crimes unrelated to political security are usually held for no longer than 48 hours prior to indictment or provisional release pending investigation, but nothing prevents authorities from holding a person beyond that time without charge. Arbitrary arrest and detention occur in Togo, although such cases are generally confined to those the Government considers guilty of "crimes against the public trust" (e.g., corruption or threat to national security, including political opposition). There is no functioning bail system. Those held in administrative or preventive detention are usually not formally charged and cannot obtain redress through the courts. They may be detained as long as the Government deems necessary for the investigation. As many as 20 people were placed under administrative detention in September for antigovernment activities (i.e., possession and/or distribution of antigovernment tracts or painting antigovernment slogans on walls). They were subsequently fired from their jobs. Administrative sanctions against officials have also included assignments to residences in their home villages, where they are required to report weekly to the regional Gendarmerie office.

Reports indicate the national Gendarmerie has exercised almost unlimited power in arresting and detaining persons in Togo.

TOGO

Present practice allows any permanent officer of the Gendarmerie to arrest and detain persons without seeking prior permission or submitting a subsequent report. President Eyadema is believed to follow such cases closely. The number of detainees held by the Gendarmerie in its Lome prison, outside the structures of local judicial process, has been reported to be as high as 50. Persons detained by the military are processed through the military judicial system. There is no forced labor in Togo outside the prison system.

Traditional courts at the village level handle a large number of civil and even criminal cases, with evidence generally being presented by both sides before the village chief or a council of elders who then make a decision. Those who do not accept a traditional court's ruling may take cases to the more formal legal system existing in the cities. Formal pretrial proceedings are sometimes protracted. A crowded court docket and shortage of judges make speedy trials unlikely. Defendants accused of nonpolitical crimes are generally accorded the right to a public trial and the right to be represented by counsel. When the defendant cannot afford the cost of an attorney, counsel is appointed by the Government. A defense attorney is permitted to talk with the defendant privately. Defendants and counsel are formally notified of charges in writing. Special courts handle security, embezzlement of public funds, and violent crimes and observe the same standards of justice as regular courts. Togo's judicial system is not independent of the executive branch and is open to political interference in those trial cases deemed important to the Government.

In July 1985, President Eyadema announced the release of what the Government claims to be the last three political prisoners it was holding. The three, Kodjobi de Souza, Kaou Sanvi, and Kouassi Lanyo Sanvi de Tove, were convicted in 1979 for their part in the abortive 1977 coup. Opposition sources outside Togo have claimed that there are up to 200 political prisoners in Togo but are unable to produce specific names. Nearly all of the approximately 50 detainees mentioned in Section 1d were arrested because they were judged to be threats to internal security and thus could be considered political prisoners. The number of political exiles is unknown.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

It is generally thought that there is monitoring of correspondence and telephones and that there are extensive networks of informants in all important sectors of Togolese society in order to check on dissident activity. Searches of private residences in both civil and criminal cases are normally authorized by a judge or senior police official. In matters judged by the Government to involve national security, searches without formal authorization are permitted.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no legal restraint to freedom of speech in Togo. It is exercised fully except on political matters. On all matters concerning the President or Government, citizens feel constrained and are careful to avoid criticism. A free press does not exist in Togo. The Government owns and operates the media, which it regards as a vehicle for mobilizing popular support for its policies. It does not permit publication or circulation of material criticizing its policies or officials and considers any such activity a serious offense. From time-to-time, the media will report that some cabinet ministers and mid-level government functionaries have been accused of corruption and/or ineffective implementation of programs. Foreign publications normally freely circulate and foreign radio broadcasts are not jammed. In early April 1985, following the death of Colonel Kongo, one issue of the magazine Jeune Afrique was not allowed into Togo. Academic freedom is practiced only in nonpolitical fields.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is strictly controlled. Prior government approval must be obtained before large groups may assemble. Approval for such gatherings involves a political question and is granted at the discretion of the Government. This effectively precludes antigovernment political meetings. Permission for other types of meetings is not difficult to obtain. Professional groups are enjoined to avoid political activities.

The single national trade union federation, La Confederation Nationale des Travailleurs du Togo (CNTT), is controlled by the national political party. Organization of workers is permitted only under its banner. The federation conveys the Government's views and requirements to workers and, on certain economic issues, represents workers' concerns to the Government. The right to organize is guaranteed under the Togolese labor code and all major sectors of the Togolese work force are unionized. Workers also have the right to strike, but only after every remedy to arbitrate the dispute has been thoroughly exhausted. When disputing parties deadlock, the Government involves itself as arbitrator and through this informal mechanism, most strikes are averted. Strikes, however, have occurred only rarely in the past. In each instance, the Government continued to dialogue with striking workers and the strikes ended shortly thereafter without physical coercion or arrests of striking union members.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion generally prevails in Togo, although the Jehovah's Witnesses were banned by a government decree in 1979. This one religious faith is not recognized by the Government as a religious group having the right to conduct services, proselytize, or otherwise carry out religious activities. There are, however, no known legal penalties for being a Jehovah's Witness. No specific religion is favored by the Government. There is no requirement for religious groups to be licensed by the Government. With the exception of Jehovah's Witnesses, the open practice and teaching of religion is permitted. There is no restriction on publishing strictly religious material. Foreign clergy are allowed to proselytize. Local religious groups are permitted contact with similar organizations in other countries. No restrictions exist on religious travel. Religious affiliation is neither an impediment nor an advantage with regard to advancement in Togo and is compatible with membership in Togo's only political party.

TOGO

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Free movement, including domestic and foreign travel, emigration, and the right to change residence or workplace, is allowed for Togolese and foreigners. Domestic travelers may encounter security or customs-related official roadblocks. Passport issuance is restricted by the Government in order to control the number of professional Togolese who emigrate and also to keep known political dissidents under close scrutiny. Exit visas are also required. Except for the few political exiles, Togolese who have chosen to reside in other countries may return at will. Togo has traditionally welcomed refugees, as well as displaced persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Eyadema holds a monopoly of power in Togo and has maintained it since 1967. Togo is a one-party state. There are, however, institutions permitting some participation in decisionmaking where the President is not directly involved. All citizens are considered to be members of the party, and active party members may express their views at party meetings on issues such as the implementation of policy and the behavior of subordinate officials. No challenges are allowed, however, to the President's political program and the central committee's decisions. During the last election in December 1979, President Eyadema was the only candidate and was elected for a seven-year term with 99.7 percent of the votes. Togo has a 77-member National Assembly which debates certain categories of proposed legislation as defined by the Constitution but has no real power to reject laws proposed by the executive. The National Assembly can and does require ministers to justify their budgets, and it gives sanction to policy decisions. The National Assembly elections of March 24 permitted party members, for the first time, to be elected from local groups. Previously, all Assembly members represented a national constituency and one list of candidates was selected by the Government. Within the one party there were 216 candidates for 77 seats and there were a number of spirited contests. The Government's control of the local media insured that campaign rhetoric did not take an antigovernment tone. All regional ethnic groups and both sexes are represented within the single party. Currently, 4 women serve on the 26-member central committee of the party, and 3 women are National Assembly delegates.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Togo has been active in human rights forums. Togo was a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva from 1982-84. Following the abortive July 4, 1985, coup in Guinea, President Eyadema joined with the President of the Ivory Coast in appealing to the Guinean President for leniency for the coup plotters, when there were pressures for their immediate execution.

The Government of Togo has also in the past cooperated with international organizations such as Amnesty International, in investigating charges of human rights violations. As mentioned above, Amnesty International teams visited in both

April and October. A lesser degree of cooperation was exhibited on December 31, however, when a three-person Amnesty International team arrived at the Lome airport and was denied entry. There are no human rights organizations based within Togo that report on or observe human rights violations. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the use of politically motivated detention without trial and about reports of torture and ill-treatment and harsh prison conditions. Freedom House rates Togo as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Togo is listed among the U.N. General Assembly's least developed countries. Its population of 3,023,000 (1985) is growing at the high rate of 3.1 percent annually, in a relatively resource-poor land mass of only 56,000 square kilometers. Per capita gross national product was $280 in 1983. Revenues from its major exports, phosphates, cocoa, and coffee, have been much lower than historic levels. In the late 1970's, Togo made major investments in industrial projects and tourist infrastructure, many of which proved to be unprofitable. As a result, the Government found itself in economic straits and had to institute major reforms with World Bank and International Monetary Fund cooperation. Over the past 5 years, the primary focus of governmental development policies has been on increasing agricultural production. Togo is virtually self-sufficient in food in normal climatic conditions.

Inadequate government resources have limited efforts to improve health and sanitation levels in Togo, although Ministries for Public Health, Social Affairs, and Education typically receive large shares of the regular national budget (40 percent of the 1983 budget). Life expectancy at birth is 49 years, and the infant mortality rate is 107 (1985) per 1,000 live births. On a nationwide basis, there is only 1 doctor for every 18,100 people (1980) and 1 nurse for every 1,430 people (1980), although the Government operates 21 hospitals and nearly 300 dispensaries or clinics throughout the country's 21 prefectures. About 42 percent of the population (1980) has access to safe water; in urban areas, the figure rises to around 70 percent, while dropping to 31 percent for rural areas. About 42 percent of the urban population is estimated to be living below the absolute poverty level (1978).

Education has also been a major focus of government policy. School attendance is theoretically compulsory until age 15. The adult literacy rate was cited by the World Bank as 16 percent in 1970, 27 percent for males and 7 percent for females. Since many children beyond normal primary school age (6-11) are still enrolled in primary schools, the overall primary school enrollment ratio is 105 percent (1982). For males, this ratio is 131 percent and for females 80 (1982).

Labor practices in Togo are set by the Togolese Labor Code adopted in 1974, which is generally respected in practice. The Code specifically stipulates that there should be equal pay for equal work, qualifications, and production for both sexes; working hours of all employees in any enterprise, except for agricultural enterprises, should not normally exceed 40 hours per week; the employment of children under 14 in any enterprise is prohibited; at least one period of 24 hours of rest per week is compulsory; and workers earn 30 days of paid leave each year. Enterprises must run a regular medical service for its employees. Health and safety standards in the workplace are determined by a technical consulting committee at the Ministry of Labor and instituted by decrees. There are penalties for employers who do not meet the conditions of the decree.

The economic and social rights of Togolese women are spelled out in the Family and Individual Code which was adopted in early 1980. Under this Code, women's rights include maternity leave benefits. Women dominate local market activities and commerce with Togo's neighbors and often amass considerable wealth. Formal equality under the law and success in the local marketplace do not mean total equality for all women throughout Togo. Civil law, for example, recognizes a woman's property rights, but customary or traditional law gives all property to the male in the event of separation or divorce. Economic conditions in rural areas also often leave women little time for anything other than carrying water, finding firewood, cooking, caring for the family, and helping to raise food crops. The Government has undertaken a campaign to make women throughout the Togo aware of their expanded opportunities under the new family Code.

UGANDA

Elements of the Ugandan National Liberation Army (UNLA), led by senior military officers primarily from the Acholi ethnic group, overthrew the government of President A. Milton Obote on July 27, 1985. An Interim Military Government (IMG) headed by a Military Council was installed with General Tito Okello Lutwa, formerly Chief of the Defense Forces, as Head of State and Military Council chairman. Immediately after assuming power, the Military Council began appointing a broad-based civilian cabinet, comprising all major ethnic groups as well as representatives of the four political parties which had contested the disputed 1980 election. The Council subsequently included members of four insurgent groups, but not Yoweri Museveni's National Resistance Army/Movement (NRA/NRM), which is dominated by Bantus, in particular the Banyankole. Museveni's NRM/NRA forces continued hostilities against the interim Government but also agreed to enter into peace talks with the IMG in Nairobi under the chairmanship of Kenyan President Daniel Arap Moi. The talks culminated in a peace accord signed on December 17, in Nairobi between Okello and Museveni, who agreed to join the Government as vice chairman of the Military Council. By early 1986, the terms of the Accord had not been implemented, and further fighting took place. As of late January, the NRA appeared to have taken control of the capital.

When Idi Amin fled Uganda in 1979, he left behind a devastated economy. Uganda has great agricultural potential with its fertile soil and regular rainfall and also has substantial mineral deposits. But the economy has continued to decline under the impact of civil war and social upheaval entailing the dislocation of thousands of people. The Obote government, with the assistance of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), introduced ambitious economic reform measures in 1981, with some initial success, but abandoned the IMF program in 1983 due to the deteriorating security situation. Since then, the inflation rate has soared from 25 to 30 percent a year in 1983 to an estimated 175 percent in 1985. The new Government's economic program had not crystallized by the end of 1985 as first priority was given to ending the civil war.

Human rights issues have played a major role in Uganda's turbulent 23-year postindependence history. The depredations of the Amin years are well-known and well documented. Chaos and widespread human rights violations continued during the 1979-80 interim governments. After initial promise, the 1980-85 Obote government was widely discredited by the time it fell because of its unwillingness, or inability, to halt or prevent large-scale violations of human rights, particularly perpetrated by ill-disciplined soldiers during military operations against the NRA, as well as unrestrained activities of civilian intelligence, security, and ruling-party agents. Various guerrilla groups bent on the violent overthrow of the Obote government also contributed to human rights violations through the use of both indiscriminate and selective terrorism. A special Amnesty International Report released in June 1985, indicated that the government security forces had been involved in mass detentions, routine torture, widespread abductions, and frequent killings of prisoners.

Following the coup respect for rule of law improved temporarily, e.g., most political detainees were released in the first 2 weeks. But members of the UNLA, augmented by the four other ill-disciplined fighting forces (not including NRA), and untrained new recruits, were soon implicated in rape and indiscriminate killing of civilians as well as looting of civilian and government properties. The worst, documented human rights violations took place in September-October in the Luwero triangle, a region north and northwest of the capital Kampala, which has been the principal area of government-insurgent conflict since 1981. While the IMG undertook a concerted public effort to punish offenders, its ability to control its soldiers and allied fighting forces still remained in doubt at the end of 1985. Underlying the civil strife is a profound tension among the three main ethnic groups: Bantu, Nilotic, and Nilo-Hamitic.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

While it often was difficult to distinguish between victims of war and of political murder, there continued to be clear evidence of extralegal killings in Uganda in 1985, both before and after the July coup. Most of the killings were of villagers who died during and after military engagements between the government forces and the National Resistance Army (NRA) and other fighting forces. During 1985, the NRA, which had hitherto been based in the Luwero triangle, made a series of attacks to the west, culminating in a splitting of the NRA into two forces, one remaining in the triangle and the other in the foothills of the Ruwenzori mountains of western Uganda. As the NRA moved through territory, the Uganda Liberation Army (UNLA) would typically follow and loot the town, sometimes killing suspected NRA sympathizers.

A number of killings were reported to have been committed by members of the youth wing of Obote's ruling party, the Uganda People Congress (UPC). In March and April 1985, armed youth reportedly entered villages where weddings were taking place and, using grenades and automatic weapons, killed a number of the celebrants. At least two incidents of this nature took place in each of which a minimum of 10 people were killed and over 30 wounded.

There were also credible reports of a number of killings at military detention centers, military barracks, and civilian detention centers carried out by civilian security agents responsible directly to the Minister of State in the office of the President. In one incident in May, villagers identified a UNLA military truck which dropped off a load of more than a dozen mutilated bodies near Kampala. Reliable sources said the bodies had come from Makyndye Barracks in Kampala, where many extralegal detentions were known to occur.

After the July 27 coup, further evidence of political killings during the Obote regime came to light. Among the most publicized were two mass burials of anonymous victims in the Luwero triangle. Conducted by senior IMG officials and participated in by ordinary citizens, the ceremonies involved the internment of hundreds of persons. Responsibility for the killings could not be definitely established, although general opinion was that they had been committed by agents of the Obote government.

UGANDA

Beginning in September there were new reports of killings, principally in the Luwero triangle area. The pattern was one of indiscriminate killing of civilians by soldiers of the UNLA as augmented by other fighting groups, principally the Uganda National Rescue Front (UNRF) and the Former Ugandan National Army (FUNA).

On October 5, members of the IMG, including Minister of Internal Affairs and leader of the Democratic Party (DP) Paul Ssemogerere and Major General Issac Lumago, leader of FUNA, toured the capital of Luwero district which had recently been the scene of a UNLA/NRA confrontation. The team found evidence of indiscriminate killing by members of the government forces, but no disciplinary action was taken.

Not all extralegal killings in Uganda during 1985 can be attributed to government forces. In the wake of the change of government, a number of local party officials and government appointees of the UPC were murdered, presumably out of revenge by citizens enraged at what was perceived to be an arrogance and abuse of power during the Obote era by these officials. There have also been reports that the principal dissident group, the NRA, has executed civilians whom it suspected of being government informers. There was one credible report that in 1984 NRA exterminated the population of a village in the Luwero triangle in retribution for a villager's betrayal of the whereabouts of an NRA detachment.

Reports of disappearance through abduction in 1985 were common and probably reached into the hundreds of cases. However, the number of disappearances dropped off significantly after the fall of the Obote government. The reasons for disappearances range from political thuggery to ransom, which was possibly the most common motive. Since the coup, each of the fighting groups, including government forces as well as those allied with the Government and the NRA, has been accused of responsibility for disappearances.

The most notable disappearance that occurred during 1985 was that of Sebastian Ssebugwawo, a member of Parliament for the opposition Democratic Party. Ssebugwawo disappeared in late May 1985 after an altercation with a military officer. It is presumed that Ssebugwawo was killed, but his body was never recovered, and the Obote government's investigation was inconclusive. Members of Ssebugwawo's party accused the Obote government of conducting an investigation that was at best pro forma. The postcoup government has arrested two members of the military, a captain and a sergeant, who were allegedly involved in the abduction and presumed murder of Ssebugwawo.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman treatment are not sanctioned by Ugandan law, but for many years there have been credible reports of extreme forms of torture taking place at detention centers, particularly military barracks, where political prisoners were often held illegally. The situation was extensively documented in Amnesty International's June 1985 special report on the state of human rights in Uganda in which Amnesty asserted that it had "received a detailed account from someone who claims to have been tortured in a military barracks as recently as February 1985." A favored method of torture, often resulting in death, was to tie a victim down, sometimes in the presence of other prisoners, with a burning tire suspended above. The molten rubber drips onto the victim's face and body. Other reported means of torture and degrading treatment included rape, beatings, bayonetting, and castration.

All fighting groups, including government forces and the NRA, have been accused of employing torture. The numbers of persons physically abused are estimated in the thousands during 1985, with the rate probably dropping off somewhat after the ousting of the Obote government and the disbandment of the National Security Agency, allegedly a frequent user of torture. Conditions in detention centers, which had been greatly increased in number to handle the demand, were poor. Bodies were left after death (from beatings, starvation, illness, etc.). Sanitation and medical assistance were nonexistent. On August 10, over 1,200 political detainees were given their freedom in a public ceremony presided over by General Okello. Some of these Obote era detainees were in such poor physical condition that they were taken immediately from prison to the hospital. According to reliable reports, the NRA since the coup has instituted its own detention centers for persons it finds objectionable and which are outside the jurisdiction of Ugandan law (the numbers of such persons held by the NRA are unknown, but indications are they are in the hundreds). NRA detention policies reportedly have been based on ethnic and political considerations.

The year 1985 saw the continuation of reports both before and after the coup, that rape of women and forced concubinage by government forces occurred, with instances of females under 12 among the victims.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

A number of persons were subject to arbitrary detention, both legal and extralegal, during the first part of 1985. Legal detentions are accomplished under the Detention and Security Act of 1966, although this law has often been applied capriciously and was used during the Obote period against the opposition Democratic Party and suspected members of the NRA and other antigovernment groups. Extralegal detentions were most often performed by the military and civilian security agencies, such as the National Security Agency. In the case of military detentions, the victims were usually either detained on suspicion of being guerrilla sympathizers or, perhaps more commonly, were simply chosen as targets of ransom demands.

In August and September 1985, the IMG released a total of 1,400 Obote-era detainees. According to the Government, at the end of 1985, there were approximately 150 uncharged suspects in custody, primarily members of the disbanded National Security Agency, all of whom were accused of criminal activities. The IMG has issued one detention order since the coup, that for Cris Rwakasiisi, Minister of State in the Office of the President under Obote and responsible for overseeing National Security Agency operations. The IMG apprehended in 1985 over 200 officers and enlisted men caught looting or committing other crimes against civilians. Some were turned over to civil authorities for prosecution, and others were to be tried by courts martial. In addition, there were an unknown number being held extralegally by government forces, four allied fighting groups, and the NRA (in western and southwestern portions of the country controlled by the NRA).

Since the coup, the IMG has invited all Ugandans living in exile to return home. Some prominent Ugandans took advantage of the IMG's invitation to return, notably former President Godfrey Binaisa. The principal impediments to Ugandans returning appeared to be security and economic conditions within Uganda, rather than government policy. While the IMG made greater efforts to see that those exiled in Sudan and Zaire returned, it stated that the Banyarwanda (forced earlier into Rwanda) were also included in this appeal.

The Government, both before and since the coup, has not had a policy of forced or compulsory labor. However, individual government soldiers, primarily in the Luwero triangle, have reportedly forced women into concubinage and required them to raise crops, do household work, etc. Under Obote, especially in the north, children were abducted by military personnel and kept as personal servants.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Ugandan judicial system contains procedural safeguards modeled after British law, including the granting of bail and appeals to higher courts. The legal profession is generally respected. However, there have been many inequities in the working of the judicial system due to government pressures, to the general disorganization of the courts and the blurring of judicial jurisdiction during the civil war, and to alleged corruption among some members of the judiciary, e.g., the Government's use of extralegal and legal detention during the Obote period effectively prevented many individuals from receiving a fair trial. Moreover, during the Obote period, the government reportedly engaged in the harassment of attorneys, including detention of some lawyers suspected of being politically opposed to the government or the ruling UPC party. There were reports that compliant judges during the Obote period were assigned to politically sensitive cases out of normal rotation.

The IMG signaled its intention to restore the independence and impartiality of the judicial system by appointing a well-respected non-Ugandan to the position of Chief Justice. It had also initiated a reorganization of the judicial administrative system by the end of 1985.

There are no special courts for political or security cases. During the Obote period, members of the military and security forces enjoyed a near total immunity from civilian judicial authority, despite the formation of a legal unit within the UNLA in December 1984 for the purpose of carrying out courts-martial of soldiers accused of crimes. The IMG announced its intention in October to prosecute members of the military under the terms of the Military Act of 1966. The IMG also apprehended over 200 officers and enlisted men who were caught looting or committing other crimes.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Undisciplined elements of both the Obote and IMG regimes interfered with privacy and family through harassment of the populace, including physical abuse, and large-scale looting. In the first half of 1985 such activities were confined principally to the areas of armed conflict, i.e., the Luwero triangle and areas of western Uganda. During and immediately after the July 27 coup, looting, hijacking of private vehicles, and armed robbery continued in Kampala and in other disturbed areas. Without sufficient pay, food, housing, or clothing, the soldiers from disparate government forces turned to robbing citizens in the streets, often at roadblocks as well as in their homes. Elements of the military, often in league with civilians, also mounted larger-scale looting expeditions to strip entire households of furnishings in Kampala and other areas, particularly where military operations were taking place. Lira, the major city in Obote's home region of Lango, was also badly looted, reportedly by members of UNLA and associated paramilitary groups.

There was no indication that either the Obote regime or the IMG has interfered with correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite the imposition of a military government, there is extensive public debate over the issues of the day, including in the press. Ugandan journalists indicate that freedom of the press has increased since the coup, and this was reflected in the coverage of internal events including reporting of human rights violations. Nevertheless, on January 2, 1986, the IMG announced the formation of a Press Security Committee whose ostensible purpose is to prevent sensational press reporting.

In early October, the Ugandan press began to report atrocities including indiscriminate killing and rape by government forces in the Luwero triangle. The IMG responded by assembling a high-level team of government officials and a pool of Ugandan journalists to make a trip into the disturbed area to investigate the charges. The visit was covered extensively by government television as well as independent news media.

During the Obote period there was no official censorship, but there was considerable pressure on journalists to toe the government line, and a number of journalists were detained, usually under the Detention Act, for having written stories critical of the government and the ruling UPC party. About 10 journalists were detained in the 1984-85 period. Following the coup, the IMG has not interfered with the operation of the press, except for the detention of one Ugandan journalist, who was released uncharged and unharmed after 3 weeks. Foreign journalists, including some who could not obtain visas during the Obote period, have been able to enter Uganda and have had access to the new leaders.

The Obote government banned one magazine in March, apparently for a critical article. Otherwise, international publications--often highly critical of the Obote as well as current Government--were readily available for sale in Uganda in 1985.

Prior to the coup in early 1985, the citizenship of a prominent Ugandan academic, Mahmood Mamdani, was revoked. Mamdani, who is of Asian heritage, claimed the revocation was illegal. It is widely believed that this action was taken because Mamdani had criticized the Minister of State in the President's office.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly and association in Uganda is generally respected, but permits for public gatherings must be obtained from police authorities who have the right to deny the permit in the interest of public safety. During the Obote period, nonpolitical events and national celebrations were often given strong government party overtones. In the early campaign for the scheduled 1985 elections, which were subsequently cancelled, a number of opposition political rallies were subject to harassment by UPC youth. In some instances, rallies were canceled by security authorities ostensibly because of "security problems." Since the coup, political activities have been suspended, but public gatherings have been permitted. Professional associations of doctors, attorneys, engineers, and accountants operate without hindrance, as do international associations such as the Rotary Club, Lions, YMCA, and YWCA.

Under the Obote government, trade unionism remained limited and subject to government party influence. UPC "workers' councils" continued attempts to supplant traditional trade unions. Trade unionists reported that before the coup they were under government pressure to affiliate themselves with the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions. After the coup, unions were free to associate with any international labor organization.

There is no state religion in Uganda. Islam, Christianity, and African traditional religions are freely practiced. Conversion between religions is not obstructed. There is no government control of religious publications, even those with an antigovernment slant. Foreign missionaries and other religious figures are welcome in Uganda. Religious leaders frequently speak out publicly on topics relating to their followers' welfare, addressing in particular human rights, security, and political issues. The opinions of religious leaders carry great weight in public discourse.

The UPC is to some extent identified with the Church of Uganda (Anglican) while the Democratic Party is identified with Roman Catholicism. However, followers of various religions are found in both parties.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

In theory, Ugandans are free to move, reside, and choose their place of work within the country. In practice, however, travel within the country in 1985 was difficult in view of sporadic guerrilla attacks, UNLA operations, and by October a de facto partition of western and southwestern Uganda, which were under NRA control, from the rest of the country. At year's end, a short-lived ceasefire had increased freedom of movement slightly. There are no restrictions which prevent Ugandans from emigrating.

UGANDA

Perhaps as many as 500,000 persons have been displaced by conflict within Uganda since 1980. Many have sought sanctuary in neighboring states. The great majority of these displaced persons and refugees fled to eastern Zaire and southern Sudan in the aftermath of the 1979 liberation war and UNLA excesses in repulsing a 1980 guerrilla attack in the west Nile region. At its peak, the numbers of Ugandans in Zaire and Sudan totaled approximately 150,000. During the first half of 1985 over 20,000 of these people returned to Uganda with the help of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Since the coup, a large number of persons living in southern Sudan have returned spontaneously to Uganda, several thousand of whom were young men of military age who have come back to serve in government fighting forces.

Approximately 40,000 Banyarwanda fled Uganda to Rwanda in 1982-83 as a result of quasi-official harassment of this minority group. The majority were Ugandan citizens, but some were Rwandese nationals. Although the Obote government publicly invited these persons to return to Uganda as part of its stated policy of reconciliation and no revenge, it was reluctant to support a full-scale repatriation of the Banyarwanda, including those with valid legal claims to Ugandan nationality. Possibly 25,000 Banyarwanda have spontaneously repatriated themselves since the coup, mainly settling in southwestern Uganda, an area under NRA control. There were credible reports that some Banyarwanda returnees had been recruited into NRA forces. At the end of 1985, an estimated 200,000 persons out of Uganda's population of 15 million still lived abroad.

The IMG has appealed to the international community for assistance in resettlement of displaced persons, but the security situation during most of 1985 prevented implementation of such efforts.

Given the poor security and economic situation, there were few non-Ugandans seeking refuge in Uganda. There were no reported incidents of Uganda forcibly repatriating foreign refugees in 1985.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Internal rivalry led a portion of the Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA) leadership--dominated by members of the Acholi ethnic group--to seize control of the government in July 1985 and to establish an Interim Military Government (IMG), headed by a Military Council. The IMG suspended political activity but it did not disband political parties. The IMG recruited into the Military Council and civilian Cabinet a cross section of ethnic, political, and religious personalities to form a relatively broad based government, excluding, however, supporters of Museveni's NRA. Four months of negotiations, hosted by President Daniel Arap Moi of Kenya, came close to bringing the NRM into the Council, but these arrangements collapsed in early 1986.

President Obote and the Uganda Peoples Congress (UPC) ruled Uganda for nearly 13 of its 23 years as an independent nation (1962-71, and 1980-85). During these periods, Uganda maintained the structure of a parliamentary democracy, with elections, universal suffrage, legal opposition parties, and a free press. The legitimacy of this democracy was called in question under the first Obote government by postponement of elections after 1962. There was a widespread belief that the Obote government used its power to manipulate the 1980 general elections. Democratic structures also were weakened by the second Obote administration's extralegal actions, e.g. through arbitrary arrest of suspected political opponents and by the politicization of the armed forces and the exacerbation of ethnic divisions.

At least five guerrilla groups of various sizes operated in Uganda during the period 1981-85. Each had an ethnic base. In addition to Museveni's National Resistance Movement and Army (NRM/NRA), dominated by the Banyankole, there were: the Federal Democratic Union of Uganda (FEDEMU), the Uganda Freedom Movement (UFM), the Uganda National Rescue Front (UNRF) and the Former Ugandan National Army (FUNA). The majority of the members of the first two groups--often led by former government soldiers but composed primarily of ethnic Bantu civilians turned guerrillas--were inside Uganda at the time of the coup. Members of the second two groups--largely led by and made up of ethnic Nilotics and ethnic Sudanics who had served in the armed forces during the 1960's and 1970s--were mostly in exile in Sudan and Zaire at the time of the coup.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Obote government was highly sensitive to any foreign criticism of Uganda's human rights record and publicly disputed Western reports of human rights violations in Uganda, including the highly critical June 1985 Amnesty International special report on the status of human rights in Uganda. The Obote government invited representatives of Amnesty International to visit Uganda's detention centers but the trip did not materialize because of the July 27 coup. Amnesty International in its 1985 Report (covering 1984) focused its concern on the detention without trial of hundreds of alleged political opponents of the Obote government. Freedom House rated Uganda "partly free."

One of the first acts of the Interim Military Government was to appoint as Minister of Internal Affairs, Paul K. Ssemogerere, leader of the opposition Democratic Party and long-time critic of the Obote regime's stand on human rights practices. While there continued to be serious human rights violations in Uganda due to the IMG's inability to control its troops and associated forces, the IMG made a credible effort to confront and report these incidents.

The largest of the nongovernment organizations in Uganda, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), continued its programs of prison visits to both IMG and NRA controlled facilities, tracing, family reunification, and emergency assistance in disturbed areas. The ICRC has not been able, however, to gain permission to enter military barracks where detainees are held. The Uganda Red Cross continued to be very much in the forefront of relief efforts and other public service work and has been tasked with helping to resettle Banyarwanda returnees at such time as that program can commence. Other nongovernmental organizations working in Uganda include the League of Red Cross Societies, Oxford Famine Relief, Save the Children Fund, Doctors without Borders, the German Emergency Doctors, as well as many foreign religious organizations.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Uganda's estimated population of 14.7 million is growing at the annual rate of 3.1 percent, according to the World Bank. Gross national product per capita in 1983, the last year for which figures are available, was $220 and has probably dropped since then due to the disruption of the economy by civil strife.

In the modern sector there are constraints on the economy, notably a government monopoly on purchasing key agricultural crops for export, but both the Obote and current Governments have generally encouraged a free market economy. Coffee exports are the source of over 90 percent of Uganda's foreign exchange earnings. By November, however, much of the processing of the coffee crop was disrupted because of the civil war. This situation seriously affected Uganda's ability to pay for essential imports, particularly petroleum products. Nevertheless, Uganda has great economic potential with important agricultural assets, including fertile soils, regular rainfall, substantial deposit of minerals such as tin, copper, and cobalt, a tradition of productive local enterprise, and facilities such as a road network and hydroelectric power. The Obote government, with IMF assistance, introduced ambitious economic reform measures starting in 1981 but later abandoned these measures as the overall security situation worsened, and inflation soared to a projected rate of 175 percent by late 1985. Following the coup, the IMG began talks with the IMF with a view toward eventually reinstating a reform program.

Life expectancy at birth is 49.1 years. The health infrastructure, which was devastated during the 1970's, continued to be one of the government's top priorities in 1985. Infant mortality is one index of the breakdown in health care. According to UNICEF, one village near Kampala experienced an infant mortality rate of 32 deaths per 1,000 live births in the late 1960's; this had risen to over 90 in 1984. In 1985, the national infant mortality rate was 112.8 per 1,000 live births, up from 92.6 in 1984, according to World Bank figures.

Both the Obote and present Governments have made rehabilitation of the educational infrastructure, internationally renowned in the 1960's and a notable casualty of the Amin period, a top priority, together with medical services. However, there were credible reports that funds earmarked for education in the Obote government were diverted by personal and government party corruption. What educational renewal has taken place in the past 5 years has resulted from foreign assistance and from many self-help groups formed by parents, teachers, religious, and other civic groups which have provided much of the material and labor to rehabilitate schools. In 1982, a relatively peaceful year, the primary school enrollment ratio was 68 percent of the eligible children (79 percent for males, 57 percent for females). The adult literacy rate in 1980 was 52 percent (65 percent for males, 40 percent for females).

Minimum age for employment is 12 years except on light work which the Minister of Labor may exempt by statutory order. In addition, there are restrictions for employing persons under 16 years old in mining and at night--apprenticeships exempted. The minimum wage is that of the lowest paid person employed by the Kampala City Council, currently about $14 per month.00). Medical care is to be provided by employers.

Women are not legally discriminated against or officially restricted from education or employment. However, their access to education has been declining, according to United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, as the educational system deteriorates and the economy declines. Families withdraw daughters rather than sons from school in times of economic hardship. At the same time, women have been active in politics at the grass roots level and have held several senior positions in national parties as well as in government. There were no women of cabinet-level rank in the IMG government.

The country's boundaries cut across contiguous tribal areas and group together mutually distrustful ethnic groups. Historical animosities between ethnic groups have been exacerbated by Uganda's political problems and, in particular, by the ruination of the country's economic and political infrastructure during the Amin years, from which the country has not recovered. Particularly damaging was the 1972 expulsion of an estimated 70,000 persons of Asian heritage who comprised the backbone of Uganda's entrepreneurial and skilled trade resources. The cumulative result of Uganda's long-term ethnic civil conflict has led to a breakdown of the country's social fabric. Two ethnic groups commonly are subject to discrimination in delivery of the government's economic and social services. These are the Banyarwanda and Karamajong. As noted above, the Banyarwanda have suffered expulsion from and displacement within Uganda. The Karamajong, who live in northeastern Uganda, have had indiscriminate military action directed against them in reprisal for their violent cattle raiding.

ZAIRE

President Mobutu Sese Seko, who seized power in 1965, heads both the Government (appointing the Prime Minister and his Cabinet) and the party, the Popular Movement of the Revolution, (appointing the members of its highest organ, the central committee) of Zaire. The President has the constitutional power to promulgate laws by decree. In theory, authority is shared with the popularly elected Legislative Council. In practice, the Parliament rarely disagrees with presidential decisions, although decrees are usually preceded by consultations with party leaders and legislators. The single party automatically includes all citizens as members. The Executive Council (Prime Minister and Council of Ministers), the Legislative Council (unicameral parliament), the judiciary, and the only labor union (National Union of Zairian Workers) are all organs of the party.

A complex of security organizations, notably the civilian National Documentation Agency, the paramilitary gendarmerie and Civil Guard, and the armed forces (particularly the military intelligence action service and the Special Presidential Brigade) share responsibility for identifying and controlling potential internal and external threats to Zaire and the Mobutu Government. These organizations wield broad powers and influence, which allows arbitrary harassment and detention of ordinary citizens as well as suspected political opponents of the Government. Throughout 1985, continued instability affected the region along Lake Tanganyika in Eastern Zaire, from Uvira in Kivu region down to Moba, with rebel attacks against Kalemie and, once again in May, Moba itself, which had been a rebel target in 1984.

Zaire has a mixed economy. Though major mining and transportation activities are state-owned, private enterprise is the rule in the other sectors, with the State often holding a minority equity position in larger firms. Individuals are permitted to pursue business interests in almost all sectors of the economy and are allowed to own property. Zaire shares the economic problems of most sub-Saharan African countries, including low income levels and inadequate infrastructure and health care. More than 10 years of low base metal prices have had a severe effect in Zaire. After several unsuccessful attempts, Zaire launched a serious, extensive economic reform program in January 1983. That program achieved significant progress in stabilizing the economy and continued in force during 1985.

The changes in the human rights situation in 1985 were mixed. The continuing instability in eastern Zaire led to a sharply deteriorating human rights situation there, with many civilian casualties caused by the fighting between government military forces and the rebels. A number of members of a group advocating a second political party were rearrested and banned to the interior of the country in October and November. Harassment of citizens by law enforcement personnel and inordinate delays in processing of detainees remained serious problems. There were, however, concerted efforts by the Government to reconcile differences with political dissidents, notably former prime minister Nguza Karl-I-Bond who returned to Zaire, as well as signs of greater government awareness of shortcomings in the judicial and penal systems. President Mobutu took over the Minister of Justice portfolio early in the year and named a commission to investigate prison and judicial performance which did effect at least short-term reforms in some parts of the country. Less successful but still positive efforts were undertaken to end the corruption in prison administration which permits poor conditions, beatings, and in some cases prisoners to starve to death. Zaire continues to provide sanctuary to over 300,000 refugees and displaced persons from neighboring countries, primarily Angola.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

. a. Political Killing

The only substantiated reports of killing for political motives were in eastern Zaire where there was fighting between government forces and insurgents. There is credible evidence that both government forces and the insurgents carried out a number of summary executions early in the year, although it was not always possible to differentiate clearly between such killings and combat deaths.

b. Disappearance

There have been several reports of disappearance from detention facilities during the year, at least two of which appear to be credible. The situation was more serious in the insurgent area in eastern Zaire early in the year. There, people have disappeared and can be presumed to have been killed by government security forces. It is difficult to estimate the number of disappearances, as numerous individuals and entire villages have been affected by the fighting and have fled or relocated, making it virtually impossible to determine how many moved or died in the fighting and how many have disappeared under other circumstances. Although the situation appears to have improved significantly in late 1985 due primarily to better army leadership, there are reports that at least 100 people have disappeared from the Kalemie-Moba area as a result of military reprisals.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government claims not to condone torture and denies allegations that torture is administered by its officials during interrogation. However, Amnesty International maintains that torture and physical mistreatment of detainees is routine in most Zairian places of detention. There is little question that mistreatment of detainees, particularly beatings at time of arrest and during preliminary interrogation, is the rule rather than the exception. Criminal penalties do not include physical punishment or mutilation. In fact, however, abuses of all kinds are endemic in Zaire's jails and prisons, with reports of unsanitary and crowded facilities, malnutrition, and starvation among prisoners. The reasons for this situation include lack of concern at senior levels, incompetence, corruption, and budget reductions imposed as a result of the economic reform program. The Government has begun to take steps to correct some of these abuses. President Mobutu took personal charge of the Ministry of Justice early in 1985, primarily in response to evidence of malfeasance in the administration of justice and prisons. The Government has taken steps, described in section 1d, to remove and prosecute corrupt prison officials and to speed up processing of criminal cases, but there probably have been only limited improvements in prison conditions. The underlying social and economic conditions which lead to abuses in the prisons are ingrained.

Undisciplined and underpaid police and military personnel abuse their authority by harassing and extorting money from civilians. In 1985, there was a significant increase in reports of civilians killed in such incidents. In spite of the popular discontent these practices create, and some greater attention given by the authorities to improve discipline, security personnel are rarely punished for misconduct.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention without charges remain common occurrences, affecting most people who come into contact with the criminal justice system. Although habeas corpus or its equivalent and bail do not exist, by law those arrested must be brought before a magistrate to hear charges within 48 hours of arrest. In practice, however, suspects are often arrested and held for months without a hearing. Detainees with financial resources are known to buy their way out of detention without ever having charges formally filed.

The Government took serious steps during 1985 to begin coming to grips with this problem. A high-level commission composed of the Secretary of State for Justice, the President of the Supreme Court, the chief public prosecutor, and a legal adviser from the President's office was named in March to begin a nationwide investigation of prosecution practices and the status of the prison populations. The commission has completed its review of detainees in Kinshasa, leading to the release of numerous detainees, the dropping of charges against many others, and faster processing of the remaining criminal cases. The commission has not yet had a significant impact on the interior of the country, where the situation is undoubtedly as bad as in Kinshasa, and it remains to be seen whether it will have any significant long-term effect. The Government and the bar association continue to implement other programs begun in 1983 and 1984 intended to improve the system of administering justice, to provide free legal counsel, and to educate people on their legal rights. However, as is the case with poor prison conditions, the underlying social and economic conditions which lead to the abuses in the system are ingrained.

Advocacy of a multiparty system or opposition to the party-state are both unconstitutional and illegal, as are actions which question the authority of the President and the political system. When formally arraigned, most political detainees are charged with subversion or "attempts against the internal security of the state." In addition to judicial sanctions for such activity, nonjudicial sanctions against persons suspected of threatening state security are authorized by law, ranging from administrative detention and house arrest to internal exile to native villages and restriction of movement and travel. A number of militants of the group seeking recognition as a second political party, the Union for Democracy and Social Progress (UDPS), including their spokesman, Tshisekedi Wa Mulumba, were arrested under these provisions in October. Tshisekedi and another leader were sentenced in January 1986 to 18 months in prison for insulting the President. In practice, most individuals detained for political reasons are held by means of these nonjudicial sanctions and are not formally charged or tried, remaining in detention or internal exile until the President chooses to release them. Such arrests are made openly, and the whereabouts of detainees is known, at least unofficially, although it is sometimes not acknowledged by the Government. There are security prisoners in Kinshasa who have not been visited by family members for over a year and who can be considered as being in incommunicado detention. There were no known cases of exile or expulsion of Zairians from the country in 1985.

Estimates of people detained or sentenced for essentially nonviolent expression of political beliefs vary greatly and are often out of date as detainees are released or others arrested, often for short periods of time. Estimates early in 1985 ran as high as 100 or more. An amnesty granted in June included a large number of people associated with the UDPS who had either been detained or relegated to native villages, including the remaining members of the "group of 13." By mid-September, UDPS officials believed that only about 12 sympathizers remained in detention, most of them having been detained in Kasai Oriental region in March after disturbances in a village to which a UDPS leader was "relegated." That situation changed in October as a number of additional UDPS sympathizers were held for varying periods of time. In addition, as many as 10 people who were arrested in connection with the 1984 bombing incidents in Kinshasa remain in custody. The Government maintains that they are terrorists but has never formally charged or tried them. Many people remain in detention in the Kalemie-Moba area in eastern Zaire, although it is difficult to distinguish political detainees or prisoners from those detained for participation in an armed insurgency. The best estimate of the number of political detainees or prisoners at the end of 1985 was 50-60. The Government maintains that it holds no political prisoners.

At its 1983 session, the International Labor Organization (ILO) in Geneva cited the Government of Zaire for not being in conformity with ILO Convention 29 pertaining to forced labor. This citation stemmed from Zairian legislation providing for compulsory civilian service for graduates from pedagogical and technical institutes, as well as from a government ordinance providing for imprisonment with compulsory labor for tax defaulters. The Government responded that amendments to the legislation were in process, although it is not clear whether they have been passed. There are no known instances in which tax defaulters have actually been sentenced to compulsory labor, although imprisonment at hard labor is a common sentence for those convicted of crimes.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Defendants are guaranteed by the Constitution the right to a public trial and defense counsel. In practice, however, most citizens are not aware of those rights, and there are insufficient lawyers in Zaire to provide adequate counsel to most defendants. When available, defense counsel generally function freely and without coercion from the Government. Most defendants who are aware of their rights avail themselves of the right to appeal. Decisions of the court of state security involving national security, armed robbery, and smuggling are not subject to appeal (appeal to the Court of Cassation is permitted only on questions of law, not of fact), although all other procedural protections of the criminal code do apply. Military court procedures also do not provide for appeal.

ZAIRE

While military courts generally try only cases involving military personnel, in time of emergency or during military operations (as was done in the Moba-Kalemie area in late 1984), the President can suspend civilian courts and transfer jurisdiction over all cases to military courts.

The fairness of trials is uneven. Poorly paid magistrates are known to accept bribes, and it is essentially those unable to pay such bribes who are subject to the full rigor of the judicial system. All judges are members of the sole political party and are subject to party discipline. The result is that, while judges are nominally independent and in fact perform their function without political interference in the great majority of cases, in sensitive or highly politicized cases the judges operate under instructions from the executive or security forces.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

All Zairians are automatically members of the sole political party, the Popular Movement for the Revolution (MPR). The ideology of the MPR, and thus the only acceptable profession of political thought, comprises the views and policies of the party's president and founder, Mobutu Sese Seko.

The party and state security organizations extend down to the neighborhood level, and both maintain liaison offices in all government agencies (including military units, universities, Legislative Council, ministries, etc.). Party officials, civil servants, armed forces personnel, parliamentarians, and employees of state enterprises pay an obligatory tax to support the activities of the party's major organs (cadre training, mobilization, propaganda, and youth). These party cadres are also required to attend the party's training institute. Nonattendance can result in reprimands and suspensions. Government employees, market vendors, and blue-collar workers are often required to participate in public events--parades, official arrival and departure ceremonies, etc.--or risk being suspended from their jobs.

Mail is opened sporadically by security services, some telephone conversations are tapped, and government informers monitor places of residence as well as of work. In line with the party-state's ideology of "Zairian authenticity," Zairian men are forbidden to wear ties and women to wear slacks or wigs. Zairians are also forbidden to use non-African names.

Judicial warrants are required by law before the police are permitted to search a home, except in cases of threats to national security. In practice, however, police and security authorities enter and search without such warrants. In civil cases where defendants have been found guilty of fraud or embezzlement from the Government, their property and homes can be seized and confiscated without reimbursement.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees the right of every citizen freely to express his opinions and feelings, either orally or in writing, but subordinates that and all other rights to the need to ensure "public order and good conduct."

ZAIRE

Radio and television are owned and operated by the State. The major newspapers are privately owned but are believed to depend upon significant government subsidies to survive. In addition, they receive most of their news from the Zairian National Press Agency (AZAP), a state-owned and -operated organization. AZAP is also the principal source of information about news from abroad (drawn primarily from the French and Chinese news agencies' wire services) disseminated to Zaire's media. All of the media are expected to promote the ideals and principles of the sole political party. Publishers and editors are generally active party members. Commentary on politically sensitive internal issues as well as on foreign policy options is discouraged, and direct criticism of the President is forbidden. While journalists are circumspect in their criticism of other high officials as well, criticism of certain government practices, inadequate services, and corruption frequently appears in print.

Media censorship tends to be self-imposed. Journalists must be members of the press union in order to practice their profession, and the threat of ouster from the union and consequent loss of livelihood reinforces self-censorship. There are several clandestine presses which operate sporadically, printing flyers and handbills critical of the Government and the ruling elite. The theater, songs, and organized street gossip are important forms of communicating popular opinions and news.

Artistic and academic freedom of expression are subject to the same restrictions and self-censorship as the press. Mandatory membership in professional organizations and well-developed informer networks serve to discourage dissent. From time to time, books, records, films, and certain issues of magazines are banned. Imported publications, including books and periodicals, are subject to censorship if they are critical of Zaire or its Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Only the party and its affiliates may hold public meetings. The Government permits the existence of nonpolitical associations, but they must notify authorities when they plan meetings or activities involving more than five people. The Government can also prohibit meetings which continue after 9 p.m. Meetings of nonofficial organizations and of some religious sects (see Section 2c below) have been disrupted on occasion by government agents because of suspected political activities.

The labor movement in Zaire is limited to one national union, The National Union of Zairian Workers (UNTZA), which is an integral unit of the sole political party. The secretary general of UNTZA is a member of the party's central committee, and union officials at the regional level serve on regional party committees. UNTZA has the right to bargain collectively and provides significant social and educational services to members and their families. It works with the Government to improve worker benefits. However, it is unable to promote worker interests or defend worker rights which differ from those approved by the Government and party. The right to strike is embodied in the labor law, but because the law establishes lengthy and mandatory arbitration and appeal procedures which result in the resolution of most labor disputes, in practice officially authorized strikes do not occur. There were numerous short, unauthorized but tolerated strikes in both the public and private sectors during 1985 which generally succeeded in focusing government and management attention on union concerns.

Membership in UNTZA is compulsory for civil servants, employees of state enterprises, and employees of private firms with at least 20 employees. Over 800,000 workers are dues-paying members. However, the overwhelming majority of the work force is self-employed, either in the unofficial sector or in subsistence agriculture, and is not covered by the Union. UNTZA participates actively in the ILO and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, and maintains ties with a number of foreign labor confederations.

Zairians enjoy freedom of religion, which is recognized in the Constitution. The Government officially sanctions most of the major world religions and provides procedures for new churches to obtain government recognition. Traditional African religious groups are tolerated but not officially recognized. The major religions in Zaire are: Catholicism--50 percent, Protestantism (including Kimbanguism)--36 percent, and Islam--5 percent. The Government has at times banned or harassed religious groups or activities considered to present a political challenge. Although in recent years this has not happened to the large recognized religious groups, there were instances in 1985 of small sects being harassed or closed down when they were suspected of pursuing political rather than religious aims.

Recognized religions are free to establish places of worship and to train clergy. Expatriate missionaries are allowed to proselytize and to serve both Zairian and expatriate congregations. Most churches maintain active links with coreligionists outside the country. Religious affiliation confers neither advantage nor disadvantage with respect to secular status.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government at times imposes special documentation requirements for travel to areas of unrest or security concern. As noted earlier, the Government also imposes against some dissidents the nonjudicial sanction of restriction to villages of origin. All citizens, refugees, and permanent residents must carry government-issued identity cards, and police and military personnel often set up checkpoints along major roads to inspect papers. Those whose papers are not in order pay a fine or spend time in jail. In principle, any Zairian citizen may obtain a passport and exit visa, although on occasion government and security officials have impeded issuance in order to prevent or disrupt travel of persons suspected of political opposition. A married woman must have her husband's permission before obtaining a passport but does not need his approval to travel.

In May 1985, there were approximately 50,000 Zairians living as displaced persons or refugees in neighboring countries. Many refugees and displaced persons have returned under amnesties declared in 1978 and 1983, and negotiations occur sporadically with refugee groups or the countries where they reside for additional repatriations. It is likely that many Zairian displaced persons could return to Zaire if they wished. A number of political opponents of the Government, however, live in self-imposed exile in Europe and probably could not safely return without renouncing their political views.

In May 1985, Zaire was providing a safehaven to approximately 330,000 displaced persons from neighboring countries. Generally such people pass freely into Zaire and are allowed to settle on the land or seek employment. They tend to become self-sufficient and are often integrated into the Zairian economic system within a few years of arrival. The Government considers them to be resettled until such time as they decide to return to their country of origin. Although the Zairian Government generally accepts displaced persons, it does not have the resources to provide assistance beyond free land, and international agencies play an active role in providing humanitarian assistance. At times, displaced persons from neighboring countries (particularly Angola) have been detained or harassed by security forces on suspicion of illegal political activity.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The key instruments of political power in Zaire are highly centralized and controlled by the President, who makes all important decisions. Under Zaire's Constitution, the state is essentially the executive organ of the country's sole political party, the Popular Movement of the Revolution. Party congresses meet every 5 years under the guidance of the President to set national political guidelines which are then supplemented by resolutions of the party's central committee. These policies are executed by the Prime Minister and Cabinet, who are appointed by the President.

Suffrage is universal over age 18 and voting is mandatory, enforced by penalties including fines or arrest. The national Parliament, municipal councils, rural and urban zone councils are chosen by direct popular elections which take place every 5 years, with the most recent having been in 1982. All candidates are members of the party (as are all citizens of Zaire) and are screened by party committees at the appropriate level, but voters generally have a choice of candidates (in the 1982 parliamentary election there were an average of five candidates per district). The President is popularly elected for a 7-year term, after nomination by the party central committee. President Mobutu was reelected in 1984 to a third term in office.

Citizens have no right to change their government through present institutions. Since 1980, a group of former parliamentarians has been involved in an effort to establish a second political party, the Union for Democracy and Social Progress (UDPS). Their efforts have generally been rebuffed by the official party and by the President, and they have suffered arrest and detention at various times over the past 5 years. Most members of the group, including all of its leaders, were released from internal exile in June 1985 and later entered into a dialogue with President Mobutu. That dialogue succeeded neither in convincing the UDPS members to rejoin the official party nor in convincing the President to open up the political system to another party. Later in 1985, a number of UDPS members were again arrested and banished to the interior.

ZAIRE

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government maintains that Zaire has nothing to hide in terms of human rights policies, and it denies charges of systematic or serious violations. Its attitude toward external investigation of alleged human rights violations has been mixed. Zaire allows the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to visit detention places and prisons. The ICRC, which has had a permanent representation in Zaire since 1978, continued its efforts in 1985 to gain access to all detainees held for security reasons. In 1985, the ICRC visited detention centers and prisons in Kinshasa, Kasai Oriental, Shaba, and Kivu. Moreover, the ICRC was given access to evaluate the situation in the subregion of Tanganyika following the insurgent attacks in the Kalemie-Moba area.

Amnesty International's 1985 Report levels harsh criticism at Zaire, although most of the examples used in that report date from 1984 and earlier. In April, Amnesty International submitted information on its human rights concerns under the U.N. procedures for confidentially reviewing communications about human rights violations. The Government contends that Amnesty International's reports are inaccurate, biased, and derived primarily from misinformed Zairian dissidents in Europe. Zaire has not allowed its representatives to visit the country since July 1982. The Government has consistently maintained that international action in the field of human rights should be strictly circumscribed by the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of sovereign states. A local organization purports to study human rights issues, but it does not address itself to specific Zairian problems, concentrating instead on general issues. Freedom House rates Zaire as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Zaire is sub-Saharan Africa's second largest country in area and third largest in population (32 million). The annual population growth rate is approximately 2.7 percent, and the per capita gross domestic product was estimated at only $170 in 1983. Because of low capital investment and poor maintenance, Zaire's basic infrastructure, particularly transportation, marketing, and communications, has deteriorated steadily since independence.

At the end of 1982, the Government instituted a stringent economic and financial recovery program developed with the assistance of the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Zaire has adhered to that program for 3 years, implementing measures to liberalize its economy and instituting management reforms. Price liberalization has encouraged greater food production. Limiting public expenditures and employment is another reform measure. While there are now signs that the economy is beginning to recover after more than a decade of decline, the short-term social and economic effects of the measures have aggravated the already precarious economic circumstances of many urban people. Major structural problems in transportation, public health, and education will be overcome only with time.

Unemployment and underemployment are serious problems. Since independence, the percentage of rural population engaged in subsistence agriculture has increased to 75 percent. During the past several years, industry has operated at only 30 to 40 percent of capacity. Since remuneration in the public service sector is inadequate and sporadic, many civil servants must supplement their incomes through commercial activities. Low salaries and job insecurity have also contributed to corruption in the Government and military. Low wage levels remain a problem, although government reforms include a new minimum agricultural wage, a higher minimum industrial wage, and revision of the Government's personnel system to provide comparable pay for comparable work throughout the military and civil service.

Reflecting malnutrition and other health problems, the infant mortality rate in 1985 was 106 per 6,000 live births, and the life expectancy at birth was 51.6 years. Health care is curative rather than preventive and is extremely limited in quality and availability in both urban and rural areas. In 1979, the population per physician was 14,780 and per hospital bed was 350. Access to safe water is limited, especially in rural areas.

The literacy rate in Zaire for persons over 15 varies regionally but was estimated at 55 percent nationally in 1980. Approximately 37 percent of women are literate. Lack of books and supplies, high dropout rates at all levels, teacher strikes, poor teacher quality and, most recently, serious reductions in teaching and research staff have contributed to a declining quality of education at all levels throughout the country. Unofficial regional and ethnic quotas designed to protect various ethnic groups from exclusion are implemented in the university system.

Worker rights are protected by law, but the fact that such a large percentage of the work force is in the unofficial sector limits the effectiveness of those laws. The minimum age for employment in Zaire is 14 years. However, many children younger than 14 engage in various income-earning activities and are often a major source of family income. The same is true with regard to conditions of work. Workers employed in the public and organized private sector have generally acceptable conditions of work: working hours are set by law and collective bargaining and do not exceed 48 hours a week; workers enjoy a full 24-hour rest day per week, and many have a 48 hour weekend; paid holidays and vacations are required by law and are included in all labor contracts; and workplaces are required to meet minimum health standards set by law. While wages are generally above the minimum wage, that minimum, by itself, is insufficient to provide a decent living for a worker. In the official private sector, benefits often make up more than half of the total wage package, but in the public sector total remuneration does not provide a decent living. The results are corruption and workers taking on second jobs, often in the unregulated informal sector.

The role of women in Zairian society is given great emphasis in party doctrine. Women's rights to own property and participate in the political and economic sectors are protected by law, and a growing number of women work in the professions, government service, and the universities. Nevertheless, custom, tradition, and existing law continue to constrain women from attaining a position of complete equality in society. Women generally earn less than their male counterparts in the same jobs. In addition, married women must obtain their husband's authorization before opening a bank account, accepting a job, and renting or selling real estate.

ZAMBIA

Zambia is a one-party state in which individual rights, basic freedoms, and due process are generally well observed while some political rights are restricted. Much of the decisionmaking power is concentrated in the hands of the President, Kenneth Kaunda, who, unopposed, was reelected in 1983 to his fifth consecutive five-year term. He is advised by a central committee of party leaders and governs through a Cabinet and a Parliament elected through controlled elections. The President possesses sweeping powers--conferred on him by emergency legislation which dates from 1964--to suspend observance of legal rights in the "interest of state security." The Constitution also allows the National Assembly to suspend basic constitutional guarantees. Candidates for political office at any level must be members of the United National Independence Party (UNIP).

Zambia's economy continues to be severely depressed due to such factors as low prices for the country's mineral exports, the high cost of basic imports, inadequate agricultural production, and statist policies. Also, the rapid rate of population growth is outstripping increases in productivity. There has been a continuing decline in the standard of living, but the Government is taking steps to improve the management of the economy and to encourage the private sector, including removing agricultural production disincentives, while attempting to maintain delivery of a wide range of social services to the citizenry. Urban crime and smuggling are widespread and growing, severely taxing the limited capabilities of Zambia's police and military forces.

In January 1983, Zambia's high court convicted seven persons of conspiring to overthrow the Government and handed down mandatory death sentences. The convictions were appealed to the Supreme Court, which took testimony in open session during August and September 1984. On April 2, 1985, the Supreme Court reversed the convictions of two men sentenced to death and dismissed the appeals of the other five. The five men facing death sentences have the right to appeal to President Kaunda for clemency. During 1985, over 40 persons were detained under orders signed by the President.

There was no major change in the status of human rights in Zambia in 1985. Zambian institutions such as the press, trade unions, and churches have come under some pressure from central authorities to be more responsive to the wishes of the Government but have maintained to the best of their ability their objectivity, status, and influence. There is strong competition for parliamentary seats within the single-party structure. The National Assembly provides a platform for the spirited consideration of issues. The judiciary is independent and takes full account of the rights of the accused. The trade union movement continues to be one of the best organized and most democratic in Africa, and the churches remain a strong independent force which can unite to defend common interests. Zambia continues to serve as a place of first asylum for refugees in the region.

ZAMBIA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1985, there were no killings for which there was evidence of political motivation or government instigation.

b. Disappearance

No case of politically motivated disappearance is known to have occurred during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, but there are allegations that police and military personnel have used cruel treatment when arresting persons and have resorted to torture when interrogating detainees. Charges of torture and mistreatment are reported freely in the press when victims register their complaints in court. The courts frequently order investigations to ascertain if confessions or statements were made after torture or physical or mental mistreatment and have consistently rejected statements obtained under duress from arrested persons. Abuses of prisoners are reported to include beatings, pain inflicted on various parts of the body, and long periods of solitary confinement. Prisoners have successfully sued the state for damages as a result of prison abuses. The Director of Public Prosecutions has announced that he would meet with the Inspector General of police concerning complaints from prisoners of beatings while in police custody.

Zambian prisons are overcrowded, understaffed, and unsanitary. In the past 20 years, the prison population has grown from 5,000 to 11,000 with no corresponding growth in facilities. Medical facilities are meager, but prisoners with serious medical problems are treated in public hospitals. Prisoners are generally segregated by sex, seriousness of the offense, and age group. There is no institutional differentiation in the treatment of different categories of prisoners charged or convicted under civil or criminal statutes, but Presidential detainees receive better care than that accorded common criminals.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the state of emergency, which has been in effect since independence in 1964, the President has broad discretion to detain or restrict the movements of individuals. Detention procedures have been revised to conform with the provisions of the Constitution and have increased the President's authority. The President can order a detainee to be incarcerated indefinitely and is not legally bound to accept a court's acquittal if he still believes that the detainee is guilty. In practice, however, detainees are almost always released if the court finds in their favor. By law, presidential detainees are entitled to: formal notification within 14 days of the reasons for their detention; publication of their detention in the government gazette; access to counsel; frequent visitation by family and colleagues; immediate representation to the detaining authority; and the right to seek judicial review of the detention order by an independent and impartial tribunal after 1 year. Presidential detainees have their cases heard by the high court and have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court. Habeas corpus is, in principle, available to persons detained under presidential order, but the Government is not obliged to accept the recommendation of the review tribunal. It is estimated that approximately 45 presidential detainees are currently held in Zambia.

During 1985, the presidential detention power was used to arrest about 40 persons, many of whom were allegedly involved in illegal drug or currency transactions. Ten of those detainees were released after being detained for periods ranging from a few days to 4 months. Most of the other detainees are seeking their release through court actions, but this can be a slow process which can take anywhere from a few months to several years. Detainees can sue the state for unlawful detention and false imprisonment, and such cases were brought to court during 1985.

Under the state of emergency, law officers and defense personnel have extraordinary powers. Police officers of assistant inspector rank and above may arrest without a warrant and detain a person for up to 28 days if the officer has reason to believe grounds exist to justify a presidential detention order. However, within 14 days police must provide the detainee with the reasons for his detention or his incarceration is void. This requirement is followed rigorously. Security officers have broad powers to search suspects and their homes and sometimes act without warrants when looking for smugglers or illegal aliens.

There is no slavery, involuntary servitude, or forced labor in Zambia. These are prohibited by the Constitution.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Zambian judicial system consists of a Supreme Court with appellate powers and a series of lower courts--of which the high court is the most important. Presidential detainees are not automatically guaranteed public trials, but the majority have been tried in public. The safeguards of English common law are provided in court cases not involving presidential detainees. Independent observation confirms the independence of the Zambian judiciary from executive branch influence. The President's power to appoint and transfer judges has sometimes been cited as proof that judicial independence can be compromised. However, there is no evidence that such power has swayed court decisions.

There are probably five or fewer detainees who could make a claim to political prisoner status, and even in these cases it is possible that the persons were involved either in acts of violence or in plotting actions involving violence. Three of these detainees are charged with involvement in the alleged 1981 plot to rescue prisoners accused of treason, but they have not yet been brought to trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Zambian Government does not require membership in political organizations and usually does not monitor correspondence or telephones or otherwise interfere in family life. The sanctity of the home is generally respected, except in isolated incidents relating to the national emergency or to roundups of illegal aliens. In such cases, security forces often do not have search warrants.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is considerable freedom of press and speech in Zambia, and the press regularly reports criticism of government activities expressed by sources ranging from elected officials to average citizens. The two national dailies are owned by the Government and the party respectively, but substantial commentary critical of party and government performance is permitted. The Times of Zambia, the party paper, is generally independent of outside direction. The papers discuss economic policy, corruption, and poor administration. However, negative comments concerning the Head of State, the concept of the one-party state, or the national philosophy, "Humanism", are prohibited. Journalists and commentators know the limits of criticism and avoid reporting which could lead to charges of libel and slander. An independent biweekly paper, which is sometimes critical of official policies, is published by an association of churches, and two other independent papers focus on mining and financial subjects. Television and radio are owned and operated by the Government; frequent panel discussion programs provide for a wide range of views on Zambian issues.

While the possibility of censorship of foreign publications and news items exists, it is seldom invoked. Academic freedom is highly respected in Zambian society, and Zambian educators are outspoken in their commitment to an educational system free of government influence. There is little or no governmental influence in matters relating to curriculum, student selection, or faculty assignment.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Police permits are required for meetings, rallies, or marches. These permits are issued routinely, unless the Government believes the proceedings are likely to be directed against local authorities. While there is a ban on all political activity outside the one-party structure, Zambia has a profusion of trade associations and professional groups which can serve as unofficial pressure groups on various economic, political, and social subjects.

Zambia has a history of strong labor union organizations, dating from the establishment of large copper mines during the 1930's. Zambia's 18 national labor unions, which are organized by industry or profession, are all members of the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU). Member unions defend worker interests, especially regarding wages and conditions of work, and have the right to bargain collectively. Under existing legislation, strikes are permitted only for specific reasons and only after all other recourse has been exhausted. Virtually all strikes are illegal, since they almost always commence before the mandatory process of mediation has run its course. However, the Government has normally relied on persuasion and continued mediation to end strikes once they have begun. A series of wildcat strikes during 1985, involving workers in such important sectors as finance and mining, resulted in a government decree declaring workers in most sectors of the economy "essential" and therefore liable to prosecution for illegal strike action. However, the Government has yet to invoke this decree. The ZCTU is not controlled by the party or Government, and union leaders frequently criticize government policy on such subjects as wages, economic policy, conditions of service, and labor representation in party and government organs. The ZCTU is democratic and regularly conducts open elections to select its leadership. It is active in the International Labor Organization and is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and has been supported by President Kaunda. Zambia has no state religion, and adherence to a particular faith does not confer either advantage or disadvantage. Christian missionaries from a wide variety of faiths operate freely in the country. While Jehovah's Witnesses are prohibited from proselytizing, the sect functions openly and its freedom not to participate in various secular activities such as voting, singing the national anthem, and saluting the flag has been upheld in the courts and supported by senior party leaders. Lay associations and religious youth groups operate independently of party control or influence.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The President may, under the emergency legislation, restrict the movement of individuals within Zambia, although this authority is seldom if ever used. The Government also reserves the right to refuse to issue or to withdraw passports to prevent foreign travel by individuals whose activities are considered inimical to Zambian interests. Such restrictions are occasionally applied. Strict currency regulations also serve to inhibit foreign travel or emigration.

Acquisition, loss, or revocation of citizenship is governed by constitutional provisions and laws administered by the citizenship board. However, the President also has power to grant or revoke citizenship on an extraordinary basis.

Zambia has long played host to a considerable refugee and asylum-seeking population that originates in several strife-torn southern African countries. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimates that there are about 97,000 refugees in Zambia. The largest group of refugees is from Angola, with significant numbers from Zaire, Namibia, and South Africa. Smaller numbers are from Malawi, Mozambique, and Zimbabwe. Many of the Angolans and Zaireans have spontaneously resettled in western and northwestern provinces since the ethnic compositions on both sides of the border are similar. The Zambian Government operates two large refugee resettlement centers, and the Southwest African People's Organization operates one camp. Urban refugees number approximately 700.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since 1973, the United National Independence Party, with an estimated membership of less than 10 percent of the adult population, has been Zambia's sole legal political party. Power is concentrated in the hands of the President as leader of the party and Chief of State. He plays a dominant role in determining the membership of Zambia's top executive institutions, the party central committee and cabinet, although traditionally both bodies contain a general balance of regional and tribal representation.

Candidates for political office at any level must be members of the party and are subject to close examination for suitability by senior party authorities. In practice, the Zambia political system is open to individuals of somewhat divergent opinions provided they are willing to work within the one-party structure and not challenge the President's preeminent position. In the latest parliamentary elections in 1983, 760 candidates contested 125 seats; 40 incumbents were defeated, including 7 ministers of state.

The National Assembly is reflective of constituent interests and sometimes thwarts or modifies executive branch policies and programs. It can also be very critical of such policies, as was demonstrated a number of times in 1985 when members of Parliament railed against government expenditures, poor services, and land allocations. Presidential and general elections are by universal suffrage but the numbering of ballots, which could be cross-checked against voter registration numbers, could undermine the secrecy of the ballot. In the 1983 presidential election, voters had the option of voting for or against the single candidate or abstaining. A total of 63.4 percent of registered voters went to the polls, of whom 93 percent voted in favor of the President.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

While there is no public record of the Zambian Government having been subject to such investigations during 1985, the Government neither encourages nor hinders inquiries or visits by human rights organizations. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International was concerned about the detention without trial of alleged opponents of the Government. Freedom House rates Zambia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Zambia continues to suffer from a prolonged economic recession, marked by inflation, serious unemployment, and scarce financial resources. The application of various economic policies since independence along socialist or centrally managed lines has not lived up to expectations. Real per capita income has fallen below the level at independence, and due to depressed prices for Zambia's copper exports, even total real national income remains below the level reached in 1977. Per capita gross national product fell from $644 in 1982 to $580 in 1983. Zambia's 6.8 million population is now growing at the rate of 3.2 percent (2.8 percent in 1970). A 3-year drought during the period 1982-84 reduced food production and forced further reliance on food imports. However, improved rainfall during early 1985 should provide Zambia with a better maize harvest.

In the past three years, the Government has taken a number of measures designed to deal with the country's economic plight. It has restricted public spending, reduced or eliminated government subsidies on essential commodities, raised prices paid for agricultural produce, and devalued the currency by introducing an auction system for the purchase of foreign exchange. It is also taking steps to promote private initiative. The economy, however, faces a substantial debt burden and a return to economic growth is not expected for several years.

The average income of rural inhabitants is estimated to be substantially less than one-third the size of the average earnings of urban dwellers. This imbalance has generated heavy rural-to-urban migration (over 40 percent of the population is urban), exacerbating already high unemployment and crime rates in urban areas. Nationwide, unemployment is well over a third of the potential work force. The top 20 percent of households claims over 56 percent of the total income, while the bottom 40 percent gets 11 percent (1976).

In addition, the gap between rural and urban areas in terms of education, housing, nutrition, and the availability of public services is considerable. However, by 1980 about the same percentage of rural dwellers (66.4 percent) had access to safe water as urban dwellers (67 percent). Life expectancy at birth is 51.7 years. The infant mortality rate is 107 per 1,000 live births (1985). The fertility rate is 6.1 live births per woman, one of the highest in the world.

The literacy rate is estimated at 54 percent. According to 1980 statistics on school enrollment as a ratio of population in age groups, almost all Zambia's primary-age children are enrolled in primary school. Less than 20 percent of primary school graduates are admitted to secondary school due to limitations of facilities and resources. Female students can be admitted to secondary school with lower passing marks than male students as part of Zambia's "affirmative action" program.

Zambian law regulates minimum health and safety standards and worker rights in any industrial undertaking. Boards appointed by the Government and including worker and employer representatives fix minimum wages, overtime pay, and conditions of employment. Women are excluded from night work and a variety of hazardous occupations. Although age restrictions apply to the industrial sector, with few cases of employees under age 16, in the commercial and agricultural sectors persons under age 14 are often employed.

Under statutory law, women generally enjoy full equality with men, and women participate increasingly in Zambia's social, economic, and political life. They hold some senior positions in the party, the Government, and the judiciary, and are gaining increasing representation in the professions and higher education. In 1983, the number of women on the party's 25-member central committee was increased from 2 to 4. Nevertheless, the majority of Zambian women still occupy traditional roles. Customary law and practice still compete on a de facto basis in most rural areas with Zambia's Constitution and codified laws. Some customary statutes place women in subordinate or unequal status with respect to property inheritances and marriage. The Law Development Commission is seeking ways to remove such anomalies. In Zambia's traditional society, women's primary role is bearing and raising children.

ZIMBABWE

Zimbabwe has a parliamentary system based on the British Westminster model. Its Government is controlled by the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU)--led by Prime Minister Robert Mugabe--which won an outright majority (64 of 80 "African" seats) in Zimbabwe's first general elections since independence, held in July 1985. The voting was largely free and fair, but ZANU harassment and mistreatment of minority party supporters and violence associated with the activities of the ruling party was a common occurrence both before the election campaign opened and after election results were announced. Under Prime Minister Mugabe, ZANU has stated its intention to transform Zimbabwe into a one-party state, with an ideology broad enough to encompass a diversity of opinions.

Born of a 15-year civil war, Zimbabwe came to independence in 1980 with a heritage of white rule based on institutionalized racial, social, and economic discrimination against the majority black population. At the same time, independent Zimbabwe also inherited the strongest and most complete economic infrastructure in black Africa--mineral resources, a strong agricultural base, and a diversified manufacturing sector--all with significant capacity for growth and for amelioration of economic imbalances. In 1985, the economy rebounded from 3 years of drought, and Zimbabwe produced its largest corn harvest to date. The economy remains troubled by internal security problems and by the increasing instability in South Africa, its largest trading partner.

The security apparatus has three branches: the police and its Criminal Investigation Department, which are responsible for general criminal cases; the Central Intelligence Organization (CIO), which is responsible for investigating security matters; and the armed forces, which have sometimes been assigned responsibility for enforcing internal security, especially in dissident-affected areas. All three branches have violated human rights to some degree during 1985. Most of these abuses were aimed at ZAPU, the ruling party's primary opposition, and its largely Ndebele-speaking supporters.

The human rights climate in Zimbabwe in 1985 continued to be clouded by internal security problems. Political killings and disappearances increased in 1985. The present Government respects the 1980 Constitution's provisions that preserve multiracial democracy and the rights of property but maintains the legal state of emergency, proclaimed in 1960, in force. The Government has made full use of its emergency powers to override constitutional guarantees of several basic human rights, such as freedom from arbitrary arrest and the right to a prompt and fair trial. The emergency powers have also been used to detain without trial opponents of the Government, possibly as many as 3,000 in 1985, including 5 ZAPU members of Parliament and several ZAPU Bulawayo city councilors. Government efforts to control dissident activity and banditry, concentrated primarily in Ndebele-speaking areas in the southwestern part of the country, and ZANU zealots' harassment of minority party members have strained relations between the two major black parties--ZANU and ZAPU--and elicited international attention due to the substantial violations of human rights that resulted on both sides. The judicial system functions independently, frequently ruling against the State on sensitive issues and defending human rights through the rule of law.

ZIMBABWE

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political killings increased in 1985. Two main factors are responsible for this trend: government efforts to stamp out dissident activity and the tensions that emerged among various political party supporters during the preelection period. Dissident-related killings by security forces are extremely difficult to quantify. However, evidence suggests that some summary executions have occurred in reprisals against rural populations (primarily in Ndebele-speaking areas) believed to have harbored dissident bands. While it is commonly alleged that this practice is widespread, supporting evidence is difficult to obtain, and cases where security forces have been brought to trial are extremely rare. No adequate mechanism exists to ensure that the police investigate crimes that the security forces are alleged to have committed.

Dissident attacks on civilians continued during the year and on a somewhat larger scale than in 1984. The Government has estimated that dissidents killed over 100 civilians, including many local ZANU party officials. There was a clear pattern of targeting of these officials for elimination or harassment by dissidents of uncertain origin. Credible theories as to the identity of the criminals have ranged from ZAPU militants to South African-backed elements to government troops masquerading as dissidents. The Government has made no formal comment on allegations that members of its security forces have posed as dissidents. ZANU members of Parliament have repeatedly denied such charges.

Youth members of ZANU, the ruling party, have been responsible for between 150-200 deaths over the past year, according to the estimates of knowledgeable sources. Victims were, with the exception of two individuals, members of minority parties.

On several occasions, senior ZANU officials, including government officials of cabinet rank, were responsible for inciting party youth through incendiary speeches. As in 1984, reliable sources report that these officials helped to transport party youth to demonstration sites. In most instances, senior party officials have condemned party youth violence, yet their comments have often come too late to halt the violence. After results of the general elections were announced, for example, ZANU youth attacked and killed several minority party members in high-density suburbs in Harare over a period of several days before government and party officials spoke out against such violence. There is strong evidence that police have occasionally been instructed to stand aside during politically motivated violence. Only a very small proportion of the ruling party youth who were picked up by police for their alleged involvement in antiminority party violence have appeared in court.

Between 300 and 400 civilians in Matabeleland disappeared earlier this year, and there has been no word on the fate of the large majority of them. Twelve of them who later surfaced were in custody of the Central Intelligence Organization (CIO). Many well-placed sources indicate that government security forces were responsible for most of these disappearances. Other sources report that at least some of those who disappeared fled the country to avoid being abducted.

ZIMBABWE

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Informed sources report that government security forces, including the police, the military and the CIO, have been responsible for a broad range of mistreatment of suspected dissidents, suspected dissident sympathizers, and minority party members at various government installations. Types of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment which have been alleged include repeated beatings, rape, and torture involving electric shock equipment and water suffocation. Cases involving confinement in crowded cells with little or no ventilation and detention for several days in open-air cages have also been well documented.

Informed sources report that the use of torture is routine in a few government facilities, particularly during interrogation of suspected dissidents and dissident sympathizers. The bulk of these abuses reportedly take place in Stops Camp, a police holding center in Bulawayo. Information on the number of persons tortured and on the number of deaths that have resulted from torture is difficult to obtain. However, reliable sources indicate that some deaths have occurred. Sources close to the judiciary point out that persons who have suffered or witnessed torture are frequently unwilling to bring charges or testify in court for fear of reprisals against themselves or their families. Nevertheless, several court cases involving specific charges of torture by security forces are now pending.

In 1985, the Government completed its investigation of allegations of abuses during the security crackdown in Matabeleland North in 1983. So far, the Government has not made the report public as promised by the Prime Minister. While some members of the military have been brought to trial for their alleged mistreatment of civilians, government ministers have so far failed to address claims by minority party Members of Parliament that security forces are systematically mistreating civilians.

Prison conditions in Zimbabwe vary widely. In maximum security facilities, conditions are Spartan. Diet, clothing, and exercise are governed by regulation, and deprivation of necessities is not used as a disciplinary measure. Living conditions are sometimes crowded, with as many as 100 prisoners sharing a large room. Medical services are generally available. Many prisoners are required to do manual or farm labor at prison facilities.

Much less is known of conditions and treatment in CIO and police holding centers, where mistreatment and torture are alleged to have occurred. According to well-placed sources, the major CIO/police holding facility in dissident-affected Matabeleland features large, open-air cages where prisoners sleep on the ground. Sanitary facilities are minimal and, according to reliable reports, some detainees have been denied medical care. The Government has not publicly acknowledged the existence of this center despite the fact that hundreds of detainees have passed through it.

ZIMBABWE

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Emergency powers have been in effect since 1960. The Emergency Powers Act empowers the Home Affairs Minister and any police or Central Intelligence Organization official to detain any person in the interest of public order and safety. "Undesirable inhabitants" may be deported under orders of the Home Affairs Minister. A tribunal of independent jurists must review all detention orders within 30 days. Given the large number of detainees the Government has dealt with over the past year, coupled with a dearth of qualified tribunal members, there have been many delays. If the tribunal finds no merit to the case, the detainee is to be released, but the Government can override the tribunal's decision. If recommended by the tribunal, detention continues until revoked by the Minister or until the time of indictment. The tribunal must review all standing detention orders every 180 days. The Government generally has tried to adhere to these legal formalities, but reliable sources indicate that in some instances the Government has held some civilians without issuing detention orders.

A detainee is entitled to hear the reasons for his detention not later than 7 days after arrest. The detainee is also entitled to see an attorney and is entitled to compensation for unlawful arrest and/or detention. Zimbabwean law provides that an arrested person may demand in court that evidence leading to his arrest be presented. In the case of detention orders, however, the writ of detention issued by the Home Affairs Minister has been deemed sufficient to meet the requirements for evidence.

Approximately 3,000 people are believed to have been detained during the past year, mostly in Matabeleland and Midlands provinces. At any given time, the number of detainees during 1985 probably averaged between 800 and 1,200. Most of the detainees were never formally charged and were released within a few weeks without their detentions being publicized. On the other hand, other cases, such as the case involving five ZAPU members of Parliament, six black ZAPU Bulawayo city councilors, and the former mayor of Bulawayo, received considerable international attention. As of December 1985, four of the town councilors remained in detention while the former mayor was released.

Approximately 20 people were redetained in 1985 after being acquitted in court. Most of them were Ndebele-speakers who had been tried in court in Matabeleland. Judicial sources report that access to political prisoners is often difficult. Police and security officials frequently disclaim any knowledge of persons believed to be in their custody. In addition, detainees are frequently transferred from one facility to another, making it difficult to locate them and costly for lawyers to follow their cases.

Zimbabwe law forbids the use of forced labor, and forced labor is not practiced in Zimbabwe.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The constitutional guarantees of a "fair hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial court" remain in effect. Due to a shortage of legal experts, however, many cases are delayed. The Government is sensitive to this problem but so far has been unable to correct it. Most major trials are held in open court, but some trials involving sensitive security matters are held in private.

The judiciary continues to function independently of the Government and frequently rules against the State on sensitive issues. In addition, the Government has made an effort to appoint well-qualified and experienced judges, even if this has meant recruiting expatriate judges or those with links to minority parties. Several judges have emphasized their freedom from government interference in those cases over which they have presided.

Approximately 500 people were tried for "political" crimes in 1985. The bulk of them were convicted. Most had been charged under the Emergency Powers Law and Order Maintenance Act for their alleged involvement with dissident groups. No more than 10 percent of them were represented by counsel.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution protects citizens from arbitrary search or entry. Under the emergency powers regulations, however, any police officer may stop and search any person or enter any area without a warrant where he has "reasonable grounds" for believing evidence of a crime may exist. He may also seize the evidence. There have been credible allegations of arbitrary intrusion into homes and interference with privacy by government authorities. Some of the allegations relate to the conduct of the security forces in operations against dissident groups in Matabeleland, but others appear to have no explanation other than simple harassment of members of minority parties.

Reliable, well-placed sources have reported an increased number of cases where either security force personnel or youth and women from the ruling party have used coercive tactics to persuade non-ZANU members to join. Such cases were widely reported both before and after Zimbabwe's first postindependence general elections in July 1985.

Some Zimbabweans, including members of the ruling party, have alleged that their phones are tapped. In addition, many Zimbabwean citizens have repeatedly claimed that authorities have opened or confiscated mail.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Zimbabwe's Constitution guarantees freedom of expression, and the right to free speech is widely exercised. However, control of the mass media rests with the Government. Major daily newspapers are controlled by the Mass Media Trust in which the Government has a controlling interest. The Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation, which operates the nation's three radio stations and the sole television station, is wholly government-owned. While there is no evidence of systematic government meddling in the editorial policies of these media, senior media officials tend either to be strong exponents of the ruling party/government line or to practice a high degree of self-censorship. The editor of one of the nation's leading--and one of the more balanced--newspapers was dismissed from his post in 1985, apparently for failure to meet these criteria. While articles and broadcasts that question government actions do appear from time to time, they usually focus on incidents of official corruption or mismanagement. Criticism of overall policy orientations is generally avoided. Only limited press coverage is given to opposition political views or to security issues.

In Parliament, opposition viewpoints continue to be expressed freely but are only infrequently reported in full by the media. Similarly, criticism of the Government and government policies was an important feature of the legislative election campaign in 1985, but media coverage of this criticism was scanty. Press treatment of the 1985 elections demonstrates the extent to which access to Zimbabwe's mass media is largely a matter of government largesse.

Zimbabwe continues to apply the "Kadoma Declaration," which bans entry into the country of journalists based in South Africa. There is no evidence that this ban has significantly reduced the number of foreign journalists traveling to Zimbabwe.

Academic freedom is generally respected in Zimbabwe. University administrators and faculty members retain a large degree of autonomy in selection of course content and pedagogic methods. The faculty appointment board, however, is placing increasing importance on candidates' identification with the ruling party's goals and philosophy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly and association is guaranteed by the 1980 Constitution, applies to both political and nonpolitical organizations, and protects a broad spectrum of economic, professional, social, and recreational activities. In practice, however, there are obstacles to the full exercise of this right.

Police permits are required for public meetings and political rallies. All opposition parties complained repeatedly in 1985 of government abuse of this rule. Numerous opposition political meetings were banned during the year, with public safety most often cited as the reason. There were far fewer instances during the same period where the Government prohibited meetings or demonstrations of the ruling ZANU party. Moreover, in the first half of 1985, several legal opposition rallies were attacked and broken up by gangs of thugs. Evidence strongly suggests that most of these attacks were carried out by the ZANU youth wing. While the Government has disclaimed responsibility for this political violence, police on several occasions either failed to intervene or intervened only after the violence had run its course. After the July election, for example, suspected government opponents and ZAPU supporters were attacked by mobs during several days of rioting in Harare's high-density suburbs. Numerous injuries and several deaths resulted. These attacks have fueled a cycle of political violence which acts as a powerful de facto disincentive to the full exercise of the right of assembly and association.

In the past year, minority party members have found that their political associations have carried an increasing number of liabilities. Reliable sources have reported that minority party members and/or their family members have been subjected to repeated harassment by persons affiliated with the ruling party. In addition, hundreds of homes were damaged or destroyed by groups of ZANU youths. There have also been instances where minority party members have been arbitrarily denied access to a variety of public services, such as health care or public transportation, or have found employment opportunities limited.

Persons with nonpolitical associations experienced few comparable problems in 1985. While there have been reports in the past year from various private and professional organizations complaining of governmental interference in their affairs, the evidence does not suggest an organized or systematic government drive to control associative activity.

In February, the Zimbabwean Parliament approved the Government's new strong and comprehensive labor relations legislation, which was promulgated in late 1985. Among other things, the new law guarantees the right of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively. Approximately 1 million people work in the modern economy out of a population of around 8 million. Of the 1 million, about 17 percent are unionized. With Zimbabwe achieving independence only in 1980, the unions are young and still relatively weak. They are striving hard to build up their resources and the new reformist union leadership should be much more effective in this regard. The new labor act permits the formation of worker committees which could serve the purpose of shop floor stewards to industry and in mines. Realizing that these committees could usurp their power, the unions are monitoring their development very closely and intend to incorporate them into the union structure. The umbrella organization for the Zimbabwean unions is the Zimbabwe Confederation of Trade Unions (ZCTU).

Zimbabwe is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO), and the ZCTU is a member of the Organization of Africa Trade Union Unity (ATUU). Although the charter of ATUU prohibits African unions from affiliating officially with non-African unions, the ZCTU enjoys excellent relations with Western unions. By far the largest part of foreign financial and technical assistance has come from the West. The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the AFL-CIO's African Labor Center, and the Commonwealth Trade Union Congress have been the largest contributors, with additional support coming from France, The Federal Republic of Germany, and the Netherlands. The ZCTU also has contacts with trade unions in Yugoslavia and the Soviet bloc, particularly the German Democratic Republic, but Soviet bloc assistance has so far been limited to a small number of scholarships and small quantities of office equipment and building materials.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is fully respected in Zimbabwe. There is no state religion, and denominations are permitted to worship openly, pursue social and charitable activities, and maintain ties to affiliates and coreligionists abroad. Several minor infringements of this right occurred in 1985. On several occasions, church services in rural areas were disrupted by gangs associated with the ZANU youth movement, and worshipers were forced to attend a political rally. There were also several reports of threats directed against individual ministers or churches for alleged support of opposition or dissident elements. Although potentially serious, these incidents do not appear to constitute a pattern of officially organized harassment.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no formal restrictions against travel or resettlement within Zimbabwe. In an effort to manage in-country migration, however, the Government throughout 1985 forcibly removed large numbers of illegal squatters from several urban areas. There have been forced removals of squatters from certain rural areas as well.

Travel abroad is not subject to official restrictions, although individuals have on several occasions in 1985 been dissuaded from foreign travel when it was believed they might criticize the Government before foreign audiences. This practice does not appear to be widespread. A more serious practical obstacle to foreign travel is presented by currency controls that limit to about $220 the amount nationals can carry out of the country.

Government policy is to welcome the repatriation of former residents so long as they bring back the amount of hard currency they carried with them when they departed. Increasing numbers of white Zimbabweans (former Rhodesians) returned from abroad in 1985. Repatriates are expected to demonstrate that they possess assets or skills needed by the Zimbabwean economy, and most white returnees appear to meet these criteria. Regulations concerning repatriation are subject to change at short notice, however, and as the Government begins to implement the law that outlaws dual citizenship in Zimbabwe, it could undercut the upturn in white repatriation.

Precise figures are difficult to obtain on the number of black Zimbabweans in self-imposed exile in Zambia and Botswana. As a result of political violence in Matabeleland, a significant number of Ndebele-speakers are living in a United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees-sponsored camp in Botswana and in several Botswanan towns close to the border with Zimbabwe. The Government views the camp as a staging base for dissidents and "bandits" operating in Matabeleland and has urged the Botswana Government to be more active in policing the sector and to turn over suspected dissidents to Zimbabwean authorities. An improvement in the political climate in Matabeleland could result in the return to Zimbabwe of many of these exiles.

Migration of persons from Mozambique into Zimbabwe continued in 1985. An estimated 6,000 Mozambicans are now located in camps along the border. The flow is due partly to political instability in areas of Mozambique and partly to expectations of better economic opportunities in Zimbabwe. With few exceptions, the Zimbabwean Government does not consider these temporary residents to be "refugees" as defined by the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees. There is no indication at this time that the Government is considering the forcible repatriation of these temporary immigrants.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Zimbabwe is a multiparty, parliamentary-style democracy fashioned after the Westminster model. Members of Parliament represent electoral districts and are chosen by direct, universal suffrage. The Prime Minister is elected by a parliamentary majority and is responsible to Parliament. Prime Minister Mugabe has pledged to transform Zimbabwe into a one-party state--an action that, if carried out, would fundamentally alter the political landscape and possibly deprive Zimbabweans of many of the political rights they now enjoy.

Zimbabwe's first general election since independence was held in July 1985. The Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), led by Prime Minister Mugabe, enlarged its existing parliamentary majority by winning 64 of the 80 seats reserved under the 1980 Lancaster House agreement for representatives of the black electorate. ZANU support came from the Shona-speaking majority, which is concentrated in northern and central Zimbabwe. The Zimbabwe African Peoples' Union (ZAPU), led by Joshua Nkomo, captured 15 parliamentary seats in largely Ndebele-speaking areas in the south and west. A splinter party, ZANU-S, won one seat in the predominantly Ndau tribal region in the southeast.

On the white electoral roll, former Prime Minister Ian Smith's Conservative Alliance for Zimbabwe (CAZ) won 15 of the 20 available seats. The Independent Zimbabwe Group (IZG), representing whites seeking accommodation and cooperation with the current Government, won the other five seats. Voter turnout was heavy nationwide.

In postelection statements, Prime Minister Mugabe interpreted his party's victory as a mandate to proceed toward establishment of a one-party state. It is not clear, however, whether all those who voted for ZANU share Mugabe's interpretation. Mugabe also castigated whites who voted for Ian Smith's CAZ, vowing to eliminate the separate electoral roll for whites as soon as possible. Under the Constitution, however, the white roll cannot be abolished before 1987. Thereafter, abolishment of the special white roll would require a 7/10 majority vote in parliament. ZANU, with 64 parliamentary seats, is six votes short of the necessary majority.

Institution of a one-party state cannot occur legally before 1990 unless Parliament votes unanimously to amend the Constitution. Despite obvious impatience on both these issues, Prime Minister Mugabe has not set a specific timetable for attaining ZANU goals. He has indicated that he will follow constitutional guidelines on revising Zimbabwe's political system.

Section 4 Governmental Attitudes Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

The Zimbabwe Government is very sensitive to criticism of its human rights practices. It has failed to publish a report from a government-appointed commission of inquiry that was created in 1983 to investigate alleged human rights violations in Matabeleland earlier that year, despite assurances by Prime Minister Mugabe that such a report would be made public. In addition, the Government has refused to create a second commission to investigate allegations of continuing human rights abuses in that part of the country. The Government has also failed to respond to repeated queries on alleged human rights violations from nongovernmental organizations and private citizens.

ZIMBABWE

In November 1985, Amnesty International issued a report that charged that arrests and torture of suspected government opponents have increased sharply since the general elections in July. Amnesty International said it informed Prime Minister Mugabe of its findings and urged him to take immediate steps to stop torture. Zimbabwe has rejected the charges, saying that the Amnesty International report contained sweeping and false allegations. In response, the organization said it was ready to send representatives to Zimbabwe to present evidence that could help the Government investigate the allegations.

Within Zimbabwe, the most notable organization monitoring the human rights environment is the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace, which has been in existence for nearly 20 years. The Commission has been careful over the years to speak out about all violations, whether they concern whites or blacks, Government supporters or dissidents. It draws its information from both Catholic clergy and from members of the Catholic church throughout the country but also receives information from persons outside the church. The Commission is careful to work within the law.

The continuation of security problems and of human rights abuses in Matebeleland has led other church and nongovernmental organizations to focus on human rights concerns and to question the Government regarding them. The Government has failed repeatedly to address requests by private citizens and other locally based nongovernmental organizations to investigate a variety of alleged human rights problems. Freedom House rates Zimbabwe "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Government of Zimbabwe has tried to correct the substantial imbalance between black and white standards of living that existed before independence by providing greater opportunities and services to the black population. Whites comprise around 100,000 of the total population of 8,700,000, which is growing at the rate of 3.5 percent a year. Economic and financial constraints have slowed government implementation of a number of programs, notably land resettlement, but the expansion of health care and universal primary education for all Zimbabweans and the reduction in income disparities have proceeded steadily. Higher prices paid to farmers and greater extension of services have been particularly effective in boosting output and incomes of black farmers who now participate in the commercial farm sector. Gross domestic income per capita was roughly $740 in 1983. This comparatively high level for Africa reflects Zimbabwe's wide range of mineral resources, a well-developed manufacturing sector, and a strong agricultural base.

Available health care varies widely between urban and rural areas. Despite considerable emigration of skilled medical personnel since independence, hospitals and clinics in the urban areas still provide relatively good service. The rural population has less access to basic medical care, primarily because Zimbabwe still lacks sufficient personnel and infrastructure to reach all areas of a country as large as Montana. The Government's program to expand rural clinics, while it has grown rapidly, is several years short of meeting health needs in all remote areas. The average life expectancy at birth (1985) is 56.68 years, up from 54.41 at independence. The infant mortality rate in 1985 was 77 per 1,000 live births.

Zimbabwe has traditionally been one of the few countries in sub-saharan Africa able to feed itself. After 3 years of major drought Zimbabwe is again in a position to export maize. The nutritional balance is skewed in favor of urban dwellers, but barring drought, even the rural population has access to an adequate diet. It was estimated in 1977 that caloric intake as a percentage of requirements was 84 percent for the nation as a whole; no more recent figures are available. There were no substantiated reports of deaths as a result of drought relief shortages.

The adult literacy rate was 69 percent in 1980 (male 77 percent, female 63 percent) and has probably increased since then due to government efforts to expand education. The primary school enrollment ratio in 1983 was 149 percent--154 male and 146 female. (These figures exceed 100 percent due to overage children attending primary school.)

The 1985 labor relations legislation guarantees a 24-hour rest period sometime during the workweek. The workweek can range up to 60 hours. The new law also calls for strict enforcement of acceptable standards of health and safety. By Zimbabwe law, the working age for the formalized economy is 18, but it is possible to begin an apprenticeship at age 16.

The law also codifies the Government's right to set minimum wage standards. However, the Government's constant adjustments of minimum wage levels have become a bone of contention with both the unions and the business/farming community. Since a large share of unionized workers are paid the minimum wage, the unions complained that the Government usurped their main bargaining power by its continual adjustments of the minimum wage. Business and farming interests, on the other hand, feared that the Government's recent decision--now partly overturned--to double the minimum wage for agro-industrial and plantation workers (e.g., in the sugar, citrus, tea, coffee, timber, and poultry industries) threatened 40,000 jobs, and could have resulted in lost export revenues and some liquidations of businesses.

Despite efforts to clarify and modernize the situation, the legal status of women in Zimbabwean society remains ambiguous. In 1980, the Government passed the Legal Age of Majority Act which gave all women over the age of 18 equal legal rights, including the right to arrange their own marriages and to own property apart from their husbands. On the other hand, the system of "Lobola," or bride price, is still the social norm, and the reality of equal rights remains elusive. A recent ruling by the Supreme Court found that fathers may no longer sue for "seduction damages" from a male suitor who has impregnated a daughter over the age of 18; the woman herself may sue, however. The widespread public reaction against this ruling is indicative of the power of traditional norms in a society whose Government seeks greater equality of the sexes.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

A member of the British Commonwealth, Antigua and Barbuda celebrated its fourth anniversary of independence from the United Kingdom on November 1, 1985. Respect for human rights in Antigua and Barbuda is grounded in its domestic laws and reinforced by the democratic political values and traditions that evolved before independence and which have continued developing since. Its population supports these values and expresses dissent openly, aided by a free press. The Constitution provides for a parliamentary system of government based on majority rule, and requires general elections at least every 5 years.

Security forces consist of a police force and the Antigua Defense Force, an 80-man infantry unit. The police are organized, trained, and managed according to British law enforcement practices. These forces have a good reputation for respecting human rights in the performance of their law enforcement duties.

Poverty remains widespread despite active development efforts centered on increasing investment. Although the State holds equity in some enterprises, the private sector is strong and individuals are free to pursue private interests and hold private property. Some political opponents of Prime Minister Vere C. Bird, Sr., however, complain that their businesses have suffered from government retaliation for their political activities.

The nation's human rights record continued to be good in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No instances of political killing were reported in 1985.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances, extralegal detentions or politically motivated abductions were reported in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and cruel or inhuman treatment of prisoners or detainees. These prohibitions are respected in practice. Prison conditions are adequate, and the authorities permit regular visits by a prisoner's family and attorney as well as by members of the clergy.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and detention are prohibited by the Constitution and do not occur in practice. Criminal defendants are guaranteed the right of habeas corpus, and detainees must be brought before a court within 48 hours of arrest or detention. No cases of involuntary exile have been reported.

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

The Constitution prohibits forced or compulsory labor, and such practices are not known to take place in Antigua and Barbuda.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Criminal defendants are guaranteed a fair, open, and public trial. The independent judiciary is widely respected for its fairness and professionalism. The highly regarded regional West Indies Court of Appeal serves Antigua and Barbuda. The Government guarantees legal assistance at its expense to persons without means to retain a private attorney.

There are no political prisoners in Antigua and Barbuda.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Arbitrary police or government actions against a person's home, family, or privacy have not been reported. The police must obtain a warrant before searching private premises. Leftist political groups have charged that the Government tampers with their mail, but these allegations have neither been supported with evidence nor brought to court.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, the press, and other forms of communication. The electronic media--the only source of daily local news--are dominated by the Government; ABS radio and ABS-TV are state-owned, and the only privately owned radio station is controlled by the Prime Minister's family. Opposition politicians have complained that they have almost no access to air time to present their positions. A different situation exists in the nation's print media. Weekly newspapers representing the opposition publish a variety of opinions and are free to criticize the Government. Religious organizations also publish their own newspapers.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution assures the right of peaceful assembly. Peaceful public meetings and organized demonstrations are held without police interference.

Less than a majority of Antigua and Barbuda's workers belong to unions, but labor organizations are free to organize and bargain collectively. The right to strike can be limited if the Court of Industrial Relations is involved in a given dispute. Unions are free to affiliate with international labor organizations.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is free exercise of religious beliefs. The population is overwhelmingly Protestant, but adherents of other religious denominations proselytize openly without stigma or government interference.

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The movement of citizens within the country is not restricted by law or practice. Travel outside the country is generally unrestricted, although the Government has confiscated the passports of a few political opponents to ensure their attendance at court proceedings. Opponents claim these court cases to be politically motivated, but the judiciary enjoys a reputation for independence and respect for the law.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Antigua and Barbuda has a multiparty political system which accommodates widely divergent views. All citizens 18 years of age and older may register and vote. Individual parties conduct voter registration drives free from government interference. The Government is obligated by law to hold voter registration during a fixed period each year.

Prime Minister Bird's Antigua Labor Party won an overwhelming victory in the April 1984 elections, winning every constituency in Antigua. In Barbuda, an independent won the sole seat and became the Government's only parliamentary opposition. Despite the lopsided ALP victory, the elections were considered to be fair and open.

One of Prime Minister Bird's sons is Minister of External Affairs, Economic Development, Tourism, and Energy; another is Minister of Public Utilities and Communications. The opposition energetically attacks the Bird Government, particularly on the issue of alleged government corruption. On the smaller island of Barbuda, which has less than 2 percent of the country's total population, separatist sentiments remain a political problem for the Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Internationally recognized human rights organizations have not expressed particular interest in Antigua and Barbuda; there were no requests for investigations or inquiries into alleged violations in 1985. The Government is sensitive to human rights issues and has condemned abuses elsewhere.

Amnesty International did not mention Antigua and Barbuda in its 1985 report. Freedom House describes the country as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The country's population of approximately 81,000 is growing at the rate of 2.6 percent annually. Tourism dominates the economy of Antigua and Barbuda; half of the country's gross domestic product (GDP) is derived directly or indirectly from tourism. Per capita GDP was estimated at $1,537 in 1982. Following 2 years of low growth, the economy picked up dramatically owing to increases in tourist arrivals.

Manufacturing accounts for another 10 percent of GDP, but higher tariffs and new nontariff barriers erected by other Caribbean Community members have limited growth in this sector. Factory closures and bankruptcies have resulted in increased unemployment and government budgetary shortfalls, as tax revenues from manufacturing dry up. Efforts to attract foreign investors continue, but the primary problem remains the identification of potential foreign markets for domestically manufactured goods.

The decline of agriculture after 1967, when Antigua and Barbuda became semiautonomous, caused the countryside to lose population to the city. With agriculture now accounting for about 7 percent of GDP, the Government is promoting a "back to the land" movement, providing financial incentives to young men and women willing to work in the agricultural sector.

The Government has continued its capital development program for education and health. Adult literacy approaches 90 percent, and enrollment of eligible children in primary schools is 85 percent. The Government has earmarked funds to upgrade secondary and higher education. Infant mortality has dropped to 22.4 per 1,000 live births.

The legal minimum working age is 13, a law which is respected. The workweek is 40 hours in 5 days, and workers are guaranteed a minimum of 3 weeks annual leave. There are no occupational health and safety laws or regulations. The minimum wage established by law is arguably less than that on which a person can be reasonably expected to live.

The role of women in society is not restricted by law, but tradition limits women to home and family, particularly in rural areas. As elsewhere in the region, these traditional roles are changing. The Government has begun programs to provide enhanced educational opportunities for both sexes as well as family planning, which many expect to lead to greater participation by women in Antigua and Barbuda's public, social, and political life.

Two female senators sit in Parliament, and are the highest ranking female political figures in the country. The Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Health and the Chief Establishment Officer are both women. A woman also heads the Department of Tourism. There is a "Woman's Desk" in the Government to monitor compliance with the laws and statutes regarding women and to safeguard their legal rights. Ninety percent of the Assistant Permanent Secretaries in the Government are women, as are 6 out of 10 personnel in the Civil Service. Women receive equal pay for equal work by law.

ARGENTINA

Argentina is a functioning constitutional democracy with an independent bicameral legislature and an autonomous judiciary. Elections were held in 1985 for one-half of the seats in the lower house and for some seats in most provincial legislatures and many city councils. Political debate was free and open, all parties had access to the media, and the level of public participation in discussing the issues of the day was high. Violent incidents by unknown assailants, generally believed to be nongovernmental, occurred, resulting in one death--the first caused by terrorism since the return to democracy in December 1983. Most of the incidents appeared to be related to political or labor activities.

The military and police operate under civilian political control, with charges of abuses reviewed by the courts. Criticism of the Government was tolerated and opposition viewpoints were freely expressed. An autonomous judiciary and a functioning democratic political system work to insure respect for human rights. Trade union freedom was greater than at any time during the past decade and strikes occurred with some frequency, including two national strikes. Respect for individual rights was strong. Human rights groups continued to demand a complete accounting for past disappearances and punishment for those responsible. For the first time in Argentina's history, senior military officers, who once held de facto governing power, were tried and convicted for human rights violations, including homicide and torture. Five of the 9 defendants were convicted and given sentences that ranged from 54 months to life imprisonment; the other 4 were acquitted. Trials of terrorists were also held during 1985 with 3 individuals convicted and sentenced to 25, 22, and 10 years in prison.

Argentina, which continued to enjoy a relatively good standard of living in 1985, was beset by a number of severe economic problems including a high rate of inflation and a large foreign debt. In June, the Government took steps to address those problems, including an innovative "shock program" that quickly reduced inflation from over 30 percent a month to between 2 and 4 percent a month.

In 1985, Argentina continued to consolidate the dramatic improvements in human rights stemming from the successful 1983 transition from a military government to a freely elected civilian government. An independent press offered views covering the political spectrum.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no outstanding charge by human rights groups of any death occurring during 1985 that was politically motivated or instigated by the Government. One person was killed by a terrorist bombing in October.

b. Disappearance

There were no known abductions, secret arrests, or disappearances linked to or condoned by the Government during

ARGENTINA

1985. A significant number of kidnappings occurred, most of them believed to be by common criminals to extort money. Not all were reported to the authorities and many ended with the release of the victim without identification of the perpetrators, although some criminals were apprehended and others were killed in raids.

Accounting for the large number of persons who disappeared between 1973 and 1980 and punishing those responsible continued to be major issues in 1985. The courts also continued to investigate cases of unmarked graves and some exhumed corpses were identified as persons who had disappeared. Human rights groups documented several cases of children of parents who had disappeared being raised by adoptive parents, some of whom were former security personnel. In a few cases, children were reunited with their parents or other relatives.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits the use of torture. President Alfonsín signed into law in January 1985 a criminal code reform that punishes torture with penalties similar to those applied for homicide. Although some human rights groups maintain that police beatings of criminals continued after January, judges have applied the new provisions of the code. In April, a judge ordered the arrest of four members of the Buenos Aires provincial police force for allegedly torturing (by beating them severely) four prisoners in January. The policemen were later acquitted. According to officials, the only other formal accusation was against members of the Santa Fe police force and penitentiary service for allegedly beating 17 prisoners in the Coronada model correctional institute in August after the prisoners refused to return to their cells. The Interior Ministry's undersecretariat for human rights investigated and passed the accusation to the Santa Fe province penal judge for investigation. The undersecretariat also issued a press release stating that it had confirmed that 17 prisoners had serious bruises and that 1 had tried to commit suicide after the alleged beatings. The investigation is still in progress as are investigations into the alleged torture of prisoners during the years of military rule (1976-1983).

Despite improved prison conditions since the return of democracy in 1983, there were protests, hunger strikes, and riots in a few prisons during 1985 allegedly resulting from violent treatment of prisoners during cell-block searches, disrespectful treatment of visiting family members, and prisoners' demands for better food and living conditions and a reduction in their sentences. At least one prisoner committed suicide and another died during the riots. In July several human rights activists condemned prison conditions. Government officials said they were working to improve those conditions. Argentine prisons suffer from overcrowding, but are generally sanitary.

Some provinces began giving their police mandatory human rights courses, which included study of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and stressed that torture would not be tolerated.

ARGENTINA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Argentina has a well-developed legal code containing provisions such as habeas corpus and controls on police arrest and investigatory powers. In 1984, Congress passed a law that strengthened habeas corpus rights. The Argentine penal code, however, gives the police and courts authority to detain persons incommunicado for up to eight days during investigations. Even in the case of minor offenses, holding of suspects incommunicado for a few days is common. The Constitution also confers power on the Executive Branch to detain suspects during a State of Siege, such as was declared on October 25 by President Alfonsín for a planned 60 days after a significant increase in terrorist bombings occurred. The State of Siege was lifted on December 9.

Forced or compulsory labor is forbidden.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Argentine judiciary functioned normally in 1985. It was generally recognized as fair, reasonably independent, and effective. The penal code provides for public trials and all rulings by lower courts, civilian and military, may be appealed to the Supreme Court. The major problems were the overcrowding of court dockets (e.g., the Supreme Court had a backlog of over 6,000 cases in late 1985), time-consuming written procedures, lack of personnel and administrative infrastructure, and low salaries (as in the rest of the public sector). As in most civil law countries, there is no trial by jury; verdicts are rendered by professional judges. The police have legal authority to judge misdemeanor cases, which are often settled by a senior police official instead of by a judge. The position of public defender exists but in 1985 public defenders had caseloads far in excess of what they could handle competently, making it impossible to provide an adequate defense in all the cases assigned to them. The right to bail is provided by law and is observed in practice.

The first civil trial in Argentina of military officers who once held de facto governing power began in April against nine former military commanders and junta members charged with criminal responsibility for human rights violations committed during the so-called "dirty war against subversion" of the mid-1970s, including homicide, torture, and illegal imprisonment. Defended by 22 lawyers, they were tried by a six-judge federal appellate court after the Supreme Court of the Armed Forces failed to complete its trial by the deadline set for it in 1984. The trial demonstrated a functioning judiciary able to handle the most controversial trial in the history of Argentina. The trial ended in December; 5 of the 9 defendants were found guilty and received sentences that ranged from 54 months to life imprisonment. Both the acquittals and the convictions will probably be appealed to the Supreme Court. In 1985 there were also trials of alleged terrorists, several of whom were convicted. These included the former governor of Córdoba province, Ricardo Obregon Cano, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison for illegal association with the Montoneros. Two members of the People's Revolutionary Army were sentenced to 25 and 22 years in prison for the 1974 murder of a judge. The trial of Mario Firmenich, a leader of the Montoneros, had not concluded by the end of the year.

ARGENTINA

At the beginning of 1985, some Argentine human rights groups claimed there were still 15 political prisoners in jail. The Government argued they were common criminals convicted of crimes by either civil or military courts and that the Government could not summarily overturn those verdicts. Instead, the Government suggested that the prisoners request a judicial review of their cases. Some prisoners did and one was released during 1985. By the end of the year, 14 alleged political prisoners, who had been convicted of violent crimes, remained in jail.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

There were few reported cases of arbitrary intrusion by the State into the private life of individuals during 1985. Some monitoring of telephones was reported, however, and the owners of the newspaper Nuevo Diario publicly stated they had proof that the state information secretariat was tapping telephone conversations of the newspaper. Congressmen from both the governing party and the opposition made similar claims. Hidden microphones were found in the offices of opposition national senators; the Government denied it had anything to do with the microphones. In July, the executive branch submitted a bill to Congress that would provide penalties for arbitrary interference with personal privacy, home, or correspondence. When Congress adjourned on September 30, the bill had not yet been acted on.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There were very few restrictions on freedom of speech and press during 1985. Criticism of the Government is tolerated and opposition viewpoints are freely expressed. An independent press offers views that cover the entire political spectrum. Argentine press freedom is greater than it has been in many years.

Many radio and television stations owned by the Government were criticized publicly during the second half of 1985 for being biased in favor of the Government, for hiring government supporters, and for operating at large losses requiring government subsidies. The newspaper editors' association denounced an alleged campaign of intimidation to reduce criticism of the Government; officials denied the charge. Also, the Association of Argentine newspaper owners publicly criticized the inclusion of 2 journalists among the 12 men arrested in October during the State of Siege and claimed that the arrests were motivated by the journalists' critical positions toward the Government. There were also several violent attacks, including bombings, against government-owned radio and television stations by unidentified terrorists. There were no injuries, although damage was extensive.

Academic freedom was respected. There were no reports of surveillance of political meetings on campuses or censorship of books. Enrollment in universities was higher in 1985 than in 1984, partly because of a new open-admission system.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All groups and political parties, except subversive organizations previously outlawed for espousing violence, have been free to organize and assemble since August 1982. Major rallies were held by political parties, including the Communist Party, during 1985.

The labor movement is a major independent political and economic force. About one-third of the work force is unionized. The previous military regimes suspended various laws governing labor relations and systematically blocked many trade union rights. Recasting the codes to restore normal ground rules for industrial relations and trade union activities was still proceeding in 1985. For example, legislation covering collective bargaining, refinements to laws dealing with trade union structure and function, and the disposition of social welfare organizations formerly associated with unions had not been passed by Congress when it adjourned on September 30.

Nevertheless, organized labor resumed most of its normal activities. In 1984 and 1985, the vast majority of unions held their first free elections since 1976. Although there was still no formal collective bargaining, numerous unions and the national labor organization, the General Confederation of Workers (CGT), were actively engaged in consultations with employers and the Government on issues affecting labor and the economy of the nation as a whole. Unions have the right to strike. Many exercised this right in support of their demands and the CGT led two one-day general strikes in 1985. On November 20, the Government issued a decree permitting collective bargaining on general working conditions, but excluding wages. The CGT publicly criticized the decree, claiming that it violated the Constitution and International Labor Organization accords.

Unions are free to maintain ties with international labor bodies and are active in the international trade union movement.

c. Freedom of Religion

Argentina's Constitution states that everyone has the right to practice his religion, but it also states that the Federal Government supports Roman Catholicism. Government financial support is given to the Roman Catholic Church. The Constitution requires the President and Vice President to be Catholics. Other religions must register with the Government to obtain the legal recognition required to operate freely; such recognition is provided with minimal difficulty. Missionaries from any religion are permitted to enter Argentina and to proselytize. The non-Catholic population is growing.

The Jehovah's Witnesses are recognized by the Government, but about 100 Witnesses, all Argentines, have been sentenced to serve 3-1/2 years of civilian service at military installations for their refusal to accept compulsory military service. Conditions are not onerous and furloughs are given for as long as a month at a time. Civil judges ruled that the punishment was excessive and in 15 to 20 individual cases ordered Witnesses released. The executive branch submitted draft legislation to the Congress in December 1984 that would permit alternative service for conscientious objectors opposed to military service on moral or religious grounds. Although the Congress did not pass the legislation in 1985, the executive branch began exempting baptized Witnesses from military service during the year.

ARGENTINA

Argentina's Jewish community (250,000) practices its religion without restraint, although occasional anti-Semitic incidents continue to occur. In the preelectoral period of September and October, there was an increase in anti-semitic graffiti, in anonymous threats against Jewish leaders and schools, and in violence (one Jewish school was bombed at midnight, producing no injuries but causing extensive damage, and a grenade was found outside another Jewish school). In the current crime wave, the fact that several of those kidnapped for ransom were Jewish raised concern, but there is no substantial evidence of racial or religious motivation. The Government publicly condemned religious prejudice and assigned police to guard the schools. The Government also submitted proposed legislation to Congress in September 1984 that would provide penalties for racial, religious, and other forms of discrimination. The lower house passed the bill in June but the Senate had not by the time Congress adjourned on September 30.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal and foreign travel and emigration are basically unrestricted. Former exiles continued to return to Argentina during 1985, some as a result of the Government's policy of encouraging such Argentines to return, and some with financial assistance from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Non-Argentine refugees in Argentina are not forced to return to countries from which they fled or in which they fear persecution. Moreover, an amnesty covering the period between November 1984 and March 1985 allowed all illegal immigrants in the country at the time to apply for resident status. Nearly 150,000 people took advantage of that amnesty. In October, however, the Government announced that retroactive to August 8, permanent resident visas would be issued only to people with at least $30,000 to invest in Argentina. The Government said the measure would only be temporary until Argentina recovers economically and pointed to the lack of jobs, hospitals, housing, and food as reasons for the decision. The new requirement has many exceptions, such as clerics, scientists, professors, writers, technicians, businessmen, artists, athletes, and cultural or political personalities who are working for solvent entities or are considered valuable to the national interest, as well as their parents, children, and spouses.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In October 1983, the President, Vice President, two Senators, all 254 Deputies of the Lower House of the Legislature, provincial governors and legislators, and mayors and municipal councils were elected directly in free and democratic elections. Another 44 national senators were elected by provincial legislatures in November 1983. Elections for one-half the national deputies in the lower house and for part of the members of most provincial legislatures and many city councils were held in November 1985.

Thirteen political parties covering the political spectrum, including the Communist Party, qualified as national parties and presented candidates in 1983 and again in 1985. Other parties qualified in individual provinces. There is a large, politically important, active opposition that operates openly. Women and minorities have full political rights and are not excluded from political life.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Argentina cooperates with both the U.N. Human Rights Commission and the Organization of American States' Inter-American Human Rights Commission. The Government signed and ratified the American Convention on Human Rights in 1984. Although the lower house approved the U.N. Convention on Civil and Political Rights and the U.N. Convention on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights in February 1984, the Senate was still studying the two U.N. Conventions when it adjourned for 1985. The civilian Government also reversed its military predecessor's position on the draft U.N. Convention on Torture and supported the draft in 1984, the first time an Argentine government had done so. The new Argentine position helped lead to the subsequent approval of the draft in December 1984 by the UN General Assembly. In February 1985, Argentina was one of the first signatories of the new Convention. In October, the Government announced it had approved the International Convention on the Repression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, which was established by the U.N. General Assembly in 1973.

Eleven human rights organizations operated freely in 1985, despite occasional threats and some harassment from unidentified sources. One human rights activist was shot at by unknown assailants and the apartment building of two others was bombed. Human rights groups continued to bring to court cases related to people who disappeared.

Amnesty International's 1985 report, covering 1984, noted that the number of remaining prisoners convicted of politically motivated offenses decreased throughout 1984, with the release of over 130 prisoners. Freedom House rated Argentina "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Argentina has a population of 30.7 million with a growth rate of 1.5 percent, a relatively good standard of living, and a per capita gross national product of $2070 as reported in 1983.

Inflation was very high during the first half of 1985, before implementation of an imaginative economic program which kept inflation in the second half at a 10-year low. Investment remained low throughout 1985. Unemployment rose from 3.6 percent in October 1984 to 6.3 percent in April 1985. Real wages decreased for all income groups and in all sectors in 1985.

In the largely middle-class Argentine society, 80 percent of the population lives in urban areas and at least 65 percent own their homes. Most have access to medical facilities. The average Argentine enjoys a healthy, high-protein diet that provided 124.7 percent of the daily caloric requirement in 1977. Fifty-seven percent of the population had access to safe water in 1980. In 1985, life expectancy at birth was 70.2 years and the infant mortality rate was 34.1 per 1,000 live births.

ARGENTINA

The Government's national nutritional program was expanded in 1985 and provided a major dietary supplement for about 1.5 million of the poorest Argentines, especially in the few pockets of abject poverty. The Government announced plans to reduce the housing shortage and a 5 percent payroll tax subsidizes low-income housing.

The adult literacy rate in 1970 was 93.5 percent for males and 91.7 percent for females. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio was 123.5 percent in 1982 (male: 123.9; female: 123.1).

Argentina offers comprehensive protection of workers' rights both in law and in practice. The maximum workday is 8 hours. The maximum workweek is 48 hours. Premiums must be paid for work beyond those limits. Children under 14 years of age may not work except in the family. Minors between 14 and 15 may work but not more than 6 hours a day or 36 hours a week. The same law applies to minors between 16 and 18, although competent authority may make an exception for this age group. Rules governing vacations, minimum wages, and occupational health and safety compare favorably with those existing in industrial nations of the West and are followed in practice.

Women in Argentina are active in government, the professions, politics, and private voluntary organizations, but they have to contend with a variety of discriminatory mechanisms that are rooted in cultural, economic, religious, and social structures. There is no official policy of discrimination against them. In its first year in office, the Alfonsín administration adopted a position against discrimination and submitted draft legislation to Congress in September 1984 that would ban sex discrimination. That bill was approved by the lower House in June 1985 but the Senate was still studying it when Congress adjourned on September 30. Congress did, however, ratify the U.N. Convention for the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women. The Health and Social Action Ministry began a campaign to publicize the rights of women in Argentine society.

There is no divorce but family legislation was liberalized in September 1985 when Congress passed legislation submitted by the executive branch which gave both parents legal authority over their children (thereby allowing women to travel abroad with their minor children without the express consent of their husbands), assumed that the decisions of one parent had the consent of the other unless expressly challenged in court, and gave equality before the law to children born in and out of wedlock.

Women participate freely in politics in Argentina. There were scores of women candidates in the 1985 elections and women won 4 of the 127 seats in the lower house that were up for election. About 20 percent of Argentina's full professors and about 50 percent of the assistant professors are women. One private university has a woman rector. Almost 50 percent of the medical and law school graduates in 1985 were women.

THE BAHAMAS

The Bahamas is a multiparty, parliamentary democracy with regular national elections. As a Commonwealth country, its political and legal traditions are similar to those of Great Britain, with emphasis on the rights of individuals. The Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) has governed since 1967 under the same leader, Sir Lynden Pindling.

The country has a strong tradition of human rights observance. The Constitution provides for the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms without discrimination by reason of race, origin, political opinions, color, creed, or sex, and its provisions are carried out in practice. However, treatment of illegal Haitian migrants has sometimes led to concern for their safety and well-being.

The police and small defense force are generally well regarded by the populace, but, like other elements of the society, have experienced some drug-related corruption. Vigorous parliamentary and public debate occurred in 1985 concerning charges of high-level corruption examined in a year-long Commission of Inquiry which completed its work in December 1984. Violent crime, drug trafficking, and narcotics addiction are serious societal problems.

The country's human rights record remained good during 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no killings for political motives during 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no cases of abduction, secret arrests, or clandestine detention.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by the Constitution. American citizens as well as Bahamians, however, have on occasion reported instances of police brutality. Redress for official abuse is possible through the courts but is rarely sought. In a public address at the end of 1984, the Chief Justice of the Bahamas Supreme Court stated that "the area of police questioning of suspects (leading to confessions). . . remains disturbingly unsatisfactory." Another Supreme Court Justice in February 1985, while presiding over a criminal case in which both defendants alleged being beaten by police while in custody, stated in court that he was not at all satisfied that the police distinguished themselves in the way in which their investigations were conducted. He recommended that the police consult a legal advisor before they begin investigations and stated that the police need be on guard that their investigative techniques "do not lead to injustice."

The downtown Nassau jail is crowded and unsanitary, with food barely adequate; conditions at the Fox Hill Prison are austere and overcrowded but somewhat better. The Freeport central lockup is unsanitary.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile.

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment and requires that persons be charged without undue delay. This is observed in practice. Habeas corpus is respected, charges must be brought within 48 hours of arrest, and those arrested are allowed access to lawyers of their own choosing. The Constitution specifically prohibits forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial.

An independent judiciary conducts fair and public trials. The Constitution entitles defendants to counsel, and access to defendants is freely permitted. Legal representation at public expense is only provided in capital cases. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

The Government does not interfere in the private lives of its citizens. The sanctity of the home is safeguarded both by law and tradition and is normally respected in practice. The Constitution permits searches to occur only with a court-issued warrant. Nevertheless, the former Deputy Prime Minister told the Parliament on June 3, 1985 that he had proof his telephone had been tapped without the authorization of either the Attorney General or the Minister responsible for the state-run telephone company.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press exist in the Bahamas. There are three privately-owned daily newspapers, one government-owned radio station, and one government-owned television station. There are several news weeklies, some of which are affiliated with political parties, including one affiliated with the leftist Vanguard Party. There is no political censorship or intimidation of journalists.

Vigorous and spirited parliamentary and public debate followed a December 1984 report of the Commission of Inquiry investigation into drug-related corruption in the country. Sizable public rallies and demonstrations took place largely without incident. The press reported the debates and demonstrations without hindrance.

The Speaker of the House, however, has on occasion directly ordered the press not to report on specific matters which had transpired at Parliament which he, for various reasons, expunged from the official House records. The press has acquiesced to these orders. On one occasion in November, however, after a Nassau daily inadvertently published an expunged remark made by an opposition member of Parliament, the Speaker summarily revoked the accreditation of the reporter who had written the news article.

THE BAHAMAS

While the press is free, opposing points of view in the Bahamas are not afforded accurate and fair radio/TV treatment. In September 1985, the Broadcasting Corporation (ZNS) Chairman, a Member of Parliament from the ruling party, rationalized the ZNS' progovernment slant by stating publicly that while the ZNS should cover "the other side of the argument fairly and accurately," the Government "is the Government and almost daily by definition will make news." Under legislation predating both independence in 1973 and majority rule in 1967, the ZNS permits paid political broadcasts only once a year and then only for 15 minutes.

In late July 1985, when the opposition was able to purchase air time, its paid broadcast of its youth organization's annual convention was interrupted on several occasions with the insertion of music during at least two of the speeches. The ZNS proGovernment leanings and restrictions on paid political pronouncements place a significant limitation on opposition political groups in getting their views to the general public. This especially inhibits the opposition from reaching the nearly one-third of the population living in the family islands, who are heavily dependent on the ZNS for news (the three major daily newspapers do not generally reach the family islands).

Following the September 1983 broadcast by NBC alleging drug-related corruption by high-level government officials, NBC affiliates have experienced some difficulties in operating in the country.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association.

The Constitution protects the right to assemble freely and associate with others and specifically mentions political parties and trade unions.

Labor unions are independent of the Government and are free to organize, assemble, bargain, and strike. Many unions are affiliated with counterparts in other countries and are represented in the International Labor Organization (ILO). The Secretary General of the Trade Union Congress (TUC), the umbrella organization encompassing most major trade unions, also serves as President of the regional Caribbean Congress of Labor. Following a complaint by the TUC and the Bahamas Union of Teachers, the ILO's Freedom of Association Committee in 1985 criticized the Government for its 1983 action in the "compulsory retirement" of the teachers' union president from his position as a high school principal for reasons the ILO committee concluded were at least partially based on his trade union activities. The Committee also deplored the fact that the Government, despite several requests, made no reply to the allegations.

Prominent labor leaders are vocal in criticizing current labor law. The TUC has frequently called on the Government to ratify many ILO conventions, in particular numbers 87, 98, and 140 relating to the right to join a union of his/her choosing, the right to organize in the work place, and paid educational leave.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion, freedom of conscience is protected, and discrimination on the basis of creed is prohibited. Some members of the small Rastafarian cult believe they are singled out for persecution by the police; the police deny the allegations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There exists freedom of movement within and outside the country. However, the legal status of an estimated 20,000-40,000 Haitians now residing in the Bahamas is precarious. In early September 1985, a treaty was signed between the Bahamas and Haiti legalizing the status under specified, restricted conditions of undocumented Haitian immigrants who arrived prior to December 31, 1980. All others are to be repatriated in an orderly and humane manner. A 2 month amnesty period was declared for voluntary repatriation without prosecution. There has been criticism voiced in the past on the handling of previous forced repatriations of large numbers of illegal Haitians. The health and safety of Haitian migrants aboard unseaworthy or shipwrecked vessels in the Bahamas were imperiled on several occasions in 1985 by official Bahamian policy and actions designed to expedite their departure from Bahamian territory. In August 1985, over 130 Haitians were stranded on uninhabited Flamingo Cay when their boat ran aground. The Royal Bahamian Defense Force (RBDF) attempted to tow the vessel with the Haitians aboard back to sea but abandoned its effort when it became clear the Haitian vessel would sink before it reached international waters. The Haitians remained on inhospitable Flamingo Cay for 2 weeks until rescued by the U.S. Coast Guard.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

The Bahamas is a constitutional democracy governed by a freely elected Prime Minister and Parliament, with a resident Governor General under the British Commonwealth system. The political process is open to all elements of the society. There are two principal political parties, the governing Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) and the opposition Free National Movement (FNM). The PLP led the country for five years of internal self-government before independence in 1973 and has held power without interruption since then. It currently holds 32 of the 43 seats in Parliament. The FNM, a more conservative party, holds the other 11 seats. The radical leftist party, the Vanguard, has no seats.

The last general election was in 1982; new elections need not take place before 1987 but can be called sooner.

The PLP has been charged with using its tenure in office to strengthen its position through politically motivated hiring and firing of officials and through selective issuance of such things as housing grants, scholarships, and government contracts. These practices are drawing increasing criticism from opposition figures as well as PLP dissidents. As an example of such practices, in January 1985 the Government attempted to block the reappointment of two medical doctors to the Bahamas Medical Council for what appeared to be political reasons; the Medical Association used its two independent appointments to reappoint the two doctors to the Council.

THE BAHAMAS

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There have been no requests from international organizations to investigate human rights conditions in the Bahamas. The Government has not generally been active in human rights affairs, but it has strongly criticized human rights violations in South Africa. Amnesty International did not mention the Bahamas in 1985. Freedom House rated the country "free" but noted that government power is partly maintained "by discrimination in favor of supporters and control over the broadcast media."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of the Bahamas is estimated to be 231,000, with a growth rate of 1.8 percent. The country is made up of some 700 islands or cays; only 10 have populations of any size. Of these, two islands, New Providence (Nassau) and Grand Bahama, contain over 75 percent of the population. Most economic and cultural activities take place on these two islands.

The Government has sought to develop the other, "family" islands to curb the movement by young people to the two major centers of activity. Per capita gross national product was estimated at $5,552 for 1984. The rate of inflation for 1984 was 4.6 percent, while the overall unemployment figure for 1979 was 19.6 percent (for those between 14 and 19 it is estimated at 42.1 percent, and for those between 20 and 24) 22.7 percent. The Government is continuing to attempt to reduce unemployment by creating new jobs in tourism through both private and public investment.

The Bahamas has a good record of nondiscrimination on sexual, racial, and religious grounds. Notwithstanding the transfer of political power from the colonial era's white elite to a black majority (80 percent) in the 1960's, white Bahamians retain a visible presence in the country, hold high-level civil service and political posts, and are represented in Parliament. Life expectancy at birth is 69.58 years, while infant mortality is 20.60 per 1,000 births. The Bahamas has 948 hospital beds, and Ministry of Health doctors make regular trips to the outer islands. 1978 statistics indicate that 80 percent of the total population had access to safe water (urban 90 percent, rural 70 percent). Calorie supply as a percent of requirements was 84.63 in 1977.

In education, the Government is continuing to place emphasis on technical and vocational training. Literacy rates have remained about 93 percent over the past decade, but the 1982 primary school enrollment ratio fell to 88.22 percent. There has been a weakening of education in the public school system as result of shortages of teachers, equipment, and supplies as well as the physical deterioration of many schools. According to the Minister of Education, the results of the National Grade Level Assessment Tests taken in May and June 1985 indicate "serious deficiencies" in the 163 public and 62 private schools.

Although there is no minimum wage law in the Bahamas, wages offered are generally considered to provide for decent living conditions. The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1970 states that employers cannot permit their employees to work more than 48 hours per week; the act also provides for a number of other worker benefits. It does not, however, address the question of child labor, but child labor is effectively discouraged by the requirement of compulsory education until the age of 14.

Although there is no specific legislation dealing with worker safety, the office of the Director of Labor regularly checks all work places for lighting, safety, ventilation, maching protective guards, etc. Employers cooperate with these inspections and in implementing safety recommendations made from them.

With a few minor exceptions women enjoy equal rights in both law and practice. Women participate prominently in all levels of Government and business, and are well represented in professional and private sectors. Women serve as Permanent Secretaries in ministries (the highest civil service position), in the legislative branch in elected and appointed capacities, and in the judicial branch. The Constitution does, however, make several distinctions between males and females regarding citizenship and the acquisition of permanent resident status. For example, female Bahamians can not bestow citizenship upon their spouses, but male Bahamians can.

Drug abuse is a growing problem, especially among the younger generation affected by high unemployment. Primarily the result of spill-over from the drug traffic in transit to the U.S., the ready availability of cocaine has led to a high level of addiction. Several privately sponsored programs are attempting to address the problem. Government assistance to these efforts has so far been limited to a $10,000 contribution to the programs of the National Drug Council.

BARBADOS

A member of the British Commonwealth, Barbados is a constitutional democracy with a free, two-party democratic system of government. Its House of Assembly is the third oldest elected body in the Western Hemisphere. Barbadians recognize the Queen of England as Head of State; she is represented by an appointed Governor-General. The Prime Minister is the Head of Government.

The Royal Barbados Police Force ensures public order; it respects constitutional and legal guarantees of human rights. Its personnel and training have improved in recent years police morale is good, and public respect for the police force is high. Barbados has a well-established judicial system based on common law and British procedure.

The country's economy is based on light manufacturing, tourism, services, and sugar.

There were no changes in Barbados's excellent human rights record during 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No killings for political motives were reported during 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution specifically prohibits torture, and there were no reports in 1985 of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Prison conditions are humane, although some overcrowding has been reported as a result of an increase in the prison population, principally due to drug-related crimes. Prison facilities are being expanded.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and this prohibition is respected in practice. The Constitution also guarantees the writ of habeas corpus; the authorities must bring detainees before a court of law within 72 hours of arrest. Criminal defendants have the right to counsel, and attorneys have ready access to their clients. The use of any form of forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by law and that prohibition is respected.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides that persons charged with criminal offenses be given a fair, public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial court. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty. The Government provides free legal aid to the indigent. The judiciary acts independently and is free of intervention from other branches of government. There are no political prisoners.

BARBADOS

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not interfere arbitrarily in the private lives of its citizens. The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry, search, or seizure, and the law requires warrants to be issued before privately owned property can be entered and searched. The Government neither censors the mail nor restricts the receipt of foreign correspondence or publications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press, and these rights are respected in practice. The Caribbean Broadcasting Corporation Radio and Television Service is government-owned, but is independent of government control. Views opposing government policies are regularly reported.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government of Barbados observes the constitutional guarantees of peaceful assembly and private association. Various trade associations and private organizations function without government hindrance.

Workers have the right to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike. Fifty percent of the labor force is organized, and protests or strikes have occurred when collective bargaining has failed. Although one major union has ties to the opposition party, labor leaders and rank-and-file trade union members are motivated primarily by economic and social rather than political considerations.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is full freedom of religion. The Anglican and Methodist faiths predominate, but there are numerous active religious denominations and organizations throughout the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens and legal residents move freely within and outside Barbados, a right guaranteed by the Constitution. Barbados has a small number of applicants for admission as refugees or asylees; these applicants are handled on a case-by-case basis.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In Barbados's parliamentary democracy, parties compete freely in honest elections held at least every 5 years. There are no impediments to participation in the political process; Barbadians over age 18 enjoy universal suffrage.

The present Barbados Labor Party Government won elections in 1976, and was reelected in June 1981, with 17 of the 27 assembly seats. The differences between the government party and the opposition Democratic Labor Party are based more on history and personalities than on ideology. Both parties tend toward democratic socialist policies, and they have assumed office in turn during three decades of self-rule. The "loyal opposition" criticizes the Government in a generally constructive fashion and would not hesitate to call attention to human rights abuses. A third party, the Workers Party of Barbados, was formed in early 1985, but has not contested an election.

Prime Minister J.M.G.M. "Tom" Adams died suddenly in March 1985, and was succeeded under the Constitution by Deputy Prime Minister H. Bernard St. John. The ruling Barbados Labor Party won a May by-election for Adams's vacant seat.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no reports of human rights violations in Barbados during 1985, and human rights groups have not requested investigations. Barbados advocates strengthening the human rights machinery of the United Nations and the Organization of American States. The Government favors more investigations into alleged violations of human rights in other countries and the increased use of factfinding or observer teams to monitor controversial political and electoral situations. The Government has spoken out on human rights violations in other countries, particularly in the Western Hemisphere and Africa. Several small groups in Barbados foster consciousness of human rights.

The 1985 Amnesty International Report expressed concern over the use of capital punishment in 1984. Freedom House gives Barbados a rating of "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Barbados has a population of 252,000, with a growth rate of only 0.5 percent owing to continued emigration and a declining birth rate. The economy, which until 1980 had enjoyed several years of solid growth, suffered through a slack period between 1981 and 1983. An upswing in tourism and increased exports of light manufactures resulted in a 2.9 percent growth in gross domestic product in 1984. According to figures for the first half of 1985, stagnation in regional markets contributed to a more sluggish 1.0 percent annual growth rate. In 1983, per capita gross national product was $4,050.

Citizens have long had access to public and private educational systems, and the adult literacy rate is 99 percent. Primary school enrollment is compulsory. Looking ahead to future educational needs, the Government has begun to expand the secondary school system.

Adequate medical care is available to all residents through local clinics and hospitals under the Government's health program. Government health insurance programs cover all Barbadians. Average life expectancy is 72.16 years, and there is one doctor for every 1,500 people. Infant mortality is 14.2 per 1,000 live births.

The legal minimum working age in Barbados is 16, a law which is respected. The work week is 40 hours in 5 days. Workers are guaranteed a minimum of 3 weeks annual leave. Occupational safety and health conditions are in keeping with International Labor Organization (ILO) standards. The minimum wage established by law is arguably less than that on which a person can be reasonably expected to live.

Barbadian law does not discriminate on the basis of race or sex. Barbados is a signatory of the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women. Women actively participate in all aspects of national life. One cabinet member is a woman, and women are well represented at all levels in both the public and private sectors. Women's groups speak out on public issues and insist on being consulted by the Government on important issues.

BELIZE

Belize has a parliamentary form of government with a competitive political party system and regular local and national elections. A Constitution formulated at the time of independence in 1981 prescribes the framework of government. The People's United Party (PUP) dominated the movement for self-government and independence which began in the early 1950's, and controlled the national government from the time of internal self-government in 1964 until the first post-independence national elections on December 14, 1984. On that date, the United Democratic Party (UDP) defeated the PUP, winning 54 percent of the popular vote and capturing 21 of the 28 seats in the House of Representatives. The election was peaceful, open and honest. The UDP currently also controls seven of the eight municipal councils in Belize, including the Belize City Council.

The security apparatus consists of the Belize National Police and the Belize Defense Force (BDF). The National Police comprises approximately 600 men and women and has the principal responsibility for law enforcement and maintenance of order. The BDF consists of 800 active personnel and reservists; although internal security is not its principal mission, it occasionally assists in police activities.

The Government favors free enterprise and has made encouragement of the private sector the basis of its strategy for achieving economic growth. The Government encourages new investment, both domestic and foreign. To provide a sound foundation for development, the Government has taken steps to strengthen public finances pursuant to a December 1984 International Monetary Fund (IMF) standby agreement. Largely because of depressed markets for sugar, the nation's largest source of private employment and of foreign exchange economic growth has been slow in recent years. Belize's gross exports are increasing, though still below 1981 levels.

Constitutional protections for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual are upheld by an independent judiciary and an equitable justice system. A free press and competitive electoral politics also serve to protect civil and political rights. There were no cases of political violence during 1985, and the country's overall human right record remained good.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Unlawful or arbitrary deprivation of life and politically motivated killings were not reported in Belize during 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in Belize during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Such treatment is prohibited by the Constitution and does not occur. Sentences for most crimes are generally lenient compared to sentences imposed for similar crimes elsewhere in the region. Prisons continue to be seriously crowded and badly antiquated; however, prisoners are adequately fed and have comparatively generous social and recreational privileges.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary imprisonment and guarantees the right of habeas corpus. A person is entitled, within 48 hours of arrest, to be informed of the reason for the detention and to be brought before a court within 72 hours. Release on bail is allowed for all but the most serious criminal offenses. These procedural safeguards are routinely observed.

Forced labor is forbidden by the Constitution and is not practiced.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution specifically guarantees due process and the rights of accused persons: presumption of innocence, protection against self incrimination, right to counsel, and public trial. Trial by jury is mandatory in criminal cases, except for those minor offenses decided by Magistrate's Courts. Protection for the integrity of the person in law corresponds the actual practice of the courts. The judiciary is independent of the executive and is regarded as an effective guarantor of an equitable judicial system. Its major shortcoming is insufficient trained personnel at all levels, resulting from the inability of the Government to provide adequate funding. There are no political prisoners in Belize.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the protection of family life, personal property, the privacy of the home, and recognition of human dignity. No violations of these guarantees have been reported during the past year.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are assured under the Constitution and are respected in practice. The Government controls Belize's only radio station, but a wide range of political opinion is presented in the country's press. The opposition and independent newspapers are frequently critical of the Government. There are fourteen privately owned and operated television stations in Belize. Belize is in the process of developing a regulatory framework for broadcasting. Following enactment of a broadcasting law in 1983, a six-member Belize Broadcasting Authority was appointed, and has begun the process of licensing existing stations. A controversy arose in May 1985 when the authority ruled that a television program produced by the opposition PUP could not be aired on the grounds that political broadcasts could be approved only in the context of upcoming elections. The issue was taken to the Supreme Court, which ruled that the relevant provision of the broadcasting regulation was unconstitutional. The Government has appealed this ruling, and the case is now before the Court of Appeals.

BELIZE

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly and association and the right to form and belong to trade unions are respected in practice. Permits are required to hold public meetings but are rarely denied.

There are eight independent labor unions representing approximately fifteen percent of the Labor Force. The National Trade Union Congress of Belize is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions through membership in the Caribbean Congress of Labor. Belizean unions engage in the full range of union activities. The unions have the right to collective bargaining, and labor disputes unresolved by bargaining are normally settled through arbitration; the Labor Commissioner or Joint Labor-Management panels serve as mediators. Workers have the right to strike. While there are varying degrees of cooperation with the political parties, no union is controlled by a political party. The Government accepts the principle of tripartite representation to the International Labor Organization (ILO), but has been constrained from full participation in ILO activities by lack of funds.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion. More than fifteen Christian denominations and the few non-Christian groups all worship freely. Most of Belize's primary and secondary schools are operated by churches. Church leaders have long had close ties to the political establishment, and churches play an active role in the tasks of social and national development.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within Belize or on foreign travel and emigration. Emigration is principally motivated by economic reasons and not by political or human rights considerations, and emigrants frequently return for family visits. Aliens convicted of crimes, particularly drug offenses or entry into Belize without proper documentation, are usually deported. Several thousand aliens from nearby Central American countries have arrived in Belize since 1980, often entering illegally and residing in the country without permits. Various steps have been taken to deal with this influx. A settlement project utilizing funds from the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and lands provided by the Belizean Government is providing farmsteads for 86 Salvadoran families. A program to register undocumented aliens was carried out in 1984. An undetermined number of aliens have since legalized their status; however, it is likely that many more remain illegally at the risk of arrest and fines. There is no evidence that displaced persons have been compelled to return to their country of origin. A UNHCR-supported office of refugee affairs is a part of the home affairs ministry.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

With the general election of December 1984 and the municipal elections in March 1985, Belize experienced a peaceful transfer of national governmental power from the PUP to the UDP. Although the ruling party's parliamentary majority gives it broad freedom to decide government policy, its exercise of political power is limited by public opinion, a free press, an independent judiciary, and genuinely competitive electoral politics. Broadly based political participation is represented in both major parties. A third party, the Belize Popular Party, was formed in early 1985 by PUP members dissatisfied with that party's policy subsequent to its electoral defeat. In addition, there is a small Christian Democratic Party whose activities are centered in the Dangriga-Stann Creek Area. Another small local party, the Toledo Progressive Party in Punta Gorda, did not field candidates in the above-mentioned elections. Participation in local and national elections is traditionally high in Belize; 74 percent of the electorate voted in the 1984 General Election.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international entities have asked to investigate the human rights situation in Belize. A private human rights council and a branch of Amnesty International exist in Belize. Given the favorable human rights environment, the activities of these two organizations have been very limited. Amnesty International's 1985 report did not mention Belize. Freedom House rates Belize "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Belize was 165,000 in 1985. The rate of population growth is estimated to be 2.2 percent; however, accurate estimates are hard to make due to sizeable immigration from surrounding countries and emigration from Belize to the United States. According to 1982 World Bank figures, per capita gross national product was $1083.

Because of depressed sugar markets, economic activity has been slow. Real income remained basically unchanged or possibly decreased marginally from 1982. Unemployment was estimated at 14.2 percent in late 1984, but along with underemployment has probably risen with the recent closing of one of the country's two sugar mills.

The adult literacy rate is 91.2 percent and 80 percent of the population has access to safe water (both figures are 1970 World Bank estimates). The ratio of caloric supply available for consumption to nutritional requirements was 115 percent in 1977. The health care system is not able to provide basic health care for all Belizeans. Life expectancy at birth is over 66 years, while the infant mortality rate is 53.5 per thousand live births. Public education, while not compulsory, is available for all children between the ages of 6 and 14.

Minimum ages for employment of children have been established at 14 years for work in retail establishments and at 17 years for any work near hazardous machinery. Minimum wages have been established for many occupations, and there are occupational safety regulations, although a shortage of resources makes it difficult for the Government to enforce them.

While there is no official policy of discrimination against women in Belize, they are faced with discrimination which is rooted in cultural, social, and economic structures. The Government, however, seeks the participation of women in the nation's political parties, private voluntary organizations, and churches. They are prominent in local and national government and well represented in the professions. The Governor General, who represents Queen Elizabeth II in her capacity as Belizean Head of State, is a woman, as is the President of the Senate. Women hold officer and enlisted positions in the police and the BDF.

BOLIVIA

Bolivia is now a democracy with a constitutionally elected Government. On July 14, 1985 the country held free democratic elections which resulted in the first constitutional transition from one civilian government to another in almost 20 years. On August 6, after a close contest between the Nationalist Democratic Action (ADN) party candidate Hugo Banzer and the Nationalist Revolutionary Movement (MNR) candidate Victor Paz Estenssoro, the latter was elected President by the Bolivian Congress in accordance with constitutional processes. The new Government's authority was tested almost immediately when its economic program was challenged by organized labor in a series of general strikes. The Government responded by declaring a state of siege which curtailed the rights to protest and assembly, in accordance with constitutional provisions, and by cracking down sharply on trade unionists, moves approved by the Congress and broadly accepted by the public.

The state security apparatus, which had been used by military governments in the past to torture and intimidate, was abolished under the 1982-85 government of Siles Zuazo, but Bolivia still has an internal intelligence service which falls under the responsibility of the Ministry of Interior, as well as intelligence services associated with the military. The internal intelligence service was active in rounding up and detaining Bolivian trade unionists in September 1985 under the Government's state of siege measures.

Bolivia is the poorest country in South America despite the rich natural resources available to a sparse population. The export sector, dominated by state enterprises, has stagnated for years and there has been a continual decline in the standard of living. As one of its first moves, the new Government announced a set of stringent economic adjustment measures designed to halt hyperinflation (the world's highest at 20,000 percent annually), reduce a huge fiscal deficit of nearly 30 percent of gross domestic product and restore economic growth which had contracted by approximately 20 percent in real terms from 1982 to 1984. The new economic plan emphasizes free market solutions to the economic crisis. For example, by breaking up government monopolies in sugar, rice, and wheat production, incentives have been created for individual farmers to produce as much of these products as they can sell at prevailing market prices.

In 1985, Bolivia witnessed a continuation of the improvement in the human rights situation which commenced with the end of the military government in 1982, although the record was not fully satisfactory. The temporary detention of some 3,000 trade union members on September 19 under provisions of the state of siege curtailed the freedoms of assembly, travel, and peaceful protest, albeit under terms of the Constitution and without any reports of torture, deaths, injuries, or disappearances such as had occurred under previous governments. On October 14, 1985 the Bolivian Military Court reduced the sentences of the so-called Luribay Seven detained in October 1983, but did not as requested grant a public trial in a civilian court. The October 1984 amnesty declared in their behalf by President Siles Zuazo was never honored by the military courts.

BOLIVIA

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in Bolivia in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no verified cases of politically motivated disappearance in Bolivia in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits all forms of torture, and neither the Siles Zuazo Government nor the Paz Estenssoro Government has practiced or condoned the use of torture. Most problems of prisoner mistreatment arise from overcrowded prison conditions and from underpaid, undertrained prison and police personnel. Corruption, malnutrition, and unsanitary conditions are endemic in Bolivia's underfinanced prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Constitution, no one can be arrested without a court order and detainees must be charged or released within 24 hours. However, Article 111 of the Constitution provides that the executive branch of government can declare a state of siege "in case of grave danger caused by internal commotion or international war," and under Article 112 detainees can be held 48 hours.

A state of siege was declared on September 19, 1985, and the Government explained its action on the basis of labor's decision to radicalize and broaden its general strike which was crippling vital sectors of the economy and was widely regarded to be primarily political in motivation. On October 2, the Bolivian Congress approved the Government's state of siege by a 94 to 39 vote. The state of siege was lifted on December 18, 1985.

As many as 3,000 trade unionists and bystanders were detained by Bolivian armed forces and police. Some detainees complained that the decision to keep or release them was made by men wearing hoods. Most detainees were never charged, and within 24 hours the Government had released all but some 200 unionists who were given a choice of internal or external exile, in accordance with the constitutional provisions on a state of siege. Four trade unionists went to Peru while the others remained in Bolivia where they were internally exiled to rural military bases in isolated parts of Bolivia. Conditions on the bases were primitive and many detainees complained about poor food, isolation from their families, and hot weather. There were no reports of torture.

The Government began releasing detainees on October 1, and the following day the Government and the unions approved an agreement ending the strike. By October 9, 1985, all the detainees were released except Fausto Ardaya Bernal from the National Telecommunications Company (ENTEL) union; he was no longer being held under state of siege rules but rather was being held without bail for criminal acts. In response to a writ of habeas corpus, the Government on October 10 brought

Ardaya before the court. Other trade unionists who were also charged with criminal offenses, notably former officers of the Central Bank, were released on bail.

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited by Bolivian labor law.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Government has upheld the right of fair public trial, but delays in the judicial system are common.

Seven persons detained by the army near Luribay in 1983 for alleged involvement in training of leftist groups were convicted of arms theft and attempted treason by a military court in 1984 after the Bolivian Supreme Court ruled that the military court had jurisdiction to try the case. On October 28, 1984, President Siles granted amnesty to the seven detainees, but the dispute over legal jurisdiction prevented their release. On October 14, 1985, the Supreme Military Tribunal published a decree which reduced the sentences of the seven detainees and will make possible the parole of four of them in April 1986 and the other three in October 1986.

Bolivia's legal practices allow for two judicial systems: civilian and military. The civilian system has control over Bolivian civil and penal codes. According to article 127 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court, Bolivia's highest civilian judicial body, also may review legislative measures and judge whether or not their statutes are in accordance with a citizen's "concrete rights or with the Constitution."

Article 208 of the Constitution gives the military the "fundamental mission to defend and conserve national independence, the republic's security and stability, honor and national sovereignty." To perform this "mission," the Bolivian military established in 1976 a revised military penal code and a law on the organization of the military judiciary. These measures define and establish military jurisdiction over actions against the security of the state, military personnel, or property.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home and the privacy of citizens' lives are protected by the Constitution and normally are respected in practice. House searches, monitoring of conversations, and other abuses that occurred under military regimes in the past ceased during the Siles Zuazo Government.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

As a democratic country, Bolivia enjoyed an independent, unfettered, and critical press throughout most of 1985. Exceptions occurred with the September 19 imposition of a state of siege when Interior Ministry agents entered worker-owned and -managed pro-labor radio stations and shut them down. However, by the end of 1985, all radio stations in Bolivia had reopened including the worker-run "Radio Continental" in La Paz. Two journalists for the Bolivian Workers Central (COB) were internally exiled along with other detainees for about 2 weeks under the state of siege. The most widely publicized government violation of press freedom was the September 23 detention of Antonio Peredo, editor of leftist weekly AQUI. Interior Ministry plainclothesmen initially had tried to apprehend Peredo in the Congress, but several Congressmen had intervened. Arrested later a few blocks away, he was released without charge after spending the night in the Interior Ministry; he said he had not been mistreated. Interior Minister Fernando Barthelemy subsequently apologized publicly for the incident.

Since the restoration of democracy in 1982, Bolivians have had a generally unrestricted press which represents a wide spectrum of ideological points of view. Both the Siles Zuazo and the Paz Estenssoro Governments have tolerated criticism from the media, including during the state of siege. Academic freedom is enjoyed at Bolivia's schools. There are both state-owned and privately owned radio and television stations, and the newspapers are all privately owned.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Except during the state of siege, peaceful assembly and association have not been restricted. Under the original provisions of the state of siege, groups of three or more were not allowed to gather between midnight (later changed to 3 a.m.) and 6 a.m., demonstrations and protest marches were prohibited, and permission had to be obtained from the police to hold a gathering or a party in the evening. Such police permits were readily available for a modest fee.

Bolivians have the right of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively. While Bolivian law still does not extend these rights to government jobs, in practice this distinction has been ignored and virtually all government employees are unionized.

The Bolivians Workers Central, an umbrella labor federation which represents the majority of Bolivian workers, is independent, politically powerful, and in the past has frequently paralyzed the economy with crippling strikes. Since the October 1982 return of democracy to Bolivia, the rights of unions have been observed to the extent that many persons (especially in the private sector) feel that the unions are too well protected. Under the Paz Estenssoro Government, union/government relations have been strained and conflictive. The unions, for example, made a claim to having the right of co-government, a claim which went far beyond such traditional labor rights as collective bargaining. Matters came to a head when the unions sought to veto the executive branch's economic policy, a move which precipitated the state of siege. Some union leaders have even demanded the same political immunity for union leaders as is accorded members of Congress.

c. Freedom of Religion

Citizens are free to practice the religion of their choice, and there are no restrictions on churches publishing, establishing places of worship and religious schools, training clergy, or maintaining international ties. Bolivian law requires that religious groups be incorporated, but there is no state control or censorship. Since the return to civilian government, no clergy have been persecuted for their political or religious beliefs or activities.

BOLIVIA

Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion and is recognized by the Constitution as the official religion of the country. Catholic bishops receive a nominal stipend from the State, but no other secular advantage is conferred. Protestant churches operate openly and freely. In 1982, a Protestant college opened in Santa Cruz. Two years later, a Baha'i University opened in the same city. The Mormons and Seventh Day Adventists are free to proselytize and to operate churches and training centers throughout the country. The small Jewish community is not disturbed as it was under military regimes, which tolerated neo-Nazi "paramilitary" groups which published anti-Semitic tracts. The Mennonites have large rural colonies in Santa Cruz.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There were no unusual restrictions on travel within Bolivia or abroad except during the temporary state of siege which began on September 19, 1985, and ended at midnight December 18, 1985. Under the provisions of the state of siege, one needed a no-fee police permit--which was readily available--to leave the country, to travel within Bolivia, and to drive a car between midnight and 6 a.m. On October 14, 1985, the Government reduced the restricted hours to the period from 3 a.m. to 6 a.m.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

On July 14, 1985, Bolivia held free democratic elections which resulted in the first constitutional transition of power from one civilian government to an opposing political party in almost 20 years. On August 6, 1985, after a close race at the polls between Nationalist Democratic Action (ADN) party candidate Hugo Banzer and Nationalist Revolutionary Movement (MNR) candidate Victor Paz Estenssoro, the latter was elected President by the Bolivian Congress in accordance with constitutional processes. No party won a majority and ADN candidate Banzer actually received more popular votes (with about 28 percent of the total) than the winner Paz Estenssoro (who received 27 percent). Because no party won a majority, the Congress had to choose the President. The MNR was able to gather support from other parties in Congress and on August 6, 1985, Victor Paz Estenssoro was sworn in as President, replacing Siles Zuazo who had governed since October 10, 1982.

The political system is dominated by persons of European or Mestizo origin. Those following a traditional Indian lifestyle and speaking Aymara or Quechua as a primary language make up an estimated 60 percent of the population and have failed to advance to top positions because of economic disadvantages and educational and cultural isolation as well as an element of overt discrimination. There have been notable exceptions to this rule, such as the present Minister of Agriculture, Mauricio Mamani Pocoaca, who is a full blooded Aymara.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been sensitive to the opinions of both international and domestic organizations regarding alleged violations of civil liberties. An International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) team visited Bolivia from October 19 to October 22, 1985, and met with trade union and government officials to discuss and observe the local situation. The ICFTU officials indicated that a report would be forthcoming. Two representatives from the World Confederation of Labor (WCL) and its Latin American Workers Central (CLAT), visited Bolivia November 1985, to investigate what they alleged to be "serious violations of union rights and labor laws." They met with Bolivian Workers Central leaders and officials of the Ministry of Labor. The visitors criticized President Paz and called on him to free several imprisoned labor leaders who were being detained on criminal charges (unlike the thousands who had been temporarily picked up and later released when the Government imposed a state of siege on September 19, 1985). In accordance with Bolivian legal procedure, one of the leaders held on criminal charges was subsequently released pending trial. Among nongovernmental organizations, the Catholic church, the Permanent Assembly of Human Rights, and the press have been the most aggressive monitors of human rights in Bolivia. The Bolivian Episcopal Conference of the Catholic Church and some Protestant ministers played a role in the past in visiting detainees and speaking out against abuses. Individual Catholic bishops, many priests, and such lay groups as the Bacherer Foundation and the Confederation of Lay Persons have been active in the investigation of social problems, and, occasionally, human rights issues.

Amnesty International Report 1985, which covered events in 1984, expressed concern about lack of progress in investigations into disappearances and extra judicial executions which took place under previous governments, and the failure of some sectors of the military to cooperate in those investigations. Freedom House rated Bolivia as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Bolivia's population in 1985 is estimated at 6.2 million with a growth rate of 2.6 percent. World Bank statistics for 1984 indicate a per capita gross national product of $410.

The failure of the Siles Zuazo administration to adopt adequate economic corrective measures and its repeated concessions to labor's demands for wage increases were key factors ensuring continued economic deterioration and hyperinflation, which exceeded 20,000 percent through September 1985. Bolivia has a $3.8 billion international debt with debt service payments exceeding the value of legal exports. Payments on its debt to foreign commercial banks were suspended in April 1984. The newly elected Paz Estenssoro Government's economic program of August 29 represents a head-on attempt to stop the hyperinflationary spiral and to reactivate the economy's productive apparatus. Implementing a series of free market economic measures such as exchange rate, price, and interest rate deregulation, coupled with a restrictive public sector wage and monetary policy, Bolivia has taken a major step towards economic stabilization. This form of shock treatment, although it is expected to produce economic improvements in the medium to long term, will cause painful adjustments in the short run. The Government has opened discussions with its private foreign creditors on debt rescheduling, and has begun negotiations with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) on a standby agreement. A concerted effort is being made to improve Bolivia's foreign investment climate.

Life expectancy at birth is estimated at 51.9 years. The infant mortality rate is a high 119 per 1,000 live births. Data from the 1976 census indicate that 291 out of 1,000 rural children die before their 5th year, compared to 186 per 1,000 urban children. Only 57 percent of the population had access to safe water in 1980 (the last year for which this statistic is available), and the caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was only 90 percent in 1982.

World Bank figures show the adult literacy rate was 63.2 percent in 1976, but more recent Bolivian estimates place it at about 73 percent. Public education is free and generally available in urban areas, but the school year has frequently been interrupted by strikes and protests. According to World Bank figures, the primary school enrollment ratio was 86 percent in 1982. Except in the most isolated areas, Bolivian rural youth can expect at least 3 years of schooling.

Bolivian labor law prohibits any labor contract which denies a worker his or her constitutional rights and freedoms. The employment of minors under 18 years of age and women in dangerous, unhealthy, or immoral work is prohibited. Bolivia has acceptable conditions of employment with minimum wage laws and an elaborate system of bonuses and compensations. For most jobs, especially in the public and mining sectors, most workers have an 8-hour day.

There are laws governing occupational safety and health, but often they are not rigorously observed in practice. Enforcement is a major problem. The most dangerous and unhealthy jobs historically have been in the mines. Many are old and operated with antiquated equipment. Mine workers suffer from silicosis, but many do not wear their safety masks.

Although protected in theory by social legislation that represented a pioneering effort in the Latin American context, Bolivian women do not enjoy a status in society equal to that of men. The main obstacles to advancement are cultural traditions, social conditions, and a lack of political influence. In rural families, women have contributed significantly to economic activities but are nonetheless considered subordinate. In some urban families, women are slowly achieving a greater role in Bolivian business life and increasingly are beginning to participate in cooperatives, community meetings, and education.

Since 1952 racial discrimination has been banned in Bolivia. However, informal discrimination persists against persons of Indian background by those persons wholly or partly of European ancestry. At least partially as a result of this discriminatory treatment, the Indian population is at the lower end of the country's socioeconomic scale, with the expected adverse effects on health, life expectancy, education, income, and unemployment.

Brazil returned to full democratic rule in 1985. Jose Sarney, chosen as Vice President by the electoral college in January, became President in April following the death of the President-elect.

With the return of democracy, the Brazilian Congress approved amendments to remove immediately a number of the more authoritarian provisions in the 1967 Constitution. The center of political power continues to be the Presidency, which enjoys various constitutional and legal devices providing decisive authority within the Brazilian legal framework. The Congress, most of which was popularly elected in 1982, plays an increasingly active role in national policy-making. The Brazilian judiciary is a respected and independent institution and is largely successful in guaranteeing due process of law for most citizens.

1985 was a year of economic recovery, with growth expected to be around 7 percent. Brazil is the eighth largest economy in the non-Communist world, but it must cope with a foreign debt of nearly 100 billion dollars and high inflation (over 200 percent in 1985 and in each of the 2 previous years). The 3 years prior to 1984 were years of severe recession, and per capita gross national product declined substantially. The Brazilian Government has been able to adjust the economy's external sector to current international financial conditions, as shown by the large growth in its trade surplus.

The state of human rights continued to improve in 1985, reinforcing the long-term trend. Brazilians are largely free to participate in the political and economic life of the country. The President may, however, invoke constitutionally sanctioned emergency powers and has authority to issue decree-laws. Although a decree-law enters into effect immediately, it must then be submitted to Congress, which has 60 days to approve or reject it. President Sarney has issued several decree-laws, but recently stated his intention to cease this practice.

Under the current civil code, Brazilian Indians are considered "semi-competent" wards of the State and live under certain restrictions and protections which are not applicable to other citizens. Indians living on a number of reservations are under pressure from mineral and agricultural developers, as well as squatters and legitimate settlers, to open more of their lands to others.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1985. However, there have been charges by human rights organizations that police in Rio and Sao Paulo have killed individuals suspected of common crimes. The National Conference of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB) notes that the situation in Rio has improved in recent years. While these killings apparently still continue, they are not politically motivated and police participation is unclear. The church perceives no similar improvement in Sao Paulo over the past several years and believes insufficient resources have been devoted by local or state government to combat the problem. Many of the more than 200 criminals reported as killed annually in confrontations with Sao Paulo police are believed by human rights activists to have been killed after capture. The situation has been complicated by an alarming rise in the rate of violent crime in Rio and Sao Paulo, which has led to a high degree of public tolerance of charges of police brutality toward suspects.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of politically motivated abductions. However, Sao Paulo human rights groups report the disappearance of 15 alleged common criminals from police custody since December 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by the penal code, and there have been no reports of politically motivated torture in 1985. However, various human rights and professional organizations report that police beatings and torture of individuals suspected of common crimes are widespread, the primary purpose apparently being to extract confessions. Such practices primarily affect the underprivileged. Although church authorities in Rio noted a steady decline in such offenses in 1983-84, due to government efforts to curb mistreatment of suspects, there was no evidence of further significant improvement during 1985. In Sao Paulo, the practice reportedly remains widespread with little change over the past several years. Human rights activists in both Rio and Sao Paulo maintain that the dominant factor sustaining these abuses by police is the perception that they can act with impunity. Although little improvement was noted in 1985, there is guarded optimism that the sense of impunity is fading, due in part to several nationally reported judicial proceedings against police involved in torture and killings.

Many prison facilities continue to be overcrowded and poorly maintained and managed. The state of Sao Paulo is now engaged in a major construction program of medium-security regional prisons. There has been no such investment in Rio, leading to resignations in September of the director of the State Penitentiary System and principal prison wardens. The worst cases of sub-human prison conditions which have come to recent attention are the "prisoner deposits" in urban Minas Gerais, where an infamous death lottery among prisoners has developed, supposedly to call public attention to the overcrowded conditions. (Some 20 prisoners were killed by fellow inmates in these cells during 1985.) The state of Minas Gerais has transferred some of the more hardened criminals and has begun construction of a new maximum-security prison, the first investment in the penal system in 30 years, but poor conditions persist.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The independent judiciary is largely successful in guaranteeing due process of law for most citizens, although delivery of justice to economically marginalized groups is incomplete. Under the law, an individual may not be arbitrarily detained. Habeas corpus is guaranteed by the Constitution and is respected.

Provisional detention is permissible under criminal law. It is ordered by judges (in cases of common crimes) or by certain high-level administrative authorities (in cases of crimes against the public administration or of extradition), not by the police. For example, a judge may order provisional detention to preserve public order when there is evidence of probable cause, when the accused is considered dangerous or does not have a fixed job or address, or when the individual is caught in the act of an unobtainable crime. Detention may also be ordered to prevent interference by the accused in criminal proceedings, e.g., when the individual might influence or harm witnesses. Provisional detention can be extended until the case comes to trial or until a judge rules that reasons for the detention no longer exist. Provisional detention in Brazil is not practiced arbitrarily and does not normally lead to longer periods of incarceration.

Forced or compulsory labor is not used in Brazil by any official or government organization. During 1985, several accusations were made that individual landowners in the states of Bahia and Acre have maintained a "slave" work force, usually through methods such as discounting salaries against transportation and other expenses and of preventing workers from leaving the property. When these practices have been exposed to authorities, action has been taken to secure release of the persons.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is guaranteed by law for both penal code and National Security Law violations and is respected in practice. Defendants are entitled to counsel and must be made fully aware of the charges against them. In cases where a defendant cannot afford an attorney, one must be provided free of charge. However, there are too few public defenders, and thousands of criminal cases are now backlogged. Defendants and their attorneys have the legal right to be informed of the evidence on which the charges are based. Cases may be tried before a single judge or by jury, except in the cases of willful crimes against life, in which case a jury trial is mandated.

Numerous lynchings have been reported in the press and the phenomenon is apparently increasing. The greatest incidence of lynching takes place in the slums on the outskirts of major cities, a result of perceptions that police and court protection is unavailable.

The Brazilian judicial system is an independent branch of government. The federal court system of Brazil is composed of courts of the first instance and appeals courts. The Federal Supreme Court is the highest court in the land. The states are free to organize their own judicial systems as long as they do not violate basic principles of the federal Constitution. Brazil also has a system of specialized courts such as labor courts, electoral courts, and juvenile courts.

The military court system is charged with the responsibility of hearing cases involving military personnel and cases involving civilians charged under the National Security Law or with offenses against military installations. Legal guarantees also apply in military courts. Civilians have the right to appeal to the Federal Supreme Court when convicted of crimes against the National Security Law. Military personnel also may appeal to the Federal Supreme Court in national security cases, but only in extraordinary circumstances. The Minister of Justice has stated that civilians will not be charged under the law pending its revision. At present, no one is imprisoned in Brazil under the National Security Law. Two cases are still pending for attempts to organize Communist parties. As Communist parties are now legal, it is expected that these cases will end in dismissal or acquittals, as did a similar case in 1985.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

Forced entry into homes without a warrant probably still occurs in searches for criminals, but this practice has declined in recent years, according to human rights organizations. There are no reports of such illegal entries of homes in political cases. Freedom from search is a constitutionally guaranteed right.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right to free speech and to a free press are guaranteed in the Constitution. Opposition viewpoints are aired freely in various media. There has been no interference with the media by the new Government.

Newspapers are privately owned and are vigorous in reporting on and discussing government policies and performance. Self-censorship is rare. The Inter-American Press Association listed Brazil as having a "free press."

Radio and television stations are also privately owned, but the Government can withdraw their licenses fairly easily. The current administration plans to review all licenses issued during the last 6 months of the previous Government. Electronic media broadcasts covered a vast array of topics, including controversial social and political issues during 1985.

Foreign publications are widely distributed in Brazil. A restrictive censorship law still exists, but the provisions being observed apply mainly to age restrictions. A new law is being developed which is expected to concentrate on protection of minors from harmful influences, including narcotics and pornography. Books and newspapers are not censored, and films, songs, and plays are no longer reviewed for political content. Prescreening reviews of films and television programming continue but only for determining the acceptable viewing age.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right to peaceful assembly, and the right is observed. Although permits must be obtained for outdoor public, political or labor meetings they are normally freely given.

Labor has the right to organize and to meet freely; labor unions are legally mandated under the code of labor laws to represent workers. Although the labor code makes no provision for a central or umbrella labor organization, two rival centrals have emerged. The founding of a third was announced in September 1985. The Government has not officially recognized their right to function but engages in regular dialogue with central leaders. To maintain the official labor structure, workers are taxed 1 day's pay per year, a sum which is paid to the Government and then divided among confederations, federations, and local unions. Perhaps 10 to 15 percent of workers voluntarily pay union dues in addition to the mandatory tax. Most of these voluntary members join more for family health benefits than for representation regarding wages or working conditions. Although unions are legally prohibited from participating in partisan politics, a number do but with little impact to date.

The Government has not acted to prohibit strikes, even though existing legislation makes strikes all but illegal and has not enforced other restrictions on labor unions. In addition, the Government has reinstated the right of all labor leaders to hold union office.

Employers have a legally mandated structure which parallels that of labor, and there are also voluntary employer organizations not mandated by law. Both types of associations represent their members to the Government, act as lobbyists, and negotiate collective bargaining agreements with labor unions.

Unions of workers and employers may maintain ties with international organizations, but each affiliation has to be approved by the President of Brazil and, because of exchange controls, the transfer of funds to pay membership charges has to pass through the Central Bank. The President and Central Bank have a number of applications pending for association and transfer of funds.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no favored or state religion. An overwhelming majority of Brazilians belong to the Roman Catholic Church. All faiths are free to proselytize, establish places of worship, and train clergy. According to the National Council of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB), missionaries and other foreign religious visitors have had difficulty entering Brazil in recent years due to the passage of a new immigration law in 1980. The CNBB does not believe that missionaries and religious visitors are being singled out, but rather that all foreigners are equally affected. Plans to revise the immigration law have been announced by the Government. The Catholic Church continued its political and social activism during 1985, with no government intervention.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within Brazil, nor are there any unusual restrictions on emigration. Brazil admits few immigrants, basing its decision on its ability to absorb newcomers, cultural affinity and proximity of the applicant's homeland. Brazil is selective in granting asylum, and precise criteria do not exist.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

On March 15, 1985, Brazil's first civilian president in 21 years was inaugurated. With the acquiescence of military leaders, two civilian presidential candidates were chosen, one a former governor of Sao Paulo with close ties to the military-dominated Government, and the other a long-time civilian opposition leader. The opposition leader, Tancredo Neves, was chosen as President in indirect elections in January by an electoral college composed of the Federal Congress and six representatives of each state legislature. His running mate, Jose Sarney, former President of the government party and long-time civilian politician, was elected Vice President. Although efforts to establish direct presidential elections failed, the indirect election of Neves through the electoral college was widely hailed as a complete return to civilian democracy. Neves was hospitalized for emergency abdominal surgery on the eve of his inauguration, and Sarney became interim president. Subsequently, Neves died, and Sarney was confirmed with full presidential authority.

Although the military-inspired 1967 Constitution concentrates effective political power in the Presidency, Sarney has followed a more consensual style of government. The President's constitutional powers include the right to issue decree-laws in a number of key areas and, in the event of an outbreak of war or threat of serious disturbances, to decree a state of siege which permits suspension of many civil rights. The Federal Congress, with the support of the Presidency, in May passed constitutional amendments removing numerous authoritarian restrictions. The major changes provided for direct presidential elections, direct elections of mayors in all cities (mayors of state capitals and of cities in national security areas had previously been appointed by state governors), enfranchisement of illiterates (approximately 25 percent of the adult population), and liberalized political party registration. Liberalization of party registration has resulted in legalization of two Communist parties and increased the total number of political parties to 30, representing the entire political spectrum.

The direct election of Federal Congressmen and Senators in November 1982 produced a popularly representative congress with direct influence in the decisionmaking process. Congress now exercises a larger role than it has for the past 2 decades. A new constitution will be drafted by a constituent assembly in 1987. It is expected that membership in the constituent assembly will be the same as that of the Federal Congress which will convene after the November 1986 elections. Those elections will fill all seats in the Chamber of Deputies and two-thirds of those in the Senate. State governors have been directly elected since 1982, as have all municipal, state, and most federal legislators. (There are still a few nonelected federal senators who were appointed before 1982.) As of the November 1985 mayoral elections, all mayors are now directly elected. Voting is secret and mandatory for all adults.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no outside requests in 1985 from international human rights organizations to investigate conditions in Brazil.

There are a number of Brazilian nongovernmental organizations, such as the National Bar Association and the Brazilian Press Association, which are active in investigating alleged human rights violations and in initiating legal proceedings. Amnesty International maintains offices in Rio and Sao Paulo. There have been no claims by any of these organizations that the Government has tried to impede their investigations. There is a consensus among human rights observers in Brazil that the human rights situation has improved dramatically over the past several years. They believe that the main problems now concern police behavior toward suspects, prison conditions, and certain economic rights. The Federal Solicitor-General in 1985 designated a Federal Prosecutor in each state to monitor and assist in denunciations of violations of human rights.

BRAZIL

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In 1984, Brazil's population of approximately 135 million grew at the rate of 2.5 to 3 percent. The gross domestic product rose by approximately 4.5 percent, after 3 consecutive years of economic recession. GNP per capita at the end of 1983 was US$1,880 (World Bank estimate), more than 10 percent less than that of 1980. (Brazilian Government figures show a 1983 GNP per capita of US$1,628.) Continued rapid expansion of exports produced a 13 billion trade surplus in 1984. Economic growth continued in 1985, with GNP up by between 6 and 7 percent. The 1985 trade surplus is expected to be about $12 billion. Expansion in 1985 has brought real wage increases and some reduction in the rate of unemployment. However, persistent high inflation (surpassing 200 percent annually since 1983), rapid demographic growth, and the pressures of Brazil's high debt service will continue to limit improvements in living standards.

Although evidence suggests that all social strata benefited from the country's economic growth during the 1970's, uneven income distribution was exacerbated and remains a serious social concern. Brazil continues to have a large rural-to-urban migration. Seventy percent of the population lives within 100 kilometers of the coast, and nearly 30 percent are concentrated in nine urban areas. The Government encourages settlement in the western frontier areas.

Life expectancy at birth is estimated at 65 years, and infant mortality 65 per 1,000 live births. However, officials in several northeastern states estimate their infant mortality rates at well over 200, primarily due to the area's chronic poverty and substandard health facilities. Health personnel and health facilities are concentrated in urban areas. Significant portions of the society lack adequate nutrition, basic education, and medical care. An estimated 29 percent of the population lacks access to safe water. Illustrative of these problems are the findings of a 1980 Brazilian congressional inquiry which indicated that Brazil has 2 million abandoned children and 18 to 25 million children without the basic necessities of life. The Ministry of Education estimates that some 7 million school-age children are not enrolled in the educational system. Government figures show that 21 percent of the economically active population has less than 2 years of education. Official figures indicated that in 1980 16 percent of the urban population over age 10 was illiterate, as was 46 percent of the same segment of the rural population.

Minimum age for employment is 12, but numerous legal restrictions theoretically apply to all working minors (those under age 18). Permission of parents or guardians is legally required for minors to work. Children from 12 to 14 are legally allowed to work only if provision is made for them to attend school through completion of primary education, and only in light work that does not constitute a physical strain. All minors face restrictions in night employment and are prohibited from employment in unhealthy, dangerous, or morally injurious conditions. These laws do not extend to the types of occasional employment performed by millions of children and adolescents. Thirty-four percent of all children between 10 and 14 are considered economically active, and 65 percent of Brazilians between 15 and 17 are employed. Brazil has a highly codified system of labor regulations, providing restrictions concerning workplace safety, a 48-hour maximum work week, specified periods of rest and vacation, and a standardized minimum wage. Official accident figures show an annual injury rate of approximately 4 percent, with 4,500 workplace deaths for 25 million insured workers. Regulations concerning workplace safety are detailed, but enforcement suffers from an inadequate inspection staff.

The minimum wage, which is defined as that "able to satisfy the normal necessities of the worker and his family," averages approximately $50 per month; its purchasing power fluctuates considerably because it is raised only twice a year despite high inflation. An interunion statistical organization calculates that the minimum necessary for a decent standard of living for a family is 3 to 4 times greater than the official minimum salary. In 1983, 43 percent of those economically active earned less than one minimum salary; only 30 percent of all workers earned more than three minimum salaries.

Discrimination on the basis of sex and race is illegal. Nevertheless, the number of women and members of most minority groups in the governing structure is much smaller than their proportional share of the population, a reflection of prevailing cultural attitudes and economic disparities. Women are proportionally represented among university students.

The country's estimated 200,000 Indians, living mostly in the interior, have suffered in recent decades from population movements by Non-Indians into frontier areas where most Indians live. Despite the Government's commitment under the 1973 Indian Statute to protect the Indian population and efforts of the Federal Indian Affairs Agency to demarcate tribal lands, the Indian population continues to suffer from governmental neglect, discriminatory governmental controls, and unequal legal status.

U.S.OVERSEAS -LOANS AND GRANTS- OBLIGATIONS AND LOAN AUTHORIZATIONS
(U.S.FISCAL YEARS - MILLIONS OF DOLLARS)

CHILE

Chile has been ruled by the military since a coup in 1973 interrupted a forty-two year period of democratic government. Since independence in 1810, Chile has experienced periods of authoritarian regimes, but parliamentary rule under a democratic system of elections and respect for political and human rights generally prevailed. The current Government includes both civilian and military officials and operates under the Constitution adopted by plebiscite in 1980. A military junta exercises limited legislative functions, and a separate judicial branch carries out judicial duties, but primary authority resides with the Commanding General of the Army and President, Augusto Pinochet. Under the 1980 Constitution, President Pinochet's term of office expires in 1989, when a plebiscite will be held on a presidential candidate to be selected by the military commanders in chief. There are no constitutional restrictions on President Pinochet's being that candidate. If approved, the Junta candidate would serve until 1997. If rejected, open and direct presidential elections would be held within one year. The Constitution also provides that the junta will continue to serve until congressional elections are held in 1990. In August eleven democratic political parties came together in a "National Accord for a Transition to Full Democracy" but the Government has refused to agree to a dialogue on the moderate proposals for a democratic transition contained in this Accord.

Chile has a vigorous private sector, an economic system based largely on the free enterprise system, and social programs which absorb over half the government budget. The steep decline in Chile's terms of trade since 1970, compounded by one of the region's highest per capita levels of debt, has not allowed Chile to benefit as much as might be expected from the Government's generally responsible economic policies.

Most fundamental political freedoms are severely limited, and human rights conditions are strongly affected by the lack of progress toward a transition to democracy and by terrorist violence. While the military has indicated an intention to carry out the provisions of the 1980 Constitution, political parties function without the protections of legal status and electoral laws have not been established. Rights of private property, freedom of religion and minority rights are respected, but "states of exception" to constitutional guarantees imposed severe restrictions during 1985 on freedom of association and assembly, freedom from arbitrary arrest and exile, and freedom of speech and the press.

The Government has maintained significant discretionary authority by use of one or more of the four states of exception provided for under the transitory articles of the 1980 Constitution which progressively limit civil liberties otherwise provided for by the Constitution. All four may be in force concurrently, but the most restrictive state of exception, the State of Assembly, has never been implemented by the Government. For most of the first six months of 1985 the country was under a State of Siege which expanded jurisdiction of military courts and permitted the Government to "suspend" the right of freedom of information. Removal of the State of Siege on June 17 partially restored freedoms of speech, assembly, association and the press and increased the authority of the courts, which during 1985 showed independence and diligence in investigating several important cases of major human rights violations involving the security forces.

CHILE

However, there remained in effect throughout 1985 a State of Emergency and State of Danger of Disturbance of Internal Peace under which the Government maintained authority to detain individuals up to twenty days without judicial review, to expel individuals, to assign enforced residence for ninety days, and to restrict the right of assembly and freedom of information. The existence of these provisions engender a large degree of uncertainty among Chileans. The Government authorized several hundred additional exiles to return to Chile in 1985 and permitted the UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Chile to visit in December.

Reliable and documented reports of torture and mistreatment of those detained by the authorities continue to be received by human rights organizations, and there was an increase in charges by human rights groups and government opponents of temporary kidnappings, beatings and torture by persons frequently reported to be agents of the security forces. There continued to be a high level of far left terrorism, to which was attributed the murders of military and police officers and civilians, as well as the bombing of installations identified with the Chilean Government or the United States, such as Mormon churches, U.S.-owned companies and binational centers.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

A total of 72 persons were killed and many others injured in apparently politically-related acts of violence in 1985. The deaths and injuries resulted from both deliberate and random actions by government forces and by left and right-wing terrorists. The following paragraphs illustrate some of the specific instances.

A student under detention in February by the Carabineros (uniformed police) in the town of Quintero, after having been arrested for possible involvement in a terrorist school, died from mistreatment. Three individuals associated with the Chilean Communist Party were kidnapped from a public Santiago street in March by unidentified civilians, and their bodies were discovered with throats cut the following day in a field outside of Santiago. In April a university student demonstrator died after having been shot by Carabineros while distributing leaflets. Terrorist actions killed three women in two separate bomb attacks against city office buildings in the towns of Lo Prado and Conchalí in May. A terrorist car bomb exploded across the street from the U.S. Consulate in Santiago in July, killing a passerby. Five civilians died in November as the result of a terrorist fire bomb attack against a supermarket in Vina del Mar.

Demonstrations in early September associated with the traditional date of presidential elections (September 4) and the anniversary of the 1973 overthrow of the Allende government (September 11), deteriorated into several days of violent, scattered clashes between demonstrators and the authorities. Ten people were killed during these clashes, several under unclear circumstances in which armed civilians, driving vehicles without license plates, were reportedly shooting people at random in areas where violent clashes had occurred.

The Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Front, which is linked to the Chilean Communist Party, and the Movement of the Revolutionary Left, another leftist terrorist group, continued to pursue a policy of violent confrontation with the military Government both during the State of Siege and after its removal, rejecting efforts by democratic sectors to encourage a peaceful transition to democracy. There were 936 separate terrorist bombing attacks throughout the nation, leaving 451 persons killed and injured during the first eleven months of the year. There is considerable evidence of Soviet, Cuban, Nicaraguan, Libyan, and East European training and other support for the terrorist groups.

b. Disappearances

There were no substantiated reports of disappearances during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and police brutality continue to be serious problems. At least four people died in 1985 apparently as a result of mistreatment while in the custody of the authorities. The Chilean Medical Association continues to investigate cases of doctors who are reported to have been involved in torture, and in August 1985 suspended an army physician for his indirect support in the mistreatment of a young woman detained by the National Information Center (CNI) in 1982.

The Constitution prohibits "use of all illegal pressure" and "guarantees to all persons the right to life and to the physical and psychological integrity of the individual." Government officials deny that use of torture is authorized and note that members of the uniformed services are being investigated by the civilian and military judiciary systems for their possible involvement in deaths due to apparent mistreatment. At the end of 1985 two Carabinero officers were still in custody pending the results of a judicial investigation into the death of a 19-year old student in February under detention by Carabineros. Five Carabinero members have been implicated in the May 26, 1985 death of a young man who had earlier been arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol. Other cases of official mistreatment continue under investigation by the courts. At the end of 1985, five Carabinero officials, including two colonels, remained under detention in connection with the judicial investigation of the March 1985 murders of three Communist party leaders.

Government officials have stated on several occasions that all cases in which complaints have been registered over abuse or torture by the authorities are investigated, and have declared that officials found to have participated in abuses are brought to justice. Human rights groups assert that many of these complaints are not actively investigated, but note that during the latter half of 1985 the courts have pursued more such cases than in the past. In July 1985 the Chilean Interior Minister and Minister of Defense issued a directive to all security forces prohibiting the mistreatment of prisoners, but there were credible reports of new cases of torture subsequent to this order.

Accusations of torture declined in the second half of 1985 but there was a marked increase in the number of reports of people being temporarily detained or kidnapped by unknown individuals and of being physically abused while held. In 1985 there were 564 reports of such kidnapping incidents having occurred, as compared to 402 in 1984 and 212 in 1983. Most victims, which include students, professionals, lower-level political activists or their families, journalists, and social workers, claimed to have suffered physical and mental abuse, including in some instances rape. Some also suffered superficial knife wounds in the shape of a cross. Several victims were subjected to more than one assault, with one 18-year old student alleging to have been assaulted on three different occasions. The reasons for such assaults are not given. Most appear to be attempts to intimidate those involved in human rights organizations, church-based community organizations, or political activities.

In 1985, 84 persons filed complaints in court alleging torture or cruel and unusual punishment by security forces compared with a total of 84 in 1984, 77 in 1983, 57 in 1982, 68 in 1981, and 100 in 1980. Most of these individuals state that they were subjected to beatings, electric shocks, or threats, particularly during the first days of detention. In 1985 an increasing number of incidents of physical abuse took place while the person was held by unidentified assailants. While the Chilean courts have been investigating several torture cases in 1985, as of the end of the year no security personnel had been found guilty in any of these cases.

U.S. consular officials have received complaints from several U.S. citizens who were detained in Chile of torture or threats of torture, always within the first few days following their detention, and prior to notification of the U.S. Embassy and the initial visit from a U.S. consular official. There have been no reports from U.S. citizens of torture or threats of torture subsequent to that initial visit.

Although the Government asserts that security and military forces are under strict control, reports of incidents of deliberate and random police brutality continued throughout 1985. While most detainees do not file formal claims of mistreatment, some persons detained during protest demonstrations or on other political grounds have complained of being beaten or otherwise mistreated. Observers note, however, that in the final six months of 1985 the uniformed security forces used considerably less violent means of controlling demonstrators.

Since January 1981, all persons officially charged with or convicted of violations of internal security laws have been lodged in the same penal facilities as other offenders. They have rights of visitation and communication with family, friends, legal counsel, and representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross. These rights are subject to limitation by Transitory Article 24 of the 1980 Constitution, which restricts visitation rights in the first days of detention before prisoners are remanded to the court system.

CHILE

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Among the more serious areas of human rights violations in Chile has been the continued use of arbitrary arrests, detentions and internal exile. Under the State of Siege massive police round-ups and collective arrests took place with some frequency; 764 were detained in 1985 in such operations before June. After the lifting of the State of Siege, massive police round-ups no longer occurred, but since June at least 4,007 persons were temporarily detained for participating in unauthorized demonstrations. Of the 5,401 people detained for investigation in 1985, either individually or as members of large groups, 310 were eventually charged before the courts for a variety of security law violations, and 32 were held on unspecified terrorist charges.

Transitory Article 24 of the 1980 Constitution, under which the Government may order detention of five days without rights of Amparo or for as much as 20 days in cases where terrorist acts may be involved, was in effect throughout 1985. Prisoners were often held incommunicado during the initial period of investigation. Once formal charges are issued and the case brought before the court system, defendants are allowed a lawyer of their own choosing; lawyers affiliated with human rights groups are made readily available by those groups without charge. However, many of those held under this Article are never charged with any specific violations. For example, in September, after several days of sporadic clashes between the authorities and demonstrators, 64 people were detained in early morning raids on their residences. After 10 days of detention, 34 were banished for 90 days to remote sites in Chile. The others were released to return home. No trials were held, no charges were made and those banished were not provided with the reasons for this decision.

Chilean law stipulates that those banished be sent to urban areas. Members of the September group banished were generally sent to towns of five thousand or less (with several going to towns of 500 or less). While living in these locations, the banished people must report at least daily to the local carabinero police station. Areas where those banished are sent include desert and mountain regions.

The Government has continued to reduce the list of those exiled from Chile. In September 1984 the Government published an official list containing 4,942 names of individuals not permitted to return to Chile. By September 1985 this list had been reduced to 3,878 names and in December another 30 exiles were removed from the list. The list is determined by administrative decree and is not subject to judicial review. According to government officials, approximately 800 of nearly 7,000 exiles authorized to return to Chile since 1983 have actually re-entered Chile, the rest remaining abroad. There were reports in 1985 that some exiles not on the official list were nonetheless not permitted to return to Chile; however, no evidence of such a "secret" list has been found. In 1985 no individuals were exiled by judicial decision or under Transitory Article 24. By way of comparison, in 1984 eight were externally exiled by judicial decisions and another eight were exiled under Article 24. In 1985, 168 persons were internally exiled for up to three months by administrative order under Transitory Article 24 not subject to judicial review (compared to 727 in 1984 and 127 in 1983). At the end of 1985, there were 29 people under internal banishment orders; they will complete their 90-day sentence in early February 1986. Most were sent to distant villages as punishment for political activities or because they were regarded by authorities to be habitual offenders. In 1985 no one was sent into internal exile judicially, compared to 5 such cases in 1984.

Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited, and there have been no complaints on this issue since the mid-1970's.

e. Right of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial remained limited throughout 1985, particularly for those detained under Transitory Article 24. First-instance jurisdiction for the prosecution of proscribed political activities lies with regular civilian courts. Chile's civilian judges are career officials and most served in the judiciary before the present Government took power in 1973. As in most civil law systems, trial is not by jury, and reliance is on the written record rather than oral testimony; and the judge directs the investigation and finally decides innocence or guilt. There is a well-developed multi-stage appeal process leading ultimately to the Supreme Court, but defendants detained under the authority of Transitory Article 24 do not enjoy full legal rights, such as right to legal counsel of their choice, or to the normal appeals system. As in 1984, in 1985 there were fewer accusations than in past years that judges failed to investigate vigorously charges of government abuses. Judicial investigations are proceeding in a number of human rights cases from 1985 and earlier years, including the 1976 disappearance of 13 people.

Weapons violations, which often are the basis of charges against terrorists, are tried before a military court. Appeals may be made to a military court of two civilian judges and three professional military judges and, in the last resort, to the entire civilian Supreme Court.

In March the Military Judge for Santiago issued a decision that the Council of War Tribunals established under a special decree of 1981 had been, in effect, abolished by the anti-terrorist law of May 1984. The Council of War Tribunals, which were to act only under exceptional conditions (such as during a State of Siege), had been empowered to hand down a sentence of either death or life imprisonment, with the right of appeal only to the President. The military judge's decision moved all cases involving terrorist acts or weapons to the normal military judicial system, which has very limited authority to impose the death penalty or life imprisonment and provides all the normal recourse to appeal available to any other defendant.

In October the Supreme Court held that a civilian judge could continue an investigation into the March deaths of three individuals, after preliminary investigations had shown that several Carabinero officials might be implicated in these deaths. Military courts previously had shown reluctance to allow civilian courts to try military personnel, but in this instance the chief of the military tribunal in Santiago refused to accept the cases and turned them over to the civilian investigating judge, setting the stage for the Supreme Court's decision.

CHILE

At the end of 1985, the Vicariate of Solidarity, the Catholic Church's human rights office, which has provided objective reports on human rights concerns, reported that 1,070 persons in Chile faced prosecution or were convicted and imprisoned for politically motivated acts, some of which were violent. Of these individuals, as of December 1985: 267 were in jail awaiting trial; 43 were serving sentences after convictions; 672 individuals were free on bail while awaiting trial; 74 were serving sentences outside of prison on parole; 3 were serving sentences in exile, and 11 were considered as fugitives.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Searches of the home and interception of private verbal or written communications are permitted by the 1980 Constitution, provided that search warrants are issued by either a civilian or military court for specific locations. Wiretapping is also permitted subject to issuance of a judicial order. The 1984 anti-terrorist law provides legal authority for surveillance of those advocating political views contrary to the 1980 Constitution and for interception, opening or recording of private communications and documents as well as the surveillance of individuals suspected of terrorist crimes. In 1985 searches of homes were carried out under general warrants issued by civilian or military courts. There were reports that security forces did not always comply with the legal requirements for search warrants or judicial orders.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The 1980 Constitution guarantees freedom of expression and of the press. There are no constitutional provisions for official censorship although new periodicals must have government approval to begin operations. Nevertheless, in 1985 the Government exercised considerable control over the media under the authority of Transitory Article 24 and the two states of exception concurrently in force throughout the year, and particularly during the six months the State of Siege was in effect. Under the State of Emergency, the President is empowered to restrict the freedom of information and opinion. Under the State of Siege, he may suspend or restrict the exercise of the right of assembly, freedom of information, freedom of opinion, the functions of trade unions, and censor mail and other communications. While free speech is normally respected for private conversations in Chile, human rights groups assert that extensive monitoring of mail and telephonic communications is conducted by the government security services.

In addition, since 1973, the Government has formally and informally advised print, radio and television of acceptable norms of coverage for domestic developments. Self-censorship is practiced by the media, with most editors adopting a cautious approach in formulating commentary. Several major media companies are seriously in debt to government financial institutions, which provides potential economic leverage to the Government over news reporting and editorial content.

The lifting of the State of Siege in mid-1985 brought significant improvements in the area of freedom of the press.

CHILE

Although the Government still had broad authority under the states of exception which remained in force, after mid-June that authority was generally exercised with restraint. Opposition magazines resumed publication. Editors were no longer required to submit their copy to government censors for clearance prior to publication. The Government, however, continued to take legal actions against some members of opposition magazines accused of violations of security laws. For example, the director of the magazine Mensaje, Jesuit priest Renato Hevia, was detained for two weeks in December for writing editorials which allegedly libeled government officials. Radio and television programs featuring political debates appeared regularly in the latter half of 1985. Media coverage of political, terrorist and criminal activities increased substantially and political gossip columns again were in evidence. However, at least two newspaper columnists were told during 1985 that their contributions were no longer welcome because of offense given to the Government. Even after the State of Siege was lifted, several publications faced prosecution because of charges of violating restrictions on press activities.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association continued to be restricted in 1985. The states of exception to the basic rights provided in the Constitution placed severe restrictions on those seeking to redress grievances against the Government by means of peaceful demonstrations or public meetings. Leaders of opposition groups and trade union organizations were arrested for holding, instigating or organizing unauthorized demonstrations. The states of exception to the Constitution generally have not interfered with other activities, including elections, of most trade unions and professional associations. Under State of Siege provisions, but not the State of Emergency, the Government was empowered to restrict the exercise of the rights of association and trade union organization.

Permission for public rallies must be sought from the authorities at least five days in advance and is obtained only by those organizations or groups which have legal status (personeria juridica). Political parties and some national trade union organizations are not now authorized under the law, so they are unable to demonstrate this legal status. Those who organize or call for unauthorized demonstrations are subject to arrest and prosecution, as happened in the case of trade union, neighborhood committee, and student organization leaders arrested in connection with the September protests. Most of those arrested in this case were soon released and the charges against student leaders were dropped, but several of the union and neighborhood association leaders remained in prison until December 1985, when all were released provisionally pending the results of a judicial investigation.

The Government authorized the Democratic Alliance, which groups together several moderate democratic political parties, to hold a public rally in Santiago on November 21. In the largest public meeting since 1973, thousands of Chileans demonstrated peacefully at the rally, urging a return to democracy. The Government permitted purchase of radio and television time to advertise the protest, which received national television coverage. The Government subsequently denied the Democratic Alliance permission to hold other protests in the cities of Antofagasta and Puerto Montt, citing terrorist threats.

Legally recognized unions do not need to seek government permission to hold union meetings or conferences and in 1985 carried out collective bargaining, strikes, and internal union elections. Some trade unions have had their premises searched, usually after union leaders have been detained for participating in illegal demonstrations. In 1985 there were reports that individual labor leaders were dismissed under circumstances suggesting that they lost their jobs because of criticism of management or of the Government.

Trade union leaders and some industrial relations analysts continue to hold that the decree-laws known as the "Labor Plan" unduly restrict the rights of organized labor. Under the Labor Plan, workers at units employing 25 or more individuals can form a union by majority vote and elect their officers from among their co-workers. Government recognition is easily and quickly obtained. Officers of trade union organizations (including federations and confederations) must remain employed in their jobs in plants represented by their unions but are legally entitled to specified paid time off for their union work. Trade union leaders maintain that the Labor Plan restricts the development of strong, independent unions by permitting collective bargaining at the plant level only; by allowing the development of national federations or confederations on an industry-wide basis only; by limiting the right to strike to 60 days; and by allowing management to hire strikebreakers while a legal strike or collective bargaining is taking place. Limiting collective bargaining to the plant level, they say, prevents the unions from coordinating collective bargaining goals and objectives on a national scale.

The right to strike is prohibited in designated strategic industries, primarily the public utilities, government copper mines, and the petroleum industry. For these companies, failure to reach agreement during negotiations leads to binding arbitration.

In 1981 the labor courts were incorporated into the normal judicial system, but there have been complaints from labor and management that the system does not work well. During 1985 progress was made towards re-establishing separate labor courts, and final action is expected in early 1986.

Government employees are allowed to form associations but not unions. Public employees do not have the right to bargain collectively or to strike. Professional groups and associations have not been limited by recent decree laws which are aimed at eliminating closed-shop type compulsory licensing privileges.

Labor unions are permitted to maintain relations with non-Marxist international labor bodies in their fields. Chilean worker delegates participating in conferences of the International Labor Organization (ILO), have had their credentials challenged by other Chilean labor groups. The ILO's Credentials Committee has urged the government of Chile to consult with all major trade union confederations in Chile without exception. There were no new complaints filed in 1985 in the ILO against the Government concerning violations of ILO conventions relating to freedom of association, employment, forced labor, and unemployment policies. There were, however, additional complaints filed against Chile with the ILO related to violations by the government of trade union rights during the State of Siege.

Organized labor continued to press for a full investigation of the 1982 murder of labor leader Tucapel Jimenez, who had tried to establish a national union. There were reports in 1983 of evidence implicating persons associated with the National Information Center (CNI) in this murder. In September 1985, however, the investigating judge suspended further consideration of the case due to the absence of new developments. This decision may be appealed, but prospects for pursuing the investigation appear to depend on developing new evidence.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees absolute freedom of religion. Although Chile is predominantly Roman Catholic, there are no restrictions on freedom of religion and no official discrimination is practiced against any religious group. A number of Protestant denominations and other groups are active and report full freedom and tolerance, as does the Jewish community. Religious belief and adherence appear to have no effect on acceptability for government positions in Chile.

Nonetheless, the political violence apparent in other sectors of Chilean society has affected religious institutions as well. During 1985 the Catholic Church, which has played a major role in attempting to encourage dialogue between the democratic political groups and the Government, has been subjected to politically motivated attacks, generally by unidentified groups. Such assaults have affected Church property, officials, and lay workers associated with various activities, including the human rights arm of the Church, the Vicariate of Solidarity. Churches have been bombed or attacked with gunfire, priests physically attacked or threatened with death, lay workers kidnapped and mistreated, church offices broken into and files relating to church work stolen, and anonymous letters and phone calls received containing various threats against church officials or priests. According to some of the victims of these actions, they are often questioned by their assailants concerning their work with church groups and the activities of various priests or church organizations. Responsibility for these attacks is difficult to place, but some appear to be the work of a right-wing terrorist group called the Chilean Anti-Communist Action (Accion Chilena Anticomunista). Reportedly this terrorist organization was formed in 1946 to halt the spread of Communism to Chile, and was organized along military lines. Some human rights groups have asserted that government security forces are responsible for at least some of these assaults.

During 1985, there were at least fourteen bomb attacks against the Mormon Church, particularly against church buildings. Left wing terrorist groups have claimed responsibility for such attacks, which appear to be motivated by the views of leftists extremists identifying the Mormon Church with both the Chilean Government and the United States. No foreign priests were expelled from Chile during 1985, but several were detained for short periods for involvement in protest demonstrations against the Government.

CHILE

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Chileans have full constitutional freedom to move about within or to leave their country. As many as one million Chileans live abroad, principally for economic reasons. Most of them have resided for many years in Argentina. In the judgment of international organizations dealing with migrants, the volume of skilled and unskilled workers returning to Chile now roughly equals the number leaving. Most of the current emigrants seem to be motivated by economic rather than political factors, and no impediments have been placed in the way of their return. There have been no complaints concerning the treatment of either political or economic repatriates.

Chile has accepted a few refugees from other countries in recent years and makes regular, modest financial contributions to international organizations aiding refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Under the Constitution, a plebiscite is to be held before March 1989 to accept or reject a candidate for president to be chosen by the military junta. If approved, he will serve until 1997; if rejected, there will be open presidential elections one year later. Congressional elections are scheduled no later than early 1990. Once a Congress takes office in 1990, the military junta will be abolished. Until then, the junta exercises legislative authority, subject to presidential approval.

The Government has stated its intention to carry out the provisions of the Constitution. In spite of extensive discussion and study, no progress was made in 1985 in legalizing political parties, establishing the electoral law governing elections or reestablishing electoral registers. The junta did promulgate an electoral court law on November 15, after revising it to conform with the ruling of the Constitutional Tribunal which declared an earlier version of the law unconstitutional. According to the 1980 Constitution, any plebiscite to change the Constitution can be held only after publication of a new electoral law, which would also require reestablishment of electoral registers.

The Tribunal had held on September 24 that the 1980 Constitution requires the functioning of an independent electoral court in time to supervise any plebiscite called during the transition period, including the presidential plebiscite of 1989. Some democratic opposition leaders have noted that this decision should assist in establishing standards for legitimate elections, including open access to the media, free expression of public opinions, and the absence of political, social and economic pressures restricting a free choice among alternatives.

The political opposition rejects significant elements of the 1980 Constitution, including the provisions related to presidential and congressional elections, the powers of the presidency and military embodied in the Constitution, and restrictions on civil liberties, among others. Opposition political parties consider the 1980 Constitution undemocratic. Democratic opposition parties want the Constitution revised or replaced in a process of negotiations with the Government, while undemocratic leftist parties, particularly the Communist Party, a faction of the Socialist Party and the terrorist Revolutionary Movement of the Left (MIR) seek the complete overthrow of the Government, the dismantling of the armed forces and the establishment of a Marxist regime. Since the State of Siege was lifted in mid-June, opposition groups have participated in demonstrations related to the general theme of a return to elected civilian government.

Eleven democratic opposition groups organized in a loose coalition signed a "National Accord for the Transition to Full Democracy" on August 26 and have joined leaders of the Catholic Church in urging the Government to begin serious dialogue on this accord. The National Accord document calls for an orderly transition to democratic rule through the restoration of political rights, free elections for the president and the entire congress, and a procedure to allow for amendment of the Constitution by plebiscite in case of a deadlock between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. The document, which was the result of intense negotiations under the auspices of the Archbishop of Santiago, states that political parties that do not respect democratic principles are to be banned by a proposed constitutional tribunal. Although there is disagreement among Accord members regarding interpretation of several clauses, the National Accord implicitly accepts the 1980 Constitution if the present Government is willing to modify it in accordance with the principles set forth in the Accord.

In its initial response, the Government noted certain positive elements in the Accord, but demanded greater clarity on other points. In December, however, the Government virtually rejected the Accord, claiming that public statements by the Accord signers were contradictory with respect to certain points, such as recognition of the 1980 Constitution, a clear position on the political proscription of Communists, unrestricted respect for private property, and a rejection of violence. The Government has not agreed to hold a dialogue with the democratic opposition.

Political parties continue to be proscribed by law but function in an open manner, particularly since the State of Siege ended. The views and opinions of political leaders, including Communists, are published in the media, especially their comments on the National Accord.

University students continued their political activities in 1985, holding elections for a number of student federations at the end of October. Student demonstrations occurred in September and October on a number of campuses, often involving confrontations between demonstrators and the authorities, as student groups sought to reduce government control over the universities.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government announced on October 18 that it was authorizing a visit to Chile by the United Nations Human Rights Commission's Special Rapporteur, the result of the first official and formal contact with the UNHRC since 1979. The Special Rapporteur was provided complete freedom to meet with all those concerned with human rights during his visit to Chile in December.

The Government continues to refuse to cooperate with the Inter-American Human Rights Commission and has denied permission for the Commission to enter Chile. A Commission report on Chile published in September, which covers the human rights situation from 1973 to 1985, was rejected by the Government as being biased and inconsistent with the Commission's mandate. Human rights groups welcomed the report, terming it the most detailed report ever on the human rights situation in Chile.

Visits and investigations by private international human rights groups continued to be allowed by the Government. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross regularly visit Chile to check on prison conditions. The American Committee for Human Rights sent a mission to Chile in July to investigate the use of torture, the role of the medical community in torture, and the psychological impact of torture on the general population. The mission was undertaken at the invitation of the Medical Association of Chile and the Chilean Commission for Human Rights. Amnesty International issued a report on Chile in September in which it expressed concern over human rights abuses by armed groups, particularly the Chilean Anti-Communist Action Group. The National Academy of Science Committee on Human Rights and the American Psychological and Psychiatric Associations also sent fact-finding missions to Chile in 1985.

The Government contends that virtually all reports produced by foreign organizations deliberately distort the scope and volume of human rights abuses in Chile. Government spokesmen admit that there have been human rights violations by individuals in the security forces but claim that complaints concerning such violations are investigated and that legal actions are taken against those individuals who are found to be involved. Human rights organizations note that government investigations rarely lead to fixing responsibility for violations and extremely few members of the security forces have been punished despite a large number of documented abuses.

The Catholic Church since 1973 has taken the lead in defending human rights and supplying legal counsel to those accused of politically related crimes and to victims of human rights abuse. Its Vicariate of Solidarity monitors the human rights situation from church offices throughout Chile, has issued objective monthly reports on human rights violations and has protected and defended significant numbers of people since 1973. The church's activities have resulted in visible tensions between the Government and the church hierarchy. Some church activists and human rights lawyers have been threatened anonymously or have been the victims of intimidation attacks by unidentified individuals. A member of the Vicariate staff was one of those kidnaped and murdered in March.

The Chilean Commission for Human Rights, a private organization directed by opposition political party figures, has also publicized alleged abuses and spoken out strongly against them, as well as issuing monthly reports on the human rights situation. It has been allowed to maintain affiliations with international human rights groups, and has hosted visits by these groups to Chile. It devotes its efforts openly not only to human rights issues but also to political issues and to bringing about major changes in the nature of the Government. On November 29 two armed men broke into the offices of the Commission, and, after beating the caretaker, stole material related to the work of the Commission. There have been no arrests concerning this break-in. Human rights groups have expressed concern over the use of such methods of intimidation and believe that these assaults are an effort to terrorize those who work with or assist human rights and political organizations. Human rights groups are concerned that these incidents may mark the beginning of a "dirty war" by right-wing terrorist groups against those opposing the Government. Two of the victims of multiple assaults by unknown assailants departed Chile out of fear for their personal safety. Official investigations into such incidents have yet to produce arrests.

Amnesty International Report 1985, covering 1984 events, expressed concern about the long-standing pattern of human rights violations, including the detention of political prisoners and the torture of detainees.

Freedom House rated Chile "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Chile's population of 12.0 million grew at an annual rate of 1.8 percent in 1985. The per capita gross domestic product was $1681.

Chile suffered a severe recession in 1982 and agreed to a two-year standby program with the International Monetary Fund in January 1983 to provide essential support for balance of payments purposes and orderly external debt servicing. A follow-up three-year IMF extended fund facility took effect in August 1985. The new program limits the government's ability to further stimulate the economy, and to counteract the social effects of high unemployment and underemployment.

Chile achieved a significant real GDP growth of 6.3 percent in 1984. Tighter fiscal and monetary policies led to a government-estimated GDP growth rate of 2 percent for 1985. According to Chilean Central Bank statistics for 1985, inflation in 1985 was 26.4 percent and real wages declined by 1.5 percent through October 31. Unemployment equaled 13 percent down from 14.0 percent at the end of 1984, with the unemployment rate in the Santiago metropolitan area 16.3 percent. Two government financed work projects aimed at unemployed people utilize 7.2 percent of the work force, and this number is often cited as the level of under employment in Chile.

In 1984, 61 percent of all central budget expenditures went to social services. The Government focuses its social programs on the 15 percent of the population living below the absolute poverty level. Health and nutrition programs in Chile are extensive. The infant mortality rate was 21.8 per 1,000 live births in 1985, and average life expectancy at birth was 70.6 years. In 1977, the caloric supply as a percentage of nutritional requirements was 105.4 percent. In 1980, 84 percent of the population had access to safe water. The primary school enrollment ratio was 148.2 percent in 1980 and the adult literacy rate increased to 94.5 percent in 1984.

CHILE

Child labor is regulated by law. Young people between the ages of 14 and 15 may only be employed with the permission of their parents or guardians and if they have completed their schooling, and then only in restricted types of labor. Those between the ages of 15 and 18 can be employed in a larger variety of labor, and at expanded hours of labor, but only with their parents' or guardians' permission.

Minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health are regulated by law, although there have been criticisms that the minimum wage has not been adjusted expeditiously to keep pace with inflation. The law permits the hiring of apprentices, but has been revised so that a "less than minimum" wage may not be paid. The laws covering child labor are not abused, but supervision over the compliance of these laws is difficult. Regulations covering the hours of work are widely publicized, and the need to pay overtime is generally acknowledged. Enforcement on compliance is difficult due to budgetary restraints; however, no industry stands out as an obvious violator of these employment standards. There are also complaints that occupational health and safety laws are not adequately enforced.

Legal distinctions between the sexes still exist. For example, the legal retirement age for women is five years lower than that for men. Married women may not conduct major commercial transactions unless a separation of goods contract is established at the time of the marriage, or through a subsequent special one-time authorization. Married women may not take children out of the country without the permission of the father. On the other hand, inheritance laws provide strong protection for wives and favor female over male heirs. Women now enjoy greater access to education and employment than in the past. In 1983, women made up 48.8 percent of the primary school enrollment, 50.5 percent of secondary school pupils and 40 percent of university students. In 1970, the last year for which a breakdown by sex is available, female literacy was 88.2 percent compared with 89.9 percent for males. Women have served in such important government positions as mayors, agency heads and ministers. Women enjoy good access to entry-level and mid-level professional jobs but do not hold a proportional number of upper-level positions.

Minority groups do not suffer any specific legal discriminations. The only significant minority group, the Mapuche Indians from the southern region of Chile, remains partly separated from the rest of the society due to historical, cultural, educational, and geographic factors rather than official policy. The Government has attempted to integrate this group through, among other things, division of communal lands into individual land holdings, which has caused resistance among some Mapuches. There were no reports of members of this group being singled out for detention or banishment due to their being Mapuche Indians.

COLOMBIA

Colombia is a two-party democracy in which elected governments have ruled for all but four years (1953-57) of this century. While Colombia's two traditional political parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, have dominated the political arena since the mid-19th century, smaller parties have fielded candidates at all levels and are usually represented in Congress, state assemblies and city councils. Governors and mayors are appointed by the President under a constitutional provision requiring "adequate and equitable" representation of the major party not holding the Presidency. On January 1, 1986, the constitution was amended to provide for direct election of mayors beginning in March 1988.

Notwithstanding its long tradition of electoral democracy, Colombia continues to experience high levels of both political and criminal violence. For most of the past 35 years, the country has lived under a constitutionally authorized state of siege to deal with civil disturbances, insurgent movements and, most recently, organized crime. The state of siege was lifted in 1982 but reimposed following the assassination of the Minister of Justice on April 30, 1984 by narcotics traffickers.

Colombia has a mixed economy, with expenditures of the central, departmental (state) and municipal governments accounting for about 35 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) in 1985. Private enterprise plays a substantial role in the economy: the coffee industry (which accounts for one-half of the country's exports) is in private hands. At the same time, state enterprises control the domestic participation in major industries such as oil, steel, and coal. The service sector accounts for half of GDP; agriculture and mining one-fourth; and manufacturing has grown to 22 percent of GDP.

In his 1982 inaugural address, current President Belisario Betancur stated that he would give the highest priority to achieving sustained peace in Colombia. After the Congress passed an amnesty for guerrillas in 1982, the Government negotiated cease-fire agreements in 1984 with four of Colombia's five major insurgent groups: the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC); the 19th of April Movement (M-19); the Popular Liberation Army (EPL); and the Workers' Self-Defense Movement (ADO). Two factions of a fifth group, the National Liberation Army (ELN), signed an accord later, on December 9, 1985. In these agreements the guerrillas generally pledged to cease hostilities for one year provided the Government followed suit and supported political and economic reforms aimed at "opening up Colombia's limited democratic system." The Government agreed to observe a one-year cease-fire; to submit political and economic reform measures to Congress for approval; and to establish three commissions to facilitate the peace process. The Government was also to seek legislation for a general pardon. At the end of the cease-fire, if all went well, both sides committed themselves to entering into an indefinite period of sustained peace.

COLOMBIA

However, in mid-1985, the M-19 and the EPL accused the Government of failing to abide by the accords and subsequently joined forces with other guerrilla factions to renew combat. Fighting between government forces and the M-19 reached pre-ceasefire levels in June, especially in the Department of Cauca. On November 6, the M-19 attacked and siezed control of the Palace of Justice, which housed the Supreme Court and the Council of State, in central Bogota. Government forces ended the attack the following day. Over 100 persons died, including all the attackers (estimated at 35) and 11 Justices of the Supreme Court. According to eyewitness accounts of surviving hostages, the attackers executed the President of the Supreme Court during the night of November 6-7.

Meanwhile, in March 1985, the FARC established a political party known as the Patriotic Union (FARC-UP) and requested the reorganization of the three peace commissions and a nine-month extension of the cease-fire. In mid-October, the President named a new 20-member peace commission to assume the functions of the three former commissions, while he considers whether to extend the cease-fire.

In spite of the Government's efforts to achieve sustained peace, political and criminal violence have continued. Legislation limiting the applicability of preventive detention to more serious criminal offences was a significant development in the area of human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In this period of active insurgency, statistics on killings and disappearances are undependable and subject to differing interpretations. The Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights has asserted that during the year ending July 1985, 644 people were killed by the armed forces, police, secret agents, paramilitary groups, or unknown persons. The Committee also listed 292 death threats and 178 woundings by security forces and paramilitary organizations. The vast majority of these alleged incidents were reported to have taken place in rural areas, where the armed forces were fighting guerrilla groups. In such cases, persons wounded or killed may have been engaged in guerrilla or criminal activity. The Committee's data are based on press reports, personal testimony, and complaints filed by relatives and friends of alleged victims. The Committee seldom investigates incidents but turns over the information gathered to the Government's Prosecutor's office.

Colombian armed forces statistics covering the period July 28, 1984 through July 17, 1985 reported the deaths of 168 policemen, 178 members of the armed forces, and 605 guerrillas. During the same period, the armed forces reported that 272 civilians were assassinated by guerrillas for collaborating with military and/or police forces. A statement by the Director General of National Police published in the press on December 27 reported that 199 policemen had been killed and 480 wounded in the line of duty during 1985.

In mid-December, Colombian authorities announced that they had discovered six common graves near Toribio containing over 100 bodies, including women and children, many of whom had been tortured. Some of the victims were dressed in the uniform of the Ricardo Franco Front (RFF) of the FARC. The authorities continued to find new graves and bodies through the remainder of the month. In early January 1986, RFF leader Javier Delgado said that his group was responsible and had executed 158 of its own members accused of being army spies. The M-19 broke relations with the RFF over the incident and, according to press reports, the RFF relieved Delgado of his command and said he would be tried for "arbitrary detentions, torture, and homicide." On January 14, 1986 the president of Colombia's Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights issued a statement condemning the killings, describing them as "one of the most horrifying criminal acts to have taken place in many years in Colombia."

b. Disappearance

In a report issued December 28, 1985, the Attorney General of Colombia said that 344 persons had disappeared during the first 11 months of the year, compared with 150 disappearances in 1984. Of those reported in 1985, 71 had been released safely, 67 had been found dead, and the remaining 206 were still missing. The report noted that 32 members of the police and armed forces had been subject to investigation or other legal proceedings in connection with these disappearances; it did not specify the nature or outcome of the investigation or legal actions. The Permanent Committee reported that 103 people had disappeared or were kidnapped in the period January-July 1985. It attributed 36 of these incidents to military and police forces, 52 to paramilitary groups and the remaining 15 to persons unknown. The Colombian military intelligence organization (D-2) reported 165 kidnappings through the first nine months of 1985. It reported that of these, 41 victims had been freed, 18 had been killed, 13 had been rescued, and 93 were still being held. D-2 compared these figures with 299 kidnappings that it had reported for all of 1984.

A Colombian press report published December 30 stated that 149 kidnappings had taken place in 1985. The report attributed 42 of the kidnappings to the FARC, 17 to the M-19, 3 to the EPL, and 87 to common criminals. A report prepared privately by a former military judge and published in the Colombian press January 3, 1986, stated that 216 kidnappings had taken place in 1985. The report did not attribute responsibility to any group or groups.

Eight U.S. citizens were kidnapped in Colombia in 1985: one by persons claiming to be from the Revolutionary Workers' Party (PRT) on August 16, four by the FARC on October 5, and three by persons claiming to be members of the EPL on December 10. One of those kidnapped by the FARC escaped from his captors two days later; the other three were released by the FARC on November 6. The individual kidnapped by the PRT was released December 22. One of those kidnapped on December 10 was released the following day; the other two remained in captivity as the new year began, and there had been no information about their safety or well-being since their abduction.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In a report issued December 28, 1985, the Attorney General of Colombia reported that his office had investigated 242 cases of alleged torture of individuals by the police between 1983 and October 1985. According to the report, in 12 cases the charges had been substantiated and police officers had been punished, in two cases the officers had been absolved, and in 27 cases officers had been charged and the charges were under judicial review. The report stated that the remaining cases were still under investigation. The Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights reported 297 cases of torture between August 1984 and August 1985. It attributed 173 cases to military and police forces, 77 to paramilitary organizations, and the remainder to persons unknown. It stated that most of the reported cases occurred in rural areas. In a judicial decision in June, the Third Panel of the Civil Wing of the Council of State ruled in favor of a doctor who claimed to have been tortured while detained by the armed forces as a suspected M-19 guerrilla in 1979 and 1980. Based on the Panel's ruling, the Council of State ordered the Government to indemnify the doctor and to investigate the conduct of government officials linked to the case, including the current Minister of Defense, who at the time was commander of the military installation where the doctor was detained. The Ministry of Defense has posted a bond in order to appeal the ruling of the Panel to the full Council of State. The case will now be reviewed by all 16 judges constituting the Council; of them, the four judges of the Third Panel will have a voice but no vote in the final ruling.

Colombian prisons are notoriously overcrowded and understaffed due to the practice of preventive detention and inadequate budgets. In most prisons, inmates receive a subsistence diet which they must supplement with purchases from prison stores. Prisoners with financial resources live better than those without. Family members and friends are allowed to visit regularly and to bring food and clothes. Consular officers are given regular access to foreign prisoners. Most prisoners accused of crimes in connection with guerrilla activities are incarcerated in regular prisons, although segregated from common criminals.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides for habeas corpus procedures, and the law requires that individuals be brought to court within 72 hours of arrest in most cases. These requirements are for the most part respected in practice. Persons detained for disturbance of public order can be held up to 10 days before charges must be filed. There are no legal provisions for exile.

Forced or compulsory labor is legally prohibited, and the prohibition is respected in practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The rights of public trial and due process are guaranteed to all by the Constitution, and a prisoner may be represented by an attorney of his choice. If he has none, the court will appoint one. Historically, however, an overburdened and underfunded judicial system and the widespread practice of preventive detention have meant that most prisoners incarcerated for common crimes never come to trial but are simply released after serving the minimum sentence applicable to their alleged crime. In September 1985, there were approximately 30,000 persons in prison, of whom 9,000 had been tried and found guilty.

COLOMBIA

In 1985, the Congress passed two laws which are expected to have a positive effect on the human rights situation in judicial and penal areas. The first authorizes the Ministry of Justice to hire up to 200 special judges to try cases of extortion, kidnapping and terrorism. To reduce the backlog of cases, the law expands the authority of police inspectors to try less serious crimes. A second law, which entered into force on July 8 eliminates provisional arrest for defendants charged with misdemeanors; as of late September 1985, approximately 3,000 prisoners had been released under provisions of this law.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution requires a court order before authorities can enter a private home, except in the case of hot pursuit. While Colombian human rights organizations allege widespread violations in the more remote areas, the concept of the sanctity of the home and privacy is widely respected in most parts of the country. Persons from rural areas frequently claim that they have been forced to leave their farms by military counterinsurgency operations, guerrilla conscription/confiscation, and paramilitary thugs hired by local landowners.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These constitutionally guaranteed rights are as a rule respected, and the press often vigorously criticizes the Government and its leaders. The privately owned print media are under no government restraints and publish a wide variety of political views. Television channels are controlled by the state, which leases time to private companies. The Government does not permit private news programs to broadcast interviews which last longer than ten minutes; during political campaigns, news programs cannot broadcast the voice of a candidate whose campaign rally is being filmed. There is no such restriction on talk shows. A section of a bill on electoral reform before the Congress, under consideration for about a year, calls for guaranteed access to the electronic media for all political parties.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings and demonstrations are normally held without interference. Under the state of siege, prior permission is required for demonstrations and is usually granted, except when there is a clear and present danger to public order. As an example of the latter restriction, President Betancur declared the communist-promoted general strike of June 20 illegal on the grounds that terrorists planned to take advantage of the strike to disrupt public services and attack public institutions. When the Communists went forward with the strike, the Government suspended their legal status and froze the funds of six participating labor federations for six months.

Colombian workers enjoy very strong legal protections, including the right to organize and, in the private sector, to bargain collectively and strike. Use of strikebreakers is prohibited, and heavy severance benefits are intended to discourage management from firing union militants. However, benefits in practice are much more limited. Many provisions of the law are scarcely enforced and are effectively ignored by small and medium-sized enterprises. Amidst conditions of severe labor surplus, labor has limited bargaining power and has been unsuccessful in organizing beyond the ranks of the largest employers and the public services.

Only about eight percent of Colombia's economically active population is unionized, according to the latest government census of trade unions. The total of 880,000 union members is divided almost equally between the traditional "confederated" labor sector and the leftist/independent sector. Of the four confederations, two are affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, one with the World Federation of Trade Unions, and one with the World Confederation of Labor.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees freedom of religion. Although an overwhelming majority of Colombians are Roman Catholics, no constitutional discrimination exists against any religious group. In practice, however, non-Catholic and/or evangelical Christian groups operating in Colombia have found it increasingly difficult during the past year to obtain entry and resident visas for additional, or even replacement mission workers. According to official statistics, 217 different religious sects are registered in Colombia.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Colombians are free to leave the country without unusual restriction. In areas under government control where operations against rural guerrilla groups are underway, travelling civilians require "safe conduct" passes; guerrillas reportedly use a similar means to restrict travel in areas where they are active.

Colombians who have sought and have been granted "diplomatic asylum" in foreign embassies have always been allowed to depart. Expatriates can, by law, repatriate. Colombia in the past has accepted refugees; however, because of high unemployment and underemployment, the Government is increasingly reluctant to accept displaced persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Colombia has a two-party democratic system of government, and elections are conducted fairly and openly. Persons are enfranchised by the constitution at age 18. Those convicted of certain crimes may be disenfranchised. Public employees are forbidden by law to participate in political campaigns but, with the exception of military personnel, can vote. Colombian politics are dominated by two major parties, the Liberal and the Conservative, and each includes elements with widely divergent political views. All parties are free to raise funds, field candidates, hold public meetings, have access to the media, and publish their own newspapers. Almost seven million voters--approximately 60 percent of those eligible--turned out for the May 30, 1982, presidential election, the greatest participation in recent history. Many went to the polls despite guerrilla threats to punish those who did so. Elections are scheduled twice in 1986; in March to elect a new Congress, and in May to elect a new president.

COLOMBIA

President Betancur's program to reach a permanent peace settlement with guerrilla groups has several important electoral implications: first, two of the political reforms promoted by the guerrillas and subsequently submitted by the Administration to Congress for approval concern the popular election of mayors and general electoral reform. Legislation providing for direct election of mayors beginning in March 1988 passed Congress and was signed into law by President Betancur January 1, 1986. Second, the participation of the Patriotic Union, or FARC-UP, in the 1986 elections has generated a heated controversy over the possibility of "armed proselytizing" by the FARC-UP in rural areas. The FARC-UP presidential candidate withdrew from the race in January 1986, citing safety concerns. The party plans to name an alternate candidate. The Administration has announced the establishment of an electoral commission to oversee and guarantee free and fair elections in 1986.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Colombia has actively participated in international and regional human rights bodies, is currently a member of the UN Human Rights Commission, and has welcomed nongovernmental human rights organizations.

In September 1985, the Colombian press published the text of Amnesty International's report on the status of Colombian human rights in 1984. The report expressed concern over extrajudicial executions and systematic torture carried out "as a matter of policy" by some army and police entities, as well as cases of execution-style killings of kidnap victims held captive by guerrilla organizations. Amnesty International also noted that there were substantially fewer reports of such abuses than in previous years and welcomed measures by the Attorney General and civilian courts to investigate and prosecute military and police officials alleged to be responsible for serious abuses of authority.

Partially in response to Amnesty International's report, the Attorney General's office established a new human rights advisory commission to investigate alleged violations and propose corrective measures. The new commission will be headed by the Deputy Attorney General and will include representatives of the military, the police, the Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights, and the Association of Families of Disappeared Persons.

The Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights is the most active Colombian human rights organization. The Committee's 94 members include among others the current Justice Minister, members of the Congress, journalists, labor leaders, and persons in the arts, including Nobel laureate Gabriel Garcia Marquez. The Committee compiles statistics based on press stories and personal testimonies, which it turns over to the Government for investigation and, if necessary, prosecution. It has no staff or budget to be able to verify such reports by conducting independent inquiries. The Committee's statistics have been used extensively by international organizations such as Amnesty International, Americas Watch, and the Washington Office on Latin America. The Permanent Committee also sponsors periodic human rights forums in Colombia.

COLOMBIA

In early January 1986, the New York-based human rights group Americas Watch published a report saying that Colombia's armed forces were responsible for summary executions, torture, and "disappearances" in actions against leftist guerrillas. The report also attributed kidnappings and killings of civilian noncombatants to leftist guerrillas. "As conflicts have increased between the guerrillas and the military, human rights violations have accelerated dramatically," the report said.

Freedom House has classified Colombia as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

According to nearly complete returns from an October 1985 census, Colombia's population is 27,000,000. It grew at a rate of 2.0 percent in 1985. The per capita GNP was $1,430 in 1983.

The period of slower economic growth which began in 1980 has continued. While the real Gross Domestic Product showed an increase of three percent in 1984, for 1985 it is expected to be between two and three percent. Inflation, which declined from 24.5 percent in 1982 to 16.2 percent in 1984, rose again to 22.25 percent in 1985. Government data shows unemployment increased to 14.7 percent in July 1985, with underemployment estimated at 14 to 16 percent. According to Colombian labor experts, however, official labor statistics do not take into account an estimated 2.5 million children under 15 who work for low pay under poor conditions and with little protection from the Colombian Labor Code. Although increases in minimum wages have more than kept pace with increases in the cost of living in past years, a large percentage of workers do not earn the minimum wage. The Government's economic adjustment program called for a maximum 10 percent increase in wages in 1985 and for a wage increase somewhere between 10 percent and the increase in the prevailing cost of living in 1986.

There is inequality in the distribution of the nation's income and wealth, with the wealthiest 10 percent of the population receiving 40 percent of the national income and the poorest 20 percent only 5 percent (1983 World Bank figures). Similarly, land tenure is severely skewed: the top 10 percent of landowners hold 80 percent of the land, while the bottom 10 percent own 0.2 percent. Significant regional inequalities also exist, with the best economic opportunities, health care facilities, and education available in the largest cities. This has contributed to heavy, though decreasing, migration from the countryside to urban areas. A notable exception to the general pattern of income distribution is in Colombia's important coffee-growing regions, where farms have traditionally been small-to-medium-sized. More recently, some small farms in the higher altitude areas of Bogota and Medellin have been able to take advantage of the increasing export demand for fresh-cut flowers.

Some 20,000 people died in mud slides resulting from the eruption of the Nevado del Ruiz volcano on November 13. President Betancur signed a decree authorizing a 35-day state of economic emergency on November 24 in order to create a special fund for reconstruction of the affected areas. The decree authorized the fund to receive donations from foreign and domestic donors and the imposition of additional taxes to raise revenues for this purpose. No new taxes have been levied.

COLOMBIA

The Betancur Administration promised to provide 400,000 low-cost housing units between 1983 and 1985 and to concentrate on rural adult literacy and vocational training. Indeed, the 1986 proposed budget for the social sector ministries (Labor, Government, Health, and Education) accounted for approximately 23.2 percent of total expenditures. There is a severe shortage of teachers in rural areas. Primary school enrollment nationwide has increased, and the adjusted enrollment ratio in 1982 was 102 percent. The adult literacy rate was estimated at 85 percent in 1981. Colombia's infant mortality rate was 62 per 1,000 live births in 1985. While the ratio of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements in 1977 was 104 percent, per capita consumption of important commodities such as meat, eggs, and milk declined between 1948 and 1978, and malnutrition is a leading cause of death among children under five years of age. According to World Bank statistics, 92 percent of the population in 1980 had access to safe water.

The law prohibits the employment of children in most jobs before the age of 14, particularly where such employment might interfere with schooling. These provisions are respected in the larger enterprises and larger cities. However, an unofficial sector exists in the economy which includes very small businesses, workers employed by relatives, self-employed workers, and street sellers. This sector is effectively outside government control, and many children are exploited in it.

The Labor Code regulates the hours of labor and other work conditions. The eight-hour day is standard in larger companies, but the work week generally exceeds 40 hours; a standard week of five eight-hour days remains an important long-term goal of Colombian trade unions. A national minimum wage is set at least annually by the Government, and serves as an important benchmark for wage bargaining, although a large percentage of workers do not earn the minimum wage.

Occupational safety and health is extensively regulated, including use of protective clothing and ventilation, first aid and firefighting equipment at the job site, sanitary facilities and potable water for workers, and compensation if injured. These regulations apply to the larger agricultural enterprises as well as industry and mining. However, exemptions for small companies, the frequent use of workers as "subcontractors" rather than employees, and a general difficulty in enforcement cause very large numbers of workers to fall outside the protection of the law. The Government is endeavoring to improve regulatory enforcement, and improved work conditions are a priority goal of the trade unions.

Women have equal civil and property rights by law. Their economic situation, though improving, is inferior, especially in rural areas; they comprise just over 25 percent of the country's economically active population, but are concentrated in low-productivity, low-income sectors. Historically, the unemployment rate for women has been higher than for men, but this difference has decreased in recent years. Although women are legally entitled to pay equal to that of their male counterparts and are normally paid equal salaries when employed by the Government, this is not generally the case in private industry.

As more Colombian women graduate from universities and participate in the work force, they are increasingly active at all levels of society. A growing number are receiving higher education; they currently comprise 40 percent of the university population. They serve as legislators, judges, governors of departments (states), political party leaders, government officials and diplomats. One indicator of the growing role of Colombian women in urban society is the unprecedented number of high-level women appointees in the Betancur Administration. A woman is running as the candidate of a minor party in the 1986 Presidential elections.

Colombian Indians legally enjoy all rights and privileges of full citizenship, but some claim to be suffering a wide variety of abuses and are now seeking to promote local improvements through community action, public education, and legal aid. Their most common complaint is that large landowners have hired paramilitary thugs to force them off contested lands and, when they retaliate, that the landowners call on local police and military forces for protection. One Indian group has organized a guerrilla band, the Quintin Lame which has reportedly allied itself with the M-19 guerrilla group in some recent confrontations with the armed forces.

The upsurge of land invasions beginning around mid-1984 has continued unabated into 1985. Some landowners attribute this to leftist political activists, others consider it a natural result of the current politicking over land reform. Whatever the cause, the trend toward increased invasions continues to generate concern in both government and land-owning circles.

COSTA RICA

Costa Rica has been a functioning constitutional democracy for almost 4 decades. The Government consists of three independent branches: executive, legislative, and judicial. Free and fair elections were held last in February 1982; nearly 80 percent of eligible voters participated. The tradition of alternating political parties in every election except one since 1948 continued and President Luis Alberto Monge of the National Liberation Party (PLN) defeated the candidate of the incumbent UNIDAD coalition. The President is constitutionally prohibited from succeeding himself, as are members of the Legislative Assembly. The 57 deputies in the Assembly are elected at the same time as the President and for the same 4-year term. The two major political parties now campaigning for elections in February 1986 are the National Liberation Party and the United Social Christian Party. A leftist coalition presently holds four seats in the Legislative Assembly. Included in the coalition is the Communist Party, which freely participates in the political process.

Both police and national defense functions are performed by the Ministry of Public Security's Civil Guard and the Ministry of Government's Rural Guard in the countryside. The Judicial Police, charged with investigating crimes, is an entity of the judicial branch directly responsible to the Supreme Court. None of these entities has been associated with human rights violations.

In Costa Rica's mixed economic system, the right to hold private property is legally protected, and approximately 70 percent of the gross national product is produced by the private sector. Several government-owned autonomous agencies provide goods and services; the public sector is the nation's largest employer with around 20 percent of the work force. While inflation has been largely brought under control, unemployment and underemployment continue to be problems, especially among the young.

Costa Rica abolished its standing army in 1949. The country's security forces, which are subject to civilian control, are few in number and inadequately trained and equipped. With the persistence of troubled relations with Nicaragua and consequent fear of internal subversion, there is widespread popular support for upgrading the Civil and Rural Guards. There is no significant public support for creating a professional armed force.

Costa Rica has maintained its excellent human rights record over the past year. The Monge administration continued to demonstrate sensitivity to the need to protect basic human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Neither the Government nor any other official entity has used, abetted, or condoned killing as a political weapon.

COSTA RICA

b. Disappearance

There have been no known incidents of abductions, secret arrests, or persons held clandestinely by any agency of the Government.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution states that "no one shall be submitted to cruel or degrading treatment nor to life imprisonment. A statement obtained through violence shall have no value." These injunctions are respected in practice. Prisoners are treated humanely in Costa Rican prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There have been no known violations in this area. There are no detentions for expression of dissenting opinions. Warrants are required for both searches and arrests; the Constitution requires that an arraignment take place within 24 hours of arrest. Bail is provided for. These requirements are strictly enforced. There is no preventive detention. It is unconstitutional to exile a citizen. Habeas corpus and amparo are honored in practice. The judiciary is fully independent and effective.

The Constitution prohibits and there are no known instances of forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is widely recognized as fair and independent. Accused persons may select their own attorneys; access to counsel is guaranteed, with free public counsel provided for defendants without means. The right to an open, impartial trial is guaranteed and honored in practice. The right to bail is provided for in law and is observed in practice. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no reported instances of extralegal invasions of privacy conducted by, or with the knowledge of, agencies of the Government over the past year.

Section 2 Respect For Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution specifically guarantees freedom of speech and press. These freedoms are fully respected in practice. Two Communist parties publish weekly newspapers, and the media report news and information spanning the political spectrum. There are three privately owned television stations and numerous radio stations, which pursue independent editorial policies. The media freely air differences with, and criticism of, the Government. There is no evidence of either collusion or repression. Terrorist activities are fully covered.

Foreign journalists have challenged the Costa Rican courts' refusal to recognize their credentials which would allow them to practice their profession in Costa Rica. The issue, involving the Costa Rican National Journalists Association's right to accredit reporters, was heard before the Inter-American Court on Human Rights in September 1985. On November 14, the Court declared that a Costa Rican law requiring membership by journalists in the government-sponsored journalist college was incompatible with the Freedom of Information Guarantee of the Inter-American Human Rights Convention. The decision, which is consultative and nonbinding, was unanimous. The Government of Costa Rica has not indicated yet how it will respond to the Court's decision.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly and association are fully respected in practice.

Workers have the right to organize and the right to association by organized labor as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO) is fully honored. Unions are independent of government control. About 15 percent of the work force is organized into unions, primarily in the public sector and on banana plantations. Unions are free to maintain relations with recognized international bodies such as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the ILO. Several major unions, including those representing banana and public service workers, are controlled by Communists, whose influence in organized labor is disproportionate to their overall influence in Costa Rican society.

Procedures for collective bargaining and arbitration of labor disputes are prescribed in law and followed in practice. The country's Labor Code states that when one-third of the workers in an operation are union members, the employer must conclude a collective agreement, if requested. The Labor Code also permits employees to set up permanent grievance committees to handle both individual and collective disputes. When labor disputes arise, the first attempt at a solution is made by the Office of Conciliation of the Ministry of Labor in San Jose (or the Labor Inspector if the dispute is outside the capital). If conciliation fails, the case goes to a Labor Court which must approve a planned strike or lockout before the strike legally can begin. Public sector strikes are illegal. Unions have complained that the process of having a strike declared legal is complicated, time-consuming, and often unsuccessful. In 1985, there were only seven strikes, each court-approved, each of minimal economic significance. Both democratic and Communist unions displayed their dissatisfaction with government-mandated price hikes and delays in salary increases by participating in a number of peaceful demonstrations, including the traditionally antigovernment May Day Parade, which is fully tolerated by the Government.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and observed in practice. Roman Catholicism is the official state religion, but other religious groups have significant numbers of adherents who participate without prejudice in the social and political life of the nation (a non-Catholic can be elected President of Costa Rica). Foreign missionaries and clergy freely enter Costa Rica. There are no restrictions on proselytizing.

COSTA RICA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual restrictions on traveling within the country or abroad. Emigration is not restricted. A citizen's right of return is guaranteed. Costa Ricans and foreigners are free to live anywhere within the national boundaries. Costa Rica has supported multinational refugee programs and has accepted many thousands of refugees from Cuba, other Central American countries, and South America. The continuing large influx of Nicaraguan refugees has seriously strained national resources, but there has been no move toward repatriation.

The Constitution specifically prohibits the Government from repatriating any non-Costa Rican who may be subject to political persecution in his own country. Costa Rica has traditionally afforded political asylum to exiled dissident groups of various political orientations.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Costa Rica is ruled by a Government elected by its people. The Constitution provides for a free, open, and competitive electoral system, and this provision is scrupulously honored in practice. The integrity of elections--generally regarded as unimpeachable--is overseen by the independent Supreme Electoral Tribunal. No political party is outlawed or excluded from the electoral process; no party has dominated the affairs of the nation; no eligible voter is deterred from participating in elections; no ethnic, economic, or other group dominates; no segment of the citizenry is excluded from the political process. Individuals can and do petition their elected representatives for legislative redress and assistance with government bureaucracies.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

A strong supporter of international and private human rights organizations, Costa Rica has extended a permanent invitation to the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit whenever it wishes. Costa Rica was one of the first countries to ratify the American Convention of Human Rights. It has accepted the jurisdiction of the Inter-American Institute Court of Human Rights, which is based in San Jose, and hosts the Inter-American Institute of Human Rights. Costa Rican Government officials at the highest level participate in and actively support the human rights activities of both the Institute and the Court. Several major international human rights conferences sponsored by the Institute have been held in San Jose. Overall, Costa Rica has been in the vanguard in the promotion of human rights institutions.

Freedom House rated Costa Rica "free." Amnesty International 1985 Report (covering the year 1984) expressed concern over the August 1984 arrest of members of the National Patriotic Committee of Alajuela during a protest demonstration. Amnesty International's concern was based on the possibility that the detainees were ill-treated while in custody and that the basis for their detention may have been fabricated.

COSTA RICA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of 2,644,000 is growing at a rate of 2.6 percent annually. Per capita gross national product (GNP) is $1,289.

Economic problems currently facing Costa Rica stem from the nation's vulnerability to changes in the prices of its major exports (coffee, bananas, and sugar) as well as the nation's heavy importation of oil, raw materials, consumer durables, and foodstuffs, and external borrowing from public and private lenders. A government austerity program has succeeded in lowering the inflation rate and restoring positive GNP growth, but higher prices for consumer goods and constraints on wages have increased hardships to large sectors of the population. Government efforts to meet the society's economic and social needs are made on a nondiscriminatory basis.

Unemployment, officially calculated at 6.5 percent, is unofficially 8 to 10 percent. Underemployment, affecting as much as 20 percent of the population, is particularly acute among recent university graduates frustrated over their inability to find employment in their fields of study. The steadily increasing number of refugees from Nicaragua has further aggravated the employment situation. In addition to the 23,000 mostly Salvadoran and Nicaraguan refugees in Costa Rica receiving financial assistance from refugee relief organizations, the Government estimates there are 250,000 illegal aliens seeking to blend into the already overburdened economy; approximately half of this number are Nicaraguans.

Despite its myriad problems, Costa Rica's per capita GNP was the highest in Central America in 1984. Economic progress, however, is not uniformly distributed. Severe poverty exists in some outlying areas, while development has been most noticeable in the central plateau surrounding the capital of San Jose.

Life expectancy at birth is 74.1 years. The rate of infant mortality is 19 per 1,000. Primary school enrollment is over 100 percent of the school-age population because Costa Rica has universal education, and 90 percent of adults over the age of 14 can read and write. The ratio of caloric supply to nutritional requirements is 118 percent; 84 percent of the population has access to safe water.

The 1949 Constitution defines the normal hours of the workday, remuneration for overtime, days of rest, and annual vacation rights. It specifies compensation for discharge without due cause, the right to a minimum wage, and special protection for women and minors. The minimum working age is 12, with special protections in force for workers under 15. A national wage board (composed of three members each from government, management, and labor) sets minimum wages and salaries for every occupation in every industry, including agriculture.

The Constitution sets normal work hours at 8 hours for daytime and 6 hours for nighttime work, with weekly totals of 48 and 36 hours respectively. Ten-hour days are permitted for work not considered unhealthful or dangerous, but weekly totals may not exceed 48 hours. Nonagricultural workers receive an overtime premium of 50 percent of regular wages for work performed in excess of the daily work shift. Agricultural workers are not paid overtime if they voluntarily work beyond their normal hours.

A 1967 law governs health and safety at the workplace. Industrial, agricultural, and commercial firms with 10 or more workers are required to have a joint safety committee. The law allows the Government to inspect workplaces and to fine employers for violations. However, a shortage of labor inspectors, especially outside San Jose, limits the Ministry's ability to ensure that minimum conditions of safety and sanitation are always maintained.

Increased population pressures and economic decline have greatly influenced peasant demands for agricultural land. Groups have organized, in some cases with Communist support, to invade both private and public lands. Squatting, although illegal, continues to be a major problem given the government's inability to prevent it and to implement an effective and equitable land reform system.

The role of women, although still primarily domestic, is not limited in Costa Rica. Women are represented in all professions, in the highest ranks of organized labor, in the private business sector, and in the Government (occupying prominent positions in the legislature, as well as in the executive branch and the judiciary). Women and minority groups participate freely in Costa Rica's elections.

Costa Rica's population includes some 30,000 West Indian Blacks and 25,000 Indians. English is the second language of the country primarily because it is spoken by the Caribbean Blacks. Most of the Indians speak Spanish and live in a traditional manner on 19 reserves throughout the country. Because most live in remote areas, they often lack access to schools, health care, electricity, and potable water. The Government is currently involved in programs to provide primary education to the Indians and to buy out "islands" within the Indian reserves which are owned by non-Indian people.

CUBA

Cuba is governed by a tightly interwoven hierarchy at the apex of which is a single individual, Fidel Castro, who is chief of state, head of government, leader of the Communist Party, and commander of Cuba's armed forces. Taking power in 1959 from an often harsh and arbitrary dictatorship, the Castro Government quickly transformed itself into a Communist regime and instituted a far more systematically repressive order, one in which previous restrictions on basic human rights were greatly magnified and made pervasive. Supported by a few longtime close associates, Castro controls all aspects of Cuban life through a network of interlocking directorates centered on the Communist Party. All state authority is subservient to the party, which controls all aspects of the daily life of Cuba's citizens. Their political, social, and economic existence is regimented to meet the goals set by the party and State and to prevent spontaneous or unplanned social behavior. The party ensures internal security and conformity with these goals through the Ministry of Interior, which operates border and police forces, orchestrates and controls all public demonstrations, investigates evidence of nonconformity, regulates migration, and maintains a pervasive system of informers and block wardens. Civil liberties in particular may not be exercised "contrary to the decision of the Cuban people to build socialism and communism" (Article 61 of the Constitution of the Republic of Cuba). Thus they exist only to the degree the state deems expedient.

Before Castro took power, although Cuba had an expanding economy and a small but growing middle class, poverty was widespread. Today, income distribution has the appearance of being more egalitarian, but there is substantial evidence that while the political and military elite live in relative comfort, most people must cope with a persistent and severe scarcity of food and consumer items. Most necessities are still rationed--27 years after the revolution--and sometimes wholly unavailable. Many consumer items may be acquired, if at all, only at extremely high prices in the "parallel market." What "private sector" there is is too small to be economically significant. Inefficiency and low productivity characterize the state sector, where the incentive to produce is conspicuously absent.

It is very difficult to obtain specific information about the human rights situation in Cuba because of tight controls by the Government. Despite this difficulty, some details do become known outside Cuba. Those details confirm that there was no improvement in the human rights situation in Cuba in 1985. Former political prisoners have reported or confirmed that the Cuban Government continues to abuse basic human rights, including the use of torture and denial of fair public trial. Many political prisoners remain in jail after the expiration of their original and often very lengthy sentences. There have been credible reports of continuing arrests for political crimes. Freedom of speech is not permitted. The practice of religion is actively discouraged and in some cases prohibited, despite an effort by the Government to appear open to a dialogue with the Catholic church. In recent months the Castro regime has displayed greater sensitivity to foreign opinion regarding Cuba's human rights record by offering to release a few very long-term political prisoners on the condition that they leave Cuba, but there is no evidence of fundamental improvement in a system where dissent can find expression only outside the framework of the law.

CUBA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

After the Castro movement seized power in 1959, it promptly began a series of show trials and summary executions of persons alleged to have carried out political crimes as officials of the previous government. There are credible reports that the use of executions to deter political dissent continues. A report of the unofficial Cuban Committee on Human Rights smuggled out of Cuba in the summer of 1985 cited a number of recent examples of execution by firing squad. Three brothers, Cipriano, Ventura, and Eugenio Garcia Marin reportedly were executed. Their mother, Margarita Marin Thompson, is said to have been sentenced to serve 25 years in "Nuevo Amanecer" prison on conviction for "dangerousness" (peligrosidad). The report also mentioned the executions of two university students, Maximo Galan Zaldivar and Ismael Cepero. Former political prisoner Jorge Valls Arango, who was released in 1984, has stated that he saw many executions during his more than 20 years in prison.

The report of the Cuban Committee on Human Rights also noted that Guido Faraminan Hernandez, a former labor leader jailed in 1965 for opposing government control of the Cuban Confederation of Workers (CTC), may have died of unnatural causes in the hospital of the Combinado del Este prison in April 1985. His family was told that he had died of a heart attack, but prison authorities refused to turn over the body to his relatives. Also, according to the Committee, Felipe Hernandez, a vice president of the Jehovah's Witnesses, died under similar circumstances in early 1984. More recently, the Committee asserted, Caridad Pavon Tamayo, a Cuban Solidarity activist, and Sara Oquendo Hernandez, a teacher, poet, and human rights activist, met the same fate while in prison.

Most recently, on November 18, 1985, a 16-year-old boy was shot to death and an 18-year-old companion possibly wounded by Cuban police guards when the two attempted to gain access to the Venezuelan Embassy in Havana. According to all accounts, no attempts were made to warn or negotiate with the boys, who were simply shot on sight--disturbing evidence of the regime's standing orders in such matters. This was the third person killed at the Venezuelan Embassy in the last 22 months and the 21st killed there since 1974.

b. Disappearance

When individuals are arrested by the Cuban secret police, friends and family risk retribution if they ask about them. Rarely are individuals tried publicly for political crimes; sentences are also often secret. When those Cubans who have been able to emigrate and become citizens of another country return to Cuba to visit relatives, their new citizenship is not acknowledged by the Cuban Government. If arrested, they are denied contact with consular officials. If they disappear, the Cuban Government refuses to provide any information about them to authorities of their new countries of citizenship.

CUBA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Former long-term political prisoners have provided firsthand descriptions of the deplorable conditions they were forced to endure during the period from the early 1960's through mid-1984. There is no evidence that conditions improved in 1985. The prisoners reported major, systematic abuses, including: beatings by guards and officers; withholding of food and water; inadequate diet; withholding of medical care; withholding of fresh air and exercise; withholding of family visits for years; withholding of mail for years; solitary confinement; physical injury caused by electronic noise machines; participation of prison medical staff in acts of torture; and suspected medical experiments carried out without the permission of prisoners.

Armando Valladares, the noted writer and poet and a former political prisoner, has described Cuba's prisons as "America's Gulag" and observed that torture is systematically practiced to try to make prisoners accept Communism. Cuba's degrading treatment of political prisoners, in violation of the American Declaration on Human Rights, the deficient medical treatment for those incarcerated, and the deplorable condition of Cuban prisons have repeatedly been denounced by the Inter-American Human Rights Commission, most recently in October 1985.

The Cuban Committee on Human Rights reported in 1985 that Professor Antonio Penabaz Tobio is being kept--without medical attention--in Combinado del Este prison hospital, suffering from a beating with rifle butts that was administered by state security personnel when arresting him. He was arrested for peacefully opposing the state of oppression existing in Cuba and for explaining the civil liberties that exist in democratic countries. The Committee also reported that more than 120 youths between the ages of 16 and 20 are prisoners in Combinado del Este, serving sentences of 15 to 25 years. These persons were said to have been beaten badly upon being arrested for crimes they claim they did not commit.

Political prisoners who refuse to accept political indoctrination or be classified as common criminals are known as "plantados" and are subject to particular abuse. They spend their days dressed only in pajamas or underwear, or without any clothing at all. Visits by friends or relatives are limited to one or two per year, or less, and letters to one per month. Political prisoners are not routinely released at the end of their terms; whether they are freed depends on a personal decision by Fidel Castro, who has frequently used the release of political prisoners to gain favor with an influential foreign visitor or to put the latter under obligation to "respond." The 1985 Amnesty International Report expressed concern about the Government's practice of not releasing long-term political prisoners who had completed their sentences.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests are often carried out without warrants. Those arrested can be detained for long periods without judicial hearings. As indicated by Article 61 of the Cuban Constitution, legal protections cannot be invoked to prevent the State from arresting and detaining anyone, including placing in incommunicado detention, whom the political authorities consider harmful to the "decision of the Cuban people to build socialism and communism." People arrested for vandalism, practicing certain religions, or criticizing the regime can be charged with sabotage and counterrevolutionary activities.

In July 1984, Amado Rodriguez, a former long-term political prisoner, was rearrested and held incommunicado until sentenced in March 1985 to an additional 15 years in prison. Originally imprisoned in 1961 at the age of 18, Rodriguez had served 18 years of a 30-year sentence. Currently held in the infamous Boniato prison in eastern Cuba, he reportedly has been subjected to physical and psychological torture and has been denied medicine and medical care. His case was brought to the attention of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission in August 1985.

Once political prisoners are freed, they are sometimes forbidden to leave Cuba. Poet Angel Cuadra Landrove, who was released in April 1982, was not able to depart Cuba until 1985. Ricardo Bofill Pages, Chairman of the Cuban Committee on Human Rights, was released from his second term in prison in August 1985 but still awaits permission to depart the country. While waiting for exit permits, former political prisoners sometimes are denied the right to work, possess ration cards, and obtain basic identification documents. In its 1984 report, the International Labor Organization (ILO) noted that Cuban law can be used by the Government as a means of direct or indirect compulsion to work and urged that the law be amended to bring it into conformity with the Convention on Forced Labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although Cuban courts are described constitutionally as "independent," in practice they are subordinated to the Party through the National Assembly of the People's Power, a rubber stamp body that meets twice annually for a few days, and to the Council of State. All civil courts are presided over by a five-person panel of judges. Three are professionally qualified; the other two are "workers' representatives" who see that the "interests of the revolution" are protected. People accused of certain counterrevolutionary activities are tried and sentenced secretly by military tribunals. Although defense lawyers are theoretically available to all defendants, attorneys have been jailed for defending individuals charged with political offenses. One of those attorneys, Aramis Taboada, died in a prison hospital in November 1985, under unexplained circumstances.

Only the Cuban Government knows the exact number of political prisoners in Cuba. Fidel Castro told foreign journalists in February 1985 that "political prisoners, . . . the recalcitrant ones who once numbered many thousands, amount to about 200. . ." Castro, who has no reason to exaggerate, also stated that the total number of individuals "sentenced for counterrevolutionary activities" could be as many as 1,000. Americas Watch and Amnesty International have published estimates that the number is between 250 and 1,000. Some political prisoners released in June 1984 contend the total is in fact nearer 10,000. A 1985 survey by Amnesty International of other human rights organizations drew responses indicating that there may be as many as 15,000 political prisoners in Cuba, though Amnesty International itself did not endorse that number. Few of the political prisoners have been involved in violence against the Government.

In January 1985, a delegation from the U.S. Catholic Bishops Conference asked for the release of 140 long-term political prisoners, after which the Cuban Government offered to release 75 persons--the majority of them neither on the list of 140 nor known to the Catholic Church--and allow them and their families to leave Cuba for the United States. The necessary steps to establish their eligibility for resettlement are presently in progress. Meanwhile, as of January 1986 all but a few of these persons are still in prison.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Family life is complicated in Cuba by educational practices, which often separate children from their parents and teach that the State's interests have priority over family ties. Further disruption is caused by severe housing shortages, rationing, and strong pressures to participate in "voluntary" Communist Party-related activities. Parents fear, rightly, that teaching their children religious practices, even in their homes, will harm their careers. Nearly all families must send their teen-aged children on 45-day stints of "voluntary work" in rural areas. The children are kept in camps, where they are indoctrinated with party ideology and encouraged to inform on their parents and friends.

Few aspects of an ordinary Cuban's private life are free from state surveillance. Telephones are tapped and mail is opened. Daily life is closely monitored by the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR) that exist on virtually every block in Cuban municipalities, and in which membership is essentially mandatory. As a CDR member explained in a documentary film done by a Cuban exile in Cuba in 1983/84, members are expected to observe and report anything "unusual," including strangers (especially foreigners) in the neighborhood, reception of foreign radio and television broadcasts, conspicuous consumption, unauthorized meetings, or critical comments about the Government. Cubans overheard by neighbors reportedly have been fined for speaking disparagingly of Castro in their homes. According to recent exiles, the Cuban people generally resent this type of violation of their human rights even more than economic deprivation or political indoctrination.

Listening to foreign radio and television broadcasts is discouraged. A shrill hum is transmitted to interfere with broadcasts of the Voice of America's Cuba service ("Radio Marti program"). Some Miami radio stations are also jammed. Non-Communist foreign periodicals are rarely permitted to circulate in Cuba.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no freedom of speech or press in Cuba; all media are controlled by the State and are used for the purpose of indoctrination and dissemination of propaganda. They publish or broadcast nothing that is not in consonance with the party line. There are credible reports that broadcasters have been dismissed or punished for casual comments, such as making a sarcastic comment about the artistic merit of East European "children's cartoons" shown on Cuban television. Intellectual expression is limited to activities that do not contradict government policy lines.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are not guaranteed by the Constitution and are actively discouraged. Any group meeting is almost certain to be monitored by the CDR or state security representatives. All associations are party or government-controlled and most are party- or government-initiated. The few private associations exist at the sufferance of the Government and at the risk of the associates.

Cuban workers are required to belong to the officially sponsored Confederation of Cuban Workers (CTC). The CTC is a member of the ILO as well as the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). It is not in fact an independent trade union but rather a mass organization under government and party control. It automatically supports any and all government political initiatives. In January 1983, five organizers of an independent trade union reportedly were sentenced to death for their activities, although their sentences were later commuted to 30 years imprisonment. Two hundred other would-be independent trade unionists received lesser sentences in this instance. A judge who questioned the severity of these sentences was herself sentenced to serve 18 years in a prison labor camp.

There is no collective bargaining and the right to strike is not recognized.

c. Freedom of Religion

In one of several noteworthy developments in church-state relations in 1985, a religious affairs office was established within the Central Committee of the Cuban Communist Party, headed by an official who long has had similar responsibilities in the Government. The Government also announced that foreign rabbis would be allowed to visit and perform religious ceremonies. Fidel Castro met in January 1985 with a delegation from the U.S. Catholic Bishops Conference and in September with the Cuban Catholic bishops. These few steps have been accompanied by efforts of the Government to obtain the church's endorsement for its views on extraneous issues, such as the foreign debt of Latin American countries. These developments have also been at random and have yet to be reflected in any genuine relaxation of controls on free religious expression.

Despite a Cuban constitutional guarantee, Cubans who practice their religion still face discrimination. Religious groups must register with the Government. Religious materials may not be distributed freely in Cuba. Religious belief is not compatible with membership in the ruling Cuban Communist Party, thus virtually excluding religious Cubans from all important positions in the Government.

No provision is made to respect the beliefs of Seventh Day Adventists who object to compulsory work and school attendance on Saturday. No exception to military service is made for conscientious objectors. There are reports that those who refuse to serve for religious reasons will be jailed until they either recant or have been imprisoned for at least two to three times longer than others who fail to fulfill their military obligation.

Members of the CDR's monitor attendance at the few neighborhood churches still open, forcing churchgoers to go to large downtown churches where they can remain anonymous. Participation in Communist youth activities is strongly encouraged. Religious and other private elementary and secondary schools as well as universities are not permitted.

In September 1985, a small delegation from the Cuban Catholic Bishops Conference was allowed to visit its counterpart in the United States. Other clergy and lay officials of Protestant (particularly those associated with the Cuban Ecumenical Council) as well as Catholic churches are usually granted permission to travel abroad on church matters. Membership in Jehovah's Witnesses is prohibited, however, and persons identified with that denomination are denied permission to travel abroad. International contacts of all Cuban churches are carefully monitored by the security apparatus.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Domestic travel is unrestricted by law, and Cubans are permitted to change their jobs and residences. In contrast, permission is required both to leave and to re-enter the country. Until recently, nonofficial foreign travel was generally limited to rare cases of special humanitarian concern (e.g., people with critically ill relatives abroad), clergy or lay officials on church business, women over 60 years of age, and men over 65 years of age. Travel by these last two groups has now been severely curtailed.

Emigration is strictly controlled, and those who apply to leave may lose their jobs, houses, and ration books. Moreover, their children may be refused further schooling. In some cases the would-be emigrants are physically and verbally abused. Draft-age males and professionals are usually not permitted to emigrate. Some professionals have reported that the Government will allow them to emigrate only if they pay tens of thousands of dollars, ostensibly to reimburse the Government for the cost of their education. Those who are permitted to emigrate must leave behind almost all their personal and household possessions and are forced to pay discriminatory air fares. They must also pay exorbitant fees for travel documents. These fees must be paid in hard currency, which by law is not available to Cuban citizens; hence it must be obtained from relatives or friends abroad.

On December 14, 1984, Cuba and the United States signed an agreement under which Cuba would allow the re-entry of 2,746 Cuban citizens found to be excludable from the United States, and the United States would reinstitute processing of Cuban applications to immigrate to the United States. In May 1985, Cuba unilaterally suspended the agreement, thus preventing the reunification of thousands of families, many of which have been separated for years or even decades. The Cuban Government has also restricted the travel of individuals resident in the United States who wish to visit their relatives in Cuba, except for "strictly humanitarian purposes." Such travel declined greatly thereafter.

CUBA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Cuba is a one-party Communist state firmly controlled by the Cuban Communist Party, which in turn is dominated by Fidel Castro. Members of the Central Committee and the Politburo are selected by a narrow circle of Party rulers; elections simply ratify choices already made. The National Assembly of People's Power meets briefly twice a year, solely to endorse decisions already made by the Party chiefs. No political opposition is permitted in Cuba; dissidents are either in jail or outside the country. There is no legal way for citizens to change the Government; as a result hundreds of thousands of Cubans have fled their country, and many others would do so if it were not so dangerous.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government routinely denies that there are any violations of human rights in the country, and it refuses permission for any outside organization to investigate its claims. It refused to permit investigators from the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit Cuba, and it told the ILO that "No one in Cuba is under arrest for trade union or labor activities," a patently false assertion. The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association was considering an International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) complaint alleging the arrest and imprisonment of striking Cuban workers, as well as of workers trying to organize an independent trade union. It was forced to drop the matter in 1984 when it became clear that the Cuban Government's complete control over information prevented further investigation.

Although the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) helped Cuba arrange the repatriation of its nationals from Grenada in November 1983, the ICRC has been refused access to Cuban jails or permission to visit political prisoners. Americas Watch and Amnesty International have also been refused such access. The few human rights activists who are not in jail are forced to carry out their activities clandestinely, and they must rely upon international nongovernmental organizations for support and publicity.

The Government also severely limits the ability of foreign journalists to report on human rights violations or on any other matter that may reflect poorly on the regime. Fidel Castro has boasted about how carefully foreign journalists are kept under surveillance in Cuba. In 1983 two French journalists were arrested and detained for 10 days and then expelled from Cuba because they met with Cuban human rights activist Ricardo Bofill Pages. Bofill was also arrested and spent 2 years in prison. More recently, the Agence France Press correspondent in Cuba was expelled for writing an article on a Cuban law firm--an agency of the Government--that extracts large payments for exit permits for Cubans married to foreigners. The Government asserted that the facts the journalists had disclosed about this practice were insulting to Cuban womanhood. Even abroad, Cuban human rights activists are harassed. The office of the "Committee for Human Rights in Cuba" in Madrid was robbed in October 1985. The thieves stole files, including membership lists, money, and recording material. According to media reporting, the head of the committee, Armando Valladares, believes that the crime was political.

Amnesty International Report 1985 expressed concern about long-term political prisoners who were held after expiry of their sentences, as well as the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, including persons reportedly detained for attempting to exercise their right to leave the country. Freedom House rated Cuba "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Cuba's population of 10,430,164 is growing at an annual rate of 0.99 percent, according to the Communist party daily Granma. Although Cuba claims a per capita gross social product of approximately $2,500, actual per capita disposable national income is only about $1,500. In 1950 Cuba ranked third in Latin America in per capita income, had a high literacy rate, and provided comparatively good medical care for its population. The Castro regime thus had a rather well-developed infrastructure upon which to build. The country now ranks around 18th in per capita income, although it claims the highest literacy rate in Latin America. Some progress has been made in medical care, especially in preventive medicine.

Cuba's economy is centrally planned. It receives an estimated $4 billion annually in economic assistance from the Soviet Union, to which it now owes the soft currency equivalent of $9-$23 billion. Its current debt to Western creditors exceeds $3 billion. Basic necessities are scarce, and items such as rice, beans, meat, clothing, and shoes are rationed. Some rationed items and other consumer goods are available at very high prices on the government-operated "parallel market," created by the Government to absorb excess currency and counteract black market activities. The latter continues to function, presumably tolerated by authorities as an additional means of acquiring hard currency from foreigners or for satisfying consumer demands.

Cuban government statistics show life expectancy now at 74.2 years, and infant mortality at 15 per 1,000 live births. According to these official Cuban figures, the adult literacy rate in 1979 was 95.7 percent for males and 95.1 percent for females. In 1975, 96 percent of the urban population had access to safe water, according to official Cuban claims. However, disorders of a gastrointestinal nature have been fairly widespread. Caloric supply as a percentage of average requirements in 1977 was 116.9, according to Cuban figures. Reflecting the Government's emphasis on basic education, the adjusted primary school enrollment (1982), as a percentage of children of primary school age was stated as 112 percent for males and 109 percent for females.

The standard Cuban work week is 44 hours, consisting of 8 hours each weekday and 8 hours every other Saturday. The minimum monthly wage is 86 pesos per month. All workers receive 1 month of annual vacation. Cubans do not normally begin working before the age of 17 although under some circumstances they may begin working at age 14. Under age 17 they are legally not permitted to work in hazardous conditions or for more than 7 hours a day or 40 hours a week. However, students as young as 12 are required to spend 6 weeks a year performing light agricultural work, such as harvesting fruit, for which they receive no wages. Provisions for worker safety and control of industrial pollution are fairly well developed although substantially below standards of the industrialized West.

Although Cuba constitutionally has outlawed discrimination against women and minorities, few women hold high positions in government and the Party. Of the 225 full and alternate members of the Central Committee selected in December 1980, 18 are women. One Politburo member, an alternate, is a woman (a sister-in-law of President Fidel Castro). One woman (the wife of a key member of the Secretariat of the Communist Party) has reached the rank of colonel in the Cuban Armed Forces. Although women make up 37 percent of the work force and 53.8 percent of the technical workers, there is no woman on the National Committee of the Confederation of Cuban Workers.

Blacks and other minorities are poorly represented in the top levels of government. While they comprise more than one quarter of the population (a greater percentage if mulattos are included), their representation on the Central Committee (full and alternate members) is about 10 to 15 percent. Only one of the members of the Politburo (full or alternate) is black.

DOMINICA

A member of the British Commonwealth, Dominica has a system of parliamentary democracy which is a legacy of the pre-1978 British colonial rule. Prime Minister Eugenia Charles was first elected in July 1980 and was reelected in free and open general elections in July 1985. The recently united opposition Labor Party of Dominica (LPD) improved its position in the hotly contested 1985 elections.

The Dominica Defense Force was disbanded in 1981 following two violent coup attempts. The police are now the nation's only security force. A small Special Service Unit with some paramilitary training has been organized within the police force, and a Marine Wing established and trained to function as a coast guard.

Dominica is one of the least developed countries in the Eastern Caribbean. The country has largely recovered from hurricane damage suffered in 1979 and 1980, allowing the Government to focus on encouraging foreign investment and to rehabilitate basic economic infrastructure with the assistance of foreign donors. Slow global recovery from the worldwide recession of the early 1980s, however, has hampered economic progress and the Government's development program.

Dominica's excellent human rights record continued during 1985, without reports of significant human rights violations of any kind.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

There were no reports of killing for political motives in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1985. In August, six Dominican policemen were charged with manslaughter in connection with the 1981 death of John Rose Lindsay, whose body was found at the bottom of a cliff hours after he was arrested by police. According to press accounts, six other policemen were suspended for alleged misconduct in connection with the Lindsay affair. The charges resulted from an official inquiry.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that persons arrested be brought before a court within 72 hours and this is honored in practice. The Government adheres scrupulously to constitutional provisions prohibiting arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. There were no reports of arbitrary arrests, or summary exile in 1985.

DOMINICA

Although no legal provision is known to exist against it, forced or compulsory labor is not known to take place in Dominica.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Legal practice provides for public trials before an independent, impartial court. Criminal defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty, are allowed legal counsel, and have the right of appeal on legal or procedural grounds.

In October 1985, former Prime Minister Patrick John was brought to trial on charges of treason resulting from his alleged complicity in a 1981 coup plot. John was represented by legal counsel, and was free on bail before and during the proceedings. John was found guilty by the jury, and was sentenced to 14 years in prison. He is currently free on bail pending an appeal. Now a member of the opposition Labor Party of Dominica, John was elected to Parliament in the July 1985 general elections. By law, his conviction forces him to give up his seat.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry, search, and seizure. There were no reports in 1985 of arbitrary government intrusions into the private lives of individuals.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution establishes the right of free expression, which is affirmed in practice. The political opposition freely criticizes the Government. Dominica's only radio station is state-owned, and the principal newspaper is independent but generally favors the ruling Dominica Freedom Party. The opposition staged a boycott of Parliament in August 1985 to protest the Government's decision to end live radio broadcasts of parliamentary sessions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of association and the freedom to assemble peaceably are honored without exception. Opposition groups hold rallies and meetings without hindrance from the Government.

Labor has the right to organize, to bargain collectively and to strike. Labor unions are independent, but are not a significant political force owing to small memberships. The Banana Growers Association is a strong trade association which plays a significant independent political role.

c. Freedom of Religion

Dominicans are primarily Roman Catholic or Anglican, but a small Muslim community also exists. The 1979 "Dread Act," which prohibits membership in the Rastafarian cult, was repealed, but allegations of harassment of Rastafarians continue.

DOMINICA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are guaranteed by law and honored in practice.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Dominica has a freely elected parliamentary system of government in which citizens have a real choice of policies and candidates from the ruling and opposition parties. In the July 1985 general elections, the ruling Dominica Freedom Party won 15 seats in the House of Assembly, the Labor Party of Dominica won 5 seats, and an LPD affiliate, the United Democratic Labor Party, won 1 seat. Candidates from a broad political spectrum were elected, including two candidates educated in Cuba.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is responsive to complaints about any human rights violations.

No international human rights organizations have branch offices in Dominica. The Dominica National Workers Union's Human Rights Committee, a Marxist-Leninist organization, occasionally has published allegations of human rights violations in Dominica. The Committee has recently alleged that six men condemned to hang for their participation in a December 1981 attack on police headquarters are imprisoned under inhumane conditions. The Committee claims to have brought this case to the attention of Amnesty International, without response to date.

Freedom House rated Dominica as "free." Dominica is not mentioned in the 1985 Amnesty International report.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

A small, poor country with a population of 74,000, Dominica has traditionally had a high emigration rate. In 1985, population grew slightly (0.4 percent). The country relies heavily on banana exports and subsistence agriculture. Its estimated per capita gross national product is among the lowest in the Eastern Caribbean region: $707 in 1982.

The Government emphasizes education. With the help of foreign donors, it has rebuilt many primary schools destroyed by hurricanes in 1979 and 1980. Adult literacy is estimated to be 94.1 percent.

The legal minimum working age is 14. The standard working week is 40 hours in 5 days. Workers are given a minimum of two weeks annual leave. An occupational health and safety law in keeping with ILO standards was passed in 1984. The minimum wage established by law is arguably less than that on which a person can be reasonably expected to live.

The Government has worked hard to improve health care by the construction of public health clinics. Restructuring the public health administration has improved the level of service in rural areas. At 19.6 per 1,000 live births, Dominica has one of the lowest infant mortality rates in the Eastern Caribbean.

DOMINICA

Dominican law does not restrict the role of women in the nation's public or social life. The traditional role of women limited to the home and family is changing rapidly, and improvement in educational opportunities for women, together with the example set by Prime Minister Eugenia Charles, are expected to lead to greater participation of women in Dominica's public life.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The Dominican Republic is a pluralistic, constitutional democracy with an elected president and a bicameral congress. The Supreme Court heads an independent judiciary whose members are appointed by the Senate. President Salvador Jorge Blanco is in the final year of a four-year term which began in August 1982 following fair and competitive elections. Political parties representing the political spectrum from left to right freely participate in the political process and are actively engaged in preparations for national elections scheduled for May 16, 1986. The military is fully responsive to the civilian governmental authorities and committed to constitutional order.

The Dominican Republic is a middle to lower income, developing country with a mixed economy based primarily on agriculture and services. Partly as a result of the 1930-1961 dictatorship of Rafael Trujillo, the Government still accounts for 20 to 25 percent of the gross domestic product and controls several major industries. The national income is unevenly distributed, but there is a significant middle class. Historically, sugar has been the Dominican Republic's principal export. Faced with the prolonged depression of the world sugar market and low prices for its other agricultural exports, the country has confronted a serious economic crisis since 1982. To address these problems, the Government has undertaken difficult economic austerity and financial adjustment measures based on agreements with the International Monetary Fund (IMF). As a result, living standards have fallen, especially for the poor and lower middle class majority.

During 1985, Dominicans continued generally to exercise and enjoy the broad range of human rights guaranteed them under the 1966 Constitution. The political environment remained unrestricted, and individuals and political groups freely debated and criticized the policies and programs of the Government. Preparations for the May 1986 elections moved forward. While opposition to the Government's economic austerity measures led to periodic protests and strikes, there was not a repeat of the violent disturbances which occurred in April 1984. On several occasions the Government temporarily detained Communist and other leftist political leaders as well as some labor leaders on the grounds that they were preparing illegal protest actions that would disrupt the civil peace. Although they have charged harassment, those detained were routinely released within the 48-hour constitutional limit for detention without charges.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

There were no known politically motivated killings in 1985. However, there have been allegations that government and police authorities may have been involved in the murder of a foreign exchange trader, Hector Mendez, and his chauffeur in January 1985. The Government has made arrests and charged that the murders were perpetrated by terrorists seeking to raise funds for radical leftist political activities. The trial is pending. Also, a youth was apparently shot and killed in March during clashes between police and students demonstrating in favor of a larger budget for the Autonomous University of Santo Domingo.

b. Disappearance

There were no credible reports of politically motivated disappearances in 1985. A local, private human rights organization, The Dominican Human Rights Committee, and the International League for Human Rights issued reports in June which denounced 58 alleged disappearances between 1981 and 1984. Also, Haitian refugees resident in the Dominican Republic have asserted that Israel Valmy and two other Haitian refugees disappeared after being arrested by government security forces in May. There is no reliable evidence to suggest that these alleged disappearances were politically motivated or involved the Government.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, and it is not practiced. In 1985 there was a series of reports of police and security force abuse of prisoners, including the well-publicized death of popular band leader Tony Seval while in custody. The press routinely reports cases of police abuse. Prisoners and their families have access to the press which contributes to deterring cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment and encourages the Government to take corrective action. In most instances, government and police officials have indicated a concern to redress improper behavior by police, but they have not always effected the needed changes. Members of the National Police on the northern coast who abused tourists and extorted money were punished and removed from the force. However, other reports of extortion continue.

The individual arrested and charged with the January murder of the local foreign exchange trader, Mendez, has since asserted that he confessed to the crime only after the police had threatened him and his family and tortured him. The case is still pending trial.

The inadequately financed prison system suffers from unsanitary conditions and overcrowding. The overcrowding results in part from the slowness of the judicial process under which many prisoners remain in custody while awaiting trial. Financial constraints continue to handicap the Government's ability to improve the prison situation. Judicial authorities are studying measures to modernize the trial process and otherwise reform the administration of justice.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no known instances of arbitrary arrest, illegal detention, or exile of individuals for expressing views contrary to or critical of the Government.

On several occasions in the first half of 1985, the Government detained members of radical leftist parties, labor organizations, and populist groups who were instigating or preparing to instigate public disturbances to protest economic austerity measures. Those so detained were usually released within 48 hours, which is the maximum period stipulated by the Constitution for holding suspects for investigation before arraignment. On February 5, for example, the Government arrested 14 leftist political and labor leaders who were involved in preparations for a nationwide general strike set for February 11, and charged them with activities prejudicial to public peace and constitutional order. The Attorney General issued a release order for the 14 on February 12, in response to a writ of habeas corpus ordered by the courts.

There appears to be no evidence of policies or practices of forced labor, although isolated incidents may occur involving seasonal Haitian canecutters employed in the country's sugar industry. The Haitian canecutters can quit their jobs and are free to leave the plantations, but those who are illegal residents and those under contract to the State Sugar Council who have abandoned their jobs are subject to deportation. They are not forcibly returned to the fields.

An agreement concluded in October 1984 between the Government of Haiti and the Dominican State Sugar Council (CEA) provided improvements in the situation of Haitian agricultural workers in the Dominican Republic. Among other provisions, the agreement reduces the possibility of forced labor by: (1) providing that Haitian workers be informed of the location where they are to work upon their arrival at the Dominican border; (2) abandoning the practice of transferring workers from one sugar plantation to another; (3) permitting Haitian workers to retain their own travel documents; and (4) providing vehicles equipped with loudspeakers to inform the workers in Creole of their rights and obligations.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are no known political prisoners.

The Constitution guarantees a public trial. No special court for political or national security cases exists, and civilians may not be tried by a military court. Members of the armed forces are not tried by civilian courts, except under specified circumstances and only after a military board has reviewed the case and decided to permit the case to pass to the civilian courts. The appeals procedure, which includes appellate courts and the Supreme Court, is widely utilized. Court-appointed lawyers are usually provided at public expense to indigents only in criminal cases. They are seldom provided in criminal misdemeanor cases where their provision is at the court's discretion. Prosecuting attorneys are appointed by the executive branch.

Judges at all levels are selected by the Senate and are independent of the executive branch, subject to removal or transfer by a majority vote in the Senate. Their terms of office correspond to that of the President and other elected officials, ending on the last day of the incumbent administration regardless of date of appointment. Judges have displayed independence in their actions and are not known to persecute opponents of the administration. However, judges earn a relatively low salary, and the fairness and quickness of some trials have been subject to influence and manipulation. There is a widespread public belief, buttressed by some concrete reports, that judges and prosecutors at the lower court level accept bribes.

Judges engaged in a nationwide strike between July and October, demanding higher salaries, better working conditions, and more resources for the judicial branch. During this period the administration of justice came to a virtual standstill. The strike was resolved when the Government raised the salaries of judges, promised additional financial resources for the courts, and agreed to permit the judicial branch to administer its own budget.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no reports of arbitrary governmental interference with the private lives of individuals or families. Constitutional safeguards against invasion of the home are normally observed. A residence may not be searched unless the search is made in the presence of a prosecutor or an assistant prosecutor, except in cases of "hot pursuit" or when there is a probable cause to believe that a crime is actually occurring within the residence. Because of theft within the postal department there is little public confidence in the mail system.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These liberties are guaranteed by law and respected. Dominican newspapers are privately owned and freely reflect opposition points of view and criticism of the current Government. The numerous privately owned radio and television stations air all political points of view. Moreover, there are frequent exchanges of views between government officials and all media elements.

There is no government censorship on political grounds. However, there have been cases in which the Government has taken action against media elements. For example, during strikes and protests which followed the Government's January 23 announcement of economic austerity measures, some journalists were temporarily detained by security forces and removed from the scene of disturbances. Also at this time, the Government acted to prohibit mobile radio units from entering areas of Santo Domingo where strikes or disorders were occurring, ostensibly to avoid inciting further disorders. This restriction was subsequently lifted.

In addition, there have been charges, denied by government spokesmen, that the Government sought to pressure the media against actively covering all aspects of the Hector Mendez murder case. Concern has also been expressed by some newspapermen and opposition politicians that the Government seeks to pressure and influence the media through its large advertising budget and the manner in which it distributes paid government advertisements to the newspapers, television, and radio stations.

In December, the media and political opposition criticized the Government for ordering a privately owned television station to remain off the air and for allegedly playing a role in the cancellation of a talk show on another channel. In the first case, the station was owned by a prominent political figure of an opposition party. In the latter, the show's host had scheduled an interview with the leader of a rival faction within the ruling party. The Government has stated that the station was ordered off the air for technical irregularities in its transmissions and has denied any role in the talk show's cancellation.

While customs authorities from time to time confiscate Communist literature, books of all political persuasions are readily available for public sale. University autonomy and academic freedom are respected by the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is guaranteed by the Constitution. Outdoor public marches and meetings require official government permits which are routinely granted. Throughout 1985 there were numerous such gatherings of parties and groups of diverse political orientations. Likewise, indoor gatherings of political parties, labor unions, and other associations are unrestricted.

Labor unions have not historically played a significant role in the Dominican Republic, and less than 15 percent of the labor force is organized. The trade union movement is highly fragmented--there are eight national labor confederations--and very politicized. Moreover, the confederations exercise only a limited degree of control over their affiliates. Between October 1983 and mid-1985, however, over 250 new unions were officially recognized. Many of the confederations are affiliated with regional and international labor organizations.

Approximately one-third of Dominican organized labor is Communist controlled or influenced. The politically affiliated labor organizations frequently pursue partisan political objectives rather than workers' economic demands. The Government has on occasion briefly detained labor union leaders in order to stop strikes or other labor actions it considered illegal. Rising unemployment and the continued deterioration of the nation's economy have hampered the growth of organized labor. Unions have the right to negotiate and to strike, even though they operate under the handicap of a dated labor code written during the Trujillo dictatorship that gives unions few rights vis-a-vis management. For example, there is no effective protection for organizers or union officials. The current administration has, however, given unions more leeway under the existing legislation than previously and has proposed legislation to modernize the labor code and enhance universally recognized labor rights.

Professional organizations of lawyers, doctors, journalists, and others function freely. Like the unions, these organizations are free to maintain relations with counterpart international bodies of diverse political philosophies.

c. Freedom of Religion

Discrimination on racial, religious, or ethnic grounds is prohibited by the Constitution. There are no religious requirements to hold public office, no restrictions on the practice of religious faiths, and no social discrimination based on religion. However, approximately 95 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, and the Church's preeminent position is accepted by the populace at large and is recognized in the Concordat between the Dominican Republic and the Holy See.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual restrictions on travel within or outside the country. Many political exiles returned after a 1978 amnesty, but a legal ban on the return of certain members of the Trujillo family still exists.

The status and treatment of Haitians living in the Dominican Republic has been criticized by the press and the public, both in the Dominican Republic and abroad. The Haitian community of approximately 500,000 is composed mainly of illegal immigrants seeking employment and better living conditions. This figure also includes between 400 and 450 individuals, most opponents of Haitian President Duvalier, who have received "political refugee" status from the Dominican Government. Illegal immigrants are routinely deported under Dominican immigration law, while those seeking political refuge are not repatriated if the Government determines that they have a legitimate fear of persecution. There are restrictions against foreigners engaging in political activity directed against another country.

In September, several Haitians with political refugee status in the Dominican Republic, who maintained that they were politically persecuted, were freely permitted to depart the country for Costa Rica. In October, two groups consisting respectively of six and seven Haitian residents of the Dominican Republic occupied the Venezuelan Embassy and the Italian Ambassador's residence in Santo Domingo. The Haitians, recognized as political refugees by both the Dominican Government and the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, charged that they were being politically persecuted by Haitian security forces in the Dominican Republic and requested asylum. The Dominican Foreign Ministry issued a communique rejecting the Haitians' charges, guaranteeing the safety of the refugees, and noting that the Haitians were completely free to leave the Dominican Republic if they desired. Subsequent Dominican government declarations stated that neither foreigners nor Dominicans are allowed to intimidate residents of the Dominican Republic and denied that Haitian intelligence agents operate inside the country.

At the request of the concerned embassies, Dominican police on November 2 removed all those Haitians who had not previously departed the premises: three in the Venezuelan mission and six in the Italian residence. The Haitians were not detained by Dominican authorities.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Dominican Republic is a functioning multiparty democracy in which governments are freely elected by the citizenry. Opposition groups of the left, right, and center are allowed to operate openly. The change in ruling parties brought about in the 1978 elections, and the free and fair elections held in 1982, demonstrate the established right of citizens to change their government via the ballot box. The ample participation of the opposition Social Christian Reformist Party and the pro-Cuban Dominican Liberation Party in the independent Dominican legislature underlines the climate for pluralism and political participation. Political parties and other political movements are freely engaged in organizational efforts and in campaigning for the national elections scheduled for May 16, 1986. In addition, the Central Electoral Board, an independent government body charged with administering the elections, has begun preparations to assure open, honest elections.

In November, the internal nominating process of the ruling Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD) was marred by irregularities and violence. Vote counting to determine the PRD presidential candidate was interrupted by a violent confrontation between rival bands inside convention headquarters the day after the party's convention and primary election. The official vote count had not resumed by the end of the year.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Dominican Republic participates actively in international and regional human rights bodies and supports human rights issues in international forums. International human rights organizations have been allowed free access to the country. The Government has cooperated fully with the investigation into the sensitive subject of the treatment of Haitian refugees and migrant workers. At the June 1985 meeting of the International Labor Organization (ILO) Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Dominican Government submitted a report identifying the changes it had introduced to improve the working conditions of Haitian sugar canecutters in the country. The report, which was generally well received, responded to criticisms contained in a 1983 ILO report on the situation of Haitian seasonal agricultural workers.

Private organizations which freely report and comment on alleged human rights violations include the Dominican Human Rights Committee (CDH) and the Dominican Union for the Defense of Human Rights (UDHU). The major allegations of these organizations in 1985 were that the detention of leftist and labor figures was a means of harassment rather than investigation, and that the public order was not threatened by the actions or plans of those detained. The CDH also charged that there were 58 disappearances between 1981-1984, although the group did not assert that the majority of the disappearances were politically motivated or government-instigated. Rather, the CDH seemed to fault the Government for its failure to investigate adequately the disappearances. The Government has not harassed these organizations for their criticism of official actions or policies.

In June the U.S.-based International League for Human Rights, drawing on information provided by the CDH, presented a report to the United Nations Working Group on Involuntary and Forced Disappearances which denounced 58 disappearances in the Dominican Republic. The report failed to present evidence that these were political disappearances.

Amnesty International Report 1985 (covering 1984) expressed concern about "numerous short-term arrests of individuals, some of whom it believed may have been held on suspicion of non-violent opposition to the government." Freedom House rates the Dominican Republic "free."

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Dominican Republic is a poor country with a population of approximately 6.6 million and an estimated annual population growth rate of 2.5 percent. Half of the population is under 16 years of age. Since the early 1980's the low international price of sugar, the country's principal export, and the high cost of petroleum and other imports have seriously hurt the economy. Per capita income is estimated to be about 1370 pesos per year. At the floating exchange rate of approximately 3 pesos to $1 (December 1985), per capita income is less than $460 per year. Unemployment, now estimated between 25 and 30 percent, is on the increase as economic growth has slowed and more individuals enter the labor market. At least another 20 percent of the labor force is believed to be underemployed. Poverty is widespread.

Per capita calorie consumption barely meets minimum requirements, and only 59 percent of the population enjoys access to potable water. Health conditions are poor, particularly in the rural countryside. In 1985 major vaccination campaigns were continued by the Government to address some of these problems. In 1985, life expectancy at birth was 63.7 years, and the infant mortality rate was 73.8 per 1,000 live births. Primary school enrollment is claimed to be over 90 percent, but some observers estimate the rate is closer to 75 percent. The literacy rate is 67 percent.

Throughout the long and difficult negotiations with the International Monetary Fund in 1983 and 1984, the Government remained continually conscious of the impact of adjustment and austerity on the Dominican people. Although some offsetting measures taken by the Government may have been ill-advised in the eyes of some economists, they have doubtless made the adjustment process more socially and politically tolerable to the average Dominican.

The Dominican labor code prohibits employment of youths under 14 years of age, and restricts the nighttime employment of youths ages 14-18. The labor code also provides that employees under 18 work no more than eight hours a day, and, in addition to other limits on youth employment, specifies that those 18 years and younger will not be employed in dangerous or unhealthy jobs. In practice many of the restrictions in the labor code are ignored. Young people, including minors less than 14, engage in a wide variety of work which technically violates the labor regulations. For example, the labor code's provisions regulating vendors and shoeshine boys are not enforced.

In 1985 the Government, recognizing the hardships entailed by the rising cost of living, took steps to raise the basic minimum monthly salary from 175 to 250 pesos (approximately $58 to $83) for both public and private sector employees (with some smaller businesses exempt from the new pay scale). At the same time, the minimum daily wage for agricultural workers was raised from 5 to 6 pesos. The labor code establishes that all workers are entitled to 24 hours of rest after six days of work; in practice, a typical work week is Monday through Friday plus half a day on Saturday. Safety and health conditions at the workplace do not always meet acceptable standards. The existing social security system is inadequate, although legislation to expand and improve it is before the Congress.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Sexual and racial discrimination are prohibited by law and women's political rights have been recognized in legislation since 1942. Forty-seven percent of registered voters are women, and women hold both elective and appointed offices in the Government. The Jorge Blanco administration has established an office to encourage the advancement of women, and in 1983 the United Nations International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women set up its headquarters in Santo Domingo. Divorce is easily attainable by either spouse, and women can hold property in their own names apart from their husbands. Nonetheless, women traditionally have not shared equal social and economic status or opportunity with men.

There is subtle social discrimination against darker skinned Dominicans, although this has not prevented their success in a variety of fields, including elected political office. Dominicans, for historical reasons and because of sharp cultural differences, are generally prejudiced against Haitians. This prejudice carries over to the minority in the population who are Dominicans of Haitian descent. These prejudices, social tensions, and historical enmities sometimes result in violence which affects the Haitian migrant workers who enter the country under contract to cut sugar cane. In June, at least one, and possibly seven, Haitian canecutters, as well as one or more Dominicans, were killed during disturbances at a Dominican State Sugar Council plantation at Triple Ozama near Santo Domingo. The exact circumstances of the deaths are unclear, but it appears the incident stemmed from Haitian frustration at delays in the repatriation process. Although the conditions of the migrant Haitian workers have improved over the situation which existed several years ago, the incident underlines the fact that problems remain.

ECUADOR

Ecuador is a constitutional republic whose main political institutions, the Presidency and the National Congress, are determined by free elections. An independent judiciary is presided over by the Supreme Court, which is selected by the Congress. Since 1979, when elections ended seven years of military rule, two democratically elected administrations have demonstrated strong support for the principles of representative government and civil liberties stipulated in the Constitution. Over a dozen political parties and a free and partisan press create a lively and contentious democratic environment.

The President exercises control over the police through the Ministry of Government. In 1985 local human rights organizations alleged various instances of police brutality, especially in the interrogation of suspected terrorists. Terrorist activities of the Alfaro Vive Group (allied with the Colombian-based 19th of April Movement, or M-19) increased in number and intensity during the year. A widely publicized kidnaping of a Guayaquil businessman in August resulted in the deaths of a number of terrorists, some while in police custody, as well as the innocent victim.

In an essentially free enterprise economic system, Ecuador has had for many years a broad-based and varied labor movement. But Ecuadorean society is also marked by extensive rural poverty, especially among the indigenous Indian populations.

Despite a worsening security situation resulting from an increasingly active domestic terrorist movement, very poor prison conditions, and a criminal justice system characterized by long delays in bringing individuals to trial, Ecuador was able to maintain generally high human rights standards in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no substantiated charges during 1985 of government forces killing political opponents.

A prominent Guayaquil businessman, Nahim Isaias, kidnaped August 7 by Alfaro Vive and M-19 terrorists, died along with four of his captors during an unsuccessful rescue attempt on September 2. Official accounts indicate Isaias was shot by the kidnapers at the onset of the rescue attempt. Later, two leading M-19 terrorists involved in the kidnaping died in police custody during a routine prison transfer. The police reported the prisoners were shot in an abortive escape attempt.

In another incident, police arrested a Guayaquil political organizer and one-time supporter of President Leon Febres-Cordero following a lengthy manhunt. The prisoner then confessed to charges that he had tortured and murdered a political opponent (an alternate member of Congress). The President denounced the murder publicly and promised impartiality in the prosecution of the case.

As in past years, human rights groups periodically charged local government indifference to or complicity in the deaths of rural inhabitants allegedly killed in land disputes.

ECUADOR

b. Disappearance

There were no reported instances of government-instigated abduction or disappearance in 1985. There have been reports of brief abductions of newspaper and television reporters by the Alfaro Vive group, presumably in order to relay messages from the terrorists to the general public. A businessman frustrated an Alfaro Vive attempt to kidnap him on December 19. Five persons tried to force him into a car and shot him in the mouth and shoulder when he put up a struggle. He wounded one of the abductors before getting help from others in driving off the attackers.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law. Harsh handling by police in the capture and interrogation of criminal suspects does occur but is not condoned by the Government. In a much publicized case, a former high-ranking government official accused the police of beating his son, a suspect in the Isaias kidnapping, during interrogation. The son later died from injuries received during his capture.

Ecuadorean prisons are generally acknowledged to be overcrowded, unhealthy, and harsh. While contrary to prison regulations, solitary confinement and beatings are used for disciplinary reasons. Prisoners with money can pay prison officials to avoid punishment and improve their living conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Preventive detention is illegal, and the criminal code forbids isolated confinement for more than 24 hours and detention without charge for more than 48 hours. In some instances, however, people have been held beyond these time limits. Mayors and municipal council presidents are constitutionally empowered to grant habeas corpus. In practice, habeas corpus and bail are granted liberally, irrespective of the severity of the charges. There is no forced or compulsory labor and forced exile is not practiced.

As the terrorist activities of the Alfaro Vive group increased during 1985, human rights activists accused the Government of illegal arrests and detention of suspected terrorists. There were a number of reports of arrests made without proper warrants. Opposition politicians also accused the Government of using the judicial system to harass members of the previous Government.

The judicial system suffers from a chronic case backlog, frequently resulting in prison stays of up to two years for detainees awaiting trial. Much of the overcrowding of the prisons is a result of the large number of these suspects. However, time spent in prison awaiting trial counts toward completion of the final sentence for those convicted. On the other hand, some other long-term detainees, when eventually tried, are found innocent.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial.

Defendants have the right to counsel, to face their accusers, to refrain from testifying against themselves, and to appeal their sentences to intermediate or higher courts. Although a public defender system is mandated in the Constitution, this provision has not yet been implemented.

The Congress elects the Supreme Court and has the power to impeach judges, fix the judicial branch budget, and ratify the Supreme Court's judicial review decisions. Since the Government of President Febres-Cordero took office in August 1984, there has been a continuing conflict between the Executive and the Judiciary over the use of presidential power. Political opponents of the President claim that he has undermined the Constitution through his running dispute with the president of the Supreme Court (who is a member of an opposition party) and by his efforts to change the court's composition to reflect his own political philosophy.

As in most civil law systems, there is no trial by jury, and judges play a central role in investigations as well as in deciding guilt or innocence. Legal investigations as well as prosecutions are carried out by the Attorney General, Solicitor General, and the provincial prosecutors. These judicial branch officials defend state interests in criminal and civil cases, receive complaints against judges, conduct fiscal inspections of lower courts, and provide often influential legal opinions to all court cases.

Most judges and law enforcement officials are seriously underpaid and thus susceptible to corruption. In addition, they are hampered by an unmanageable backlog of cases, and lack sufficient technical expertise and budgetary resources to conduct thorough investigations. Another problem, according to some judicial branch spokesmen, is that utilization of the multiple levels of appeal often results in excessive reversals of lower court convictions.

The autonomous Constitutional Guarantees Tribunal, consisting of representatives of the presidency, congress, judiciary, municipalities, and business and labor sectors, may investigate charges of constitutional or human rights violations. However, in the midst of a fractious debate with the Congress over a new minimum wage bill in March the President, ignored a ruling from the Tribunal, which had sided with the opposition-controlled Congress. (The Tribunal is chaired by a member of the Central Committee of Ecuador's Communist Party, which forms part of the opposition.)

Military courts are empowered to try only those cases involving acts against military installations and the infractions of military regulations.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government respects the sanctity of the home and privacy of correspondence. The law requires police to have a warrant before entering a home except in the case of hot pursuit, and generally, this legal requirement is observed in practice. However, in 1985 human rights activists claimed that security forces were involved in a number of surreptitious entries. These claims have not been substantiated in legal proceedings.

ECUADOR

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and expression. This right is vigorously exercised in the Ecuadorean mass media, which are essentially privately owned and free from direct government control. Twelve principal dailies, dozens of weeklies and magazines, ten television stations, and more than 450 radio stations operate in Ecuador and present to the general public a wide variety of political opinions.

The political opposition, however, claims that the Government of President Febres-Cordero has used indirect methods to pressure the media to conform politically. One specific charge is that officials directed government-paid advertising away from the Quito daily "Hoy," because this newspaper has been more openly critical of government policies than others. The Inter-American Press Association issued a report in March criticizing the Government for taking reprisals against media representatives opposed to it and for denying government advertising to them.

In a controversial move, the Government prevented the opening of a new television station owned and managed in part by political adversaries. Authorization to operate this station had been issued by the outgoing administration of former president Osvaldo Hurtado three days before it left office. The Government cited technical violations of the communications law. The Government's action is being contested through the judicial system. The Inter-American Broadcasting Association sent a team to Ecuador to investigate the matter but has not yet issued a report of its findings. The Ecuadorean criminal code prohibits written or oral statements which defame or demean public officials, government institutions, or national symbols. In September, controversial Guayaquil Mayor Abdala Bucaram fled the country rather than face possible imprisonment on charges of defaming the President, spreading false rumors about the Government's handling of the Isaias kidnapping, and slandering the Armed Forces (the latter in a newspaper interview published in New York).

There is no political censorship of foreign or domestic books, films, or works of art. There is no government interference with academic inquiry.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to free assembly and association is established in the Constitution and observed in practice. Public rallies require prior approval from local governments, but this is generally granted. In March, however, the Government denied a parade permit to workers participating in a nationwide strike.

All private sector employees and government blue collar workers enjoy the right to organize unions, bargain collectively, and strike. Government white collar workers may not legally strike, and their labor organizations are not recognized by the Government as full-fledged unions with bargaining rights. Labor organizations represent perhaps 15 percent of the country's economically active population. Organized into four major confederations and many independent unions, the labor movement reflects widely different political orientations.

ECUADOR

The labor code provides for a considerable government role in the resolution of disputes between labor and management, especially through the Ministry of Labor's conciliation tribunals. Trade union leaders are elected by their membership. The Constitution provides for formal labor participation in government through representation on the executive boards of several national institutions. The labor leadership meets regularly with the Minister of Labor and other senior government officials to discuss ongoing sectoral problems.

In January, workers striking to protest increases in the price of gasoline and public transport were arrested by police during a public demonstration. The International Labor Organization Committee on Freedom of Association, after receiving formal complaints from labor confederations representing the workers, concluded in its report on the January incident that workers have the right to strike in defense of their social and economic interests, and that police intervention in strike action should be limited to the maintenance of law and order. The Government argued that the nation-wide strike was illegal under Ecuador's labor code because it was not called in connection with a collective bargaining dispute.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, Ecuador has no state religion and all are free to practice the religion of their choice. Clergymen, by local law, may not become high-level elected or appointed government officials.

Foreign missionaries of many faiths have operated freely in Ecuador for many years. Radio HCJB, the Voice of the Andes, a U.S.-based evangelical broadcasting company in Ecuador, is a world-wide, multilingual shortwave radio service which also broadcasts domestically on FM and AM.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Ecuadoreans may travel freely at home or abroad. There is no discriminatory treatment of women or other groups with regard to travel, emigration, or repatriation. Individuals from other Latin American countries have readily found asylum in Ecuador. No cases of involuntary repatriation of persons fleeing political persecution were reported in 1985.

In March the Government issued a decree simplifying the bureaucratic procedures for, among other things, certifying citizenship of Ecuadoreans born or living abroad. The result has been to ease difficulties encountered by Ecuadorean citizens traveling to and from Ecuador.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Ecuador is a multiparty democracy with 17 registered parties representing the full political spectrum. Thirteen of these parties, including two Marxist parties, have representatives in the unicameral national congress. Ecuadoreans 18 years of age and over have the right to vote. Voting is mandatory for literates and voluntary for illiterates. Political participation and suffrage are open to all citizens without discrimination as to sex, ethnic group, or socioeconomic status. All citizens have the right to form and join political parties. Groups not fulfilling party certification requirements, which include obtaining a minimum number of signatures of previously unaffiliated voters, are not entitled to field candidates.

Since the return to democracy in 1979 after seven years of military dictatorship, Ecuadorean politics is characterized by strident partisanship and shifting alliances among diverse political groups. Strong political rivalries among individuals and ideological and regional differences account for much of the rough and tumble nature of the political arena. In public and in private, the current President has reiterated his support of democratic principles. His inauguration in August 1984, was the first peaceful transfer of power in Ecuador from one democratically elected government to another in 24 years.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government maintains an open and constructive approach to international human rights issues. An Ecuadorean is a member of the Human Rights Committee of the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the U.N. Committee on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination. In February Ecuador became a signatory to the U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment and Punishments. On this occasion, Ecuador publicly reaffirmed its "firm defense of the observance of human rights" and its support for previous U.N. resolutions on this subject.

No well-founded allegations of human rights abuses were lodged against the Ecuadorean Government by international or domestic human rights groups in 1985. Domestic human rights bodies are free to investigate human rights practices within the country. Representatives of the International Labor Organization's regional office in Lima travel regularly to Ecuador in order to consult with government officials on labor policies and programs.

The regional Latin American Human Rights Association (ALDHU) is headquartered in Quito. There is also a local office of Amnesty International. Locally active human rights organizations include the Catholic Church-sponsored Ecumenical Commission on Human Rights (CEDHU) and the National Human Rights Commission. During 1985 individual human rights activists occasionally met with Ministry of Government officials to discuss human rights concerns. A human rights office has been established in the Foreign Ministry. In consultation with the Ministry of Government is responsible for providing detailed, responsive replies, to queries from outside Ecuador concerning human rights matters. Amnesty International Report 1985 does not comment on Ecuador. Freedom House rates Ecuador "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ecuador's population of 9.3 million is divided nearly equally between urban and rural residents. After a 3.4 percent yearly growth rate during the 1962-74 period, the country's population is now increasing annually by about 2.8 percent.

ECUADOR

The World Bank calculated Ecuador's per capita gross national product in 1983 at $1430. The economy is mixed, with the private sector contributing 60 percent of the nation's production. Key activities, such as petroleum, telecommunications, and much of the aviation and energy industries, are under Government control.

The economy has been recovering slowly from a regressive period that existed from 1978-1983. In 1983 world recession and the destructive effects of the "El Nino" weather phenomenon contributed to a 3.1 percent negative growth rate and to an inflation rate of 52 percent in 1983. The year 1984 saw economic growth rebounding to about 4.1 percent, and inflation reduced to 25.1 percent. Although Ecuador lacks precise unemployment statistics, official and semi-official sources have calculated that open urban unemployment was 12 to 15 percent in 1983, and was probably reduced to the 8 to 11 percent range in 1984. Unemployment and underemployment remain persistent problems, with an estimated 50 percent of the work force employed only part-time or temporarily.

Considerable strides have been made during the past decade in the areas of health and education, especially under the 1979-84 national development plan. The World Bank calculates that in 1985 the average life expectancy at birth was 63.7 years and infant mortality rate was 63.1 per 1000. The caloric supply in 1977 was reported to be 90.61 percent of nutritional requirements. Nonetheless, the Ecuadorean Center for Population Studies and Responsible Parenthood estimates that 40 percent of preschool children and about 90 percent of the rural population suffer from malnutrition. Health care is improving owing to expanded delivery systems and an increased number of doctors. However, many facilities continue to lack adequate numbers of trained personnel and modern equipment.

According to the World Bank, 45 percent of the population in 1980 (82 percent in the cities and 16 percent in the countryside) had access to potable water. The Febres-Cordero administration has focused particular attention on fulfillment of the President's electoral campaign promise to provide more "bread, housing and employment." Housing represents an area of immediate concern. Although the average household size has dropped from 5.0 to 4.1 from 1974 to the present, the overall housing deficit is estimated at approximately one million units.

World Bank statistics for 1974 indicated an adult literacy rate of 74.2 percent, of which the urban rate was 90.3 percent and the rural rate was 61.8 percent. Male literacy was 78.2 percent while female literacy was 70.4 percent. According to statistics provided by the National Statistics and Census Institute (INEC), the literacy rate was raised in 1983 to 85.5 percent (92.2 percent in urban areas and 78.5 percent in rural areas). An estimated 30 percent of school-age children in rural areas do not attend school. The low quality of public education at all levels has caused serious concern on the part of government officials and private industry.

According to Ecuador's labor code, employment of minors under the age of 18 requires parental permission. This regulation is generally observed in larger enterprises. However, a large percentage of rural children are part of the active work force. The standard work week is 40 hours with generous paid annual vacations prescribed by law. Ecuador enforces a minimum wage law.

ECUADOR

Safe and healthy working conditions are mandated by law and employers are responsible for maintaining such conditions. The autonomous Social Security Institute monitors complaints in this area and has legal power to enforce compliance.

The Ecuadorean Constitution establishes complete legal equality for men and women. However, owing to the female's traditional role in Latin American societies, there are few highly placed women in the political structure. Fewer than 15 percent of the candidates for elective office in 1984 were female. Three of the 71 congressional deputies elected in 1984 were women; no woman served in the previous congress except as an alternate. Several deputies are also of Indian or mixed ethnic origin. Several women, including a provincial governor and two vice ministers, serve in prominent positions in the present Government. By contrast, women still suffer some discrimination under civil law, despite considerable progress in recent years. In divorce matters and in the right of inheritance, the male continues to enjoy preferential status as head of the household.

The indigenous Indian population is primarily rural and poor, although there is no overt or legally sanctioned discrimination practiced against them.

EL SALVADOR

With the March 31, 1985 election of legislative deputies and town mayors, the people of El Salvador completed the structure of popularly elected government which was initiated with the election of a Constitutional Assembly in 1982 and continued with the writing of a new Constitution in 1983 and presidential elections in 1984. Nine political parties contested the March elections, which were pronounced open and honest by international observers who witnessed the voting. The military safeguarded the electoral process and remained neutral throughout the campaign.

For six years El Salvador has faced a Communist-backed insurgency which has ties to, and obtains material support from Cuba and the Soviet Union through Nicaragua. In addition it suffers from a weak economy, a history of violence, and weakness in public administration and in the administration of justice. Two rounds of discussions between the Government and the insurgent forces were held in late 1984 to seek a negotiated solution to the conflict, but the guerrillas' intransigence prevented a third round in 1985. In a pastoral letter issued by El Salvador's bishops on August 8, the Church called for a negotiated resolution of the war and stressed the legitimacy which the Government had gained through the electoral process. Despite the country's ongoing conflict and the state of emergency, political and economic life continue, unions organize and strike, demonstrations by students and others opposed to policies of the Government are unhindered, and views critical of the Government are openly and freely published and broadcast over radio and television.

El Salvador's economy is mixed. Banking and marketing of major crops are nationalized and the price of food grains is subsidized. The land reform program begun in 1980 continues. There are few regulations on other economic activities, and individuals are free to open and conduct business both within the country and in trade with other nations. The declining value of the national currency against the dollar has raised the price of imports and contributed to inflation, an additional burden on an economy strained by war and sabotage by the guerrilla forces.

Some five to seven thousand armed guerrillas of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMLN) are attempting to overthrow the elected Government by force of arms. The guerrillas, having suffered reverses on the battlefield, have increasingly resorted to terrorist tactics, including economic sabotage, traffic stoppages, use of land mines, assassination, and kidnapping. The most spectacular cases of guerrilla kidnaping were the seizures of 27 elected mayors and President Duarte's daughter.

Respect for human rights by the Government of El Salvador during 1985 continued to be strongly influenced by the nation's civil conflict. The establishment of a stable public order able to protect individual rights continues to be disrupted by military operations of both guerrilla and Government forces, acts of revenge, fear, and a prevailing uncertainty caused by violence. Civil liberties have been restricted by a state of emergency legal regime. The civil conflict contributes to the ineffectiveness of the judicial system; efforts are underway to strengthen the judicial system.

In line with President Duarte's policy, the Armed Forces have endeavored to conduct their operations in a more humane manner. However, loss of civilian life as a result of military action by Government forces continues and there are still credible reports of prisoners being subjected to abuse by Government officials. The policy of the Government is clearly opposed to such acts. Complaints of human rights abuses by the Security Forces have been reduced by unifying command of the three police services, National Police, Treasury Police, and National Guard, under a single Vice Minister for Public Security, by issuance of standard operating procedures for arrest and detention to safeguard arrestees, and by human rights instruction for police agents and Armed Forces personnel.

The Armed Forces continue to be accused of human rights violations, but the number of such allegations is lower, civilian deaths during military operations are fewer, and there were no allegations of massacres by the Armed Forces. During 1985 the army evacuated groups of civilians from zones of military operations and turned them over to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC).

Accusations of indiscriminate bombing continue, but no convincing evidence to substantiate them has been offered. Many of the accusations come from the guerrilla radio stations or from guerrilla supporters. The bombing restrictions ordered by President Duarte in August 1984 remain in force and appear to be generally observed. The Special Representative of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Professor Pastor Ridruejo, concluded in his November 1985 report on human rights conditions in El Salvador that "the Salvadoran Army is endeavoring to conduct the war in a more humanitarian manner than in the past and is therefore not pursuing a policy of indiscriminate bombing, although in a few cases air and mortar attacks are causing civilian casualties."

The brutal phenomenon known as "death squad" assassination has declined dramatically, along with the general level of civil violence. In contrast to previous years when right-wing vigilante groups were active, no rightist group has claimed responsibility for any murder during the entire year. Some unexplained deaths may still be the work of extreme rightist killers but the number directly attributable to them has declined sharply. Assassinations for which the perpetrators advertise their responsibility are now usually the work of the leftist groups. Guerrillas have claimed responsibility for many murders during 1985.

EL SALVADOR

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The number of politically-motivated killings continues to decline from the levels of previous years. In 1983, according to reports in the San Salvador press, there was an average of 140 politically motivated deaths a month; in 1984 the average was 64; from January to November of 1985 it was 29 per month. One legacy of El Salvador's history of political killing is that criminal deaths are often disguised to appear politically motivated in order to avoid correct attribution. Often it is impossible to determine the real motive. While many unexplained deaths are undoubtedly politically motivated, others are the result of criminal or personal motivations.

By some estimates, the FMLN-FDR was responsible for approximately 55 percent of the political killings from January through November. Figures for the 318 political deaths during this period, as taken from the local press and other sources, show 145 deaths (45.6 percent) by guerrillas and another 31 possibly by guerrillas, 12 possibly by the extreme right, three by the civil defense, nine by security forces/army, 77 by unknown assailants, and 41 civilians killed in action.

During 1985, FMLN-affiliated terrorist groups stepped up individual and collective assassinations, especially in urban areas. For example, the Clara Elizabeth Ramirez Front (CERF), a dissident group of the FMLN, publicly claimed responsibility for four murders in the first two weeks of January. On February 28, guerrillas attacked the residence of the President of the Central Elections Council, killing two of his bodyguards, a street vendor, and a passerby. In March, the Popular Revolutionary Army (ERP) of the FMLN claimed responsibility for a rocket attack on National Police Headquarters in San Salvador which killed one civilian and wounded eight others. The CERF assassinated the Armed Forces press spokesman on March 7. On April 8, 20 residents of Santa Cruz Loma, La Paz department were killed by guerrillas. The victims included six members of one family, three of them children, who burned to death when the attackers doused their house with kerosene and set it afire. Thirteen unarmed members of the Civil Defense forces were assassinated during this raid. Leaflets left at the scene claimed responsibility for the massacre on behalf of the Popular Liberation Forces (FPL) of the FMLN.

In May, the FMLN killed the Mayor of San Jorge, San Miguel, while attempting to kidnap him. On May 16, the FMLN also assassinated the military judge handling the cases of those accused of subversion, sabotage, and attempting to overthrow the Government. On June 19, the Revolutionary Workers' Party of Central America (PRTC) of the FMLN opened fire on a crowded sidewalk restaurant in San Salvador, killing 13 and wounding 12. Among those killed were four unarmed U.S. Embassy Marine Security Guards and two visiting American businessmen. In Chinameca, San Miguel, in the early morning of July 19, guerrillas kidnaped and murdered four men. In early September, three members of a family who tried to prevent the kidnaping of a 15 year-old female relative were killed by guerrillas, according to neighbors in Dulce Nombre de Maria, Chalatenango.

Guerrilla-placed mines resulted in the deaths of at least 29 civilians and in injuries to more than 92 others between January and August. Many persons have been killed and wounded by guerrilla machinegun fire during the numerous national traffic stoppages declared by the guerrillas. For example, on October 13 a Salvadoran Red Cross volunteer was seriously wounded in an attack by guerrillas on a clearly marked ambulance.

President Jose Napoleon Duarte has continued his efforts to eliminate human rights abuses committed by the security services. The Vice Minister of Defense for Public Security issued human rights regulations mandating humane treatment of prisoners. These regulations were provided to agents of the security services and are enforced; detentions of members of the Armed Forces for violations of the law or human rights rose from three in 1979 to 271 in 1984.

No previously known right-wing extremist group claimed responsibility for any assassination during 1985. A group calling itself the "Central Anti-Communist Organization" called a San Salvador daily in May, threatening to "punish those who take orders from communists;" nothing further was heard from this group. In December, persons who identified themselves the "Protective Army of Santa Ana" (EPSA) killed three persons they claimed were thieves allegedly because local judges had failed to punish such criminals.

The only time the name of a previously known right-wing extremist group was used during 1985 was in July, when a communique ostensibly issued by the "Secret Anti-Communist Army" (ESA) threatened 11 persons associated with the National University. The Government condemned this action and ran frequent radio advertisements calling for anyone with knowledge of the ESA to notify the National Police. Later information strongly suggested that the communique was planted by a group of leftist students at the university to frighten rival groups. Some of those threatened did leave the country but those who remained have not been harmed.

Tutela Legal, the legal assistance office of the Archbishopric of San Salvador, attributed 82 murders to the extreme right through the end of June 1985. Salvadoran press reports from January to November 1985 listed a total of 12 persons who were killed "possibly by the extreme right" and 77 others by "unknown assailant." Tutela Legal frequently attributes murders to the extreme right which other observers believe to be criminal, not political, in nature, or in which the victim is not identified and for which Tutela Legal gives no reason for its classification.

EL SALVADOR

Untrained and undisciplined local Civil Defense members have been cited for human rights abuses, including the killing of a civilian in May. A Civil Defense commander was arrested in July in San Vicente Department for threatening residents if they did not enlist in the Civil Defense program. The Government is addressing the problem by offering both military and human rights training. There are credible reports that regular Armed Forces troops, in some instances, have meted out harsh treatment to masas, the guerrillas' civilian supporters who provide much of the logistical infrastructure necessary to maintain their operations in the field. A group of 13 priests, as well as the official Human Rights Commission (CDH), meet regularly with military units to lecture about human rights and discuss problems which soldiers may confront in the field.

Charges made by guerrillas that the Salvadoran Air Force practices indiscriminate bombing are not supported by hard evidence. Most of these reports originate in guerrilla-controlled media or in testimony taken from guerrilla masas. These regularly employ fabricated accusations of Government abuses for their political impact. Salvadoran pilots generally follow the strict government bombing regulations designed to prevent civilian casualties. In a few instances, however, civilians have been injured or killed by bombing as the result of error. In San Jose Guayabal, on April 15, three members of a family were killed while hiding in a granary, apparently by a rocket fired from a helicopter in support of National Guardsmen who were under attack by the guerrillas. In August, a woman and two of her children were killed in El Ocotal, when an Air Force plane bombed a marking round that had mistakenly identified the small settlement as the target. The Air Force acknowledged the mistake and paid compensation to the survivors. In neither case were civilians the intended targets.

The number of press-reported civilian disappearances through November 1985 was 129, including non-political disappearances such as runaway children and criminal cases. There were also 303 persons abducted by guerrillas. By comparison, Tutela Legal reported 23 cases of disappearance after detention, presumably by government forces, and 24 cases of abduction by the guerrillas, from January-October 1985. Newspaper and eyewitness accounts often describe "heavily armed men in civilian clothing" as perpetrators of the seizures.

Some of the "disappeared" are found to have been held in unacknowledged detention by Armed or Security Forces, only to reappear in the criminal justice system. This problem has declined with the implementation of detention procedures requiring prompt notification of the arrest to the family, the ICRC, Tutela Legal, and the CDH. Disappearances are particularly difficult to track as many cases are not reported to the press. Also, it is impossible to tell how many disappearances are actually desertions of family, emigration, or enlistment into guerrilla ranks.

EL SALVADOR

The Government has recently recognized the problem of trafficking in children, some kidnaped for virtual sale to adoptive parents abroad. Common criminal gangs and guerrillas frequently stage kidnappings for ransom. Because the families of such kidnap victims generally try to avoid publicity in order to negotiate the captives' release, these kidnappings receive little public notice.

The most spectacular cases of kidnappings carried out by the guerrillas in 1985 were the kidnappings of 27 elected town mayors and a number of other town officials and the September 10 kidnaping of President Duarte's daughter. The guerrillas held the President's daughter for 44 days; some of the mayors were captive for as long as six months. The guerrillas finally turned them over to the Government on October 24 in exchange for 25 captured guerrillas in government prisons and the departure from the country of 101 wounded guerrillas. One mayor and eight other town officials were not released in the exchange. On December 30, the FMLN clandestine radio station announced that the mayor and an unspecified number of other officials from Cacaopera had been executed on the day of their abduction in July 1984 for cooperating with the Government and that a town official from Uluazapa had been killed in December 1983. Although the FMLN pledged not to kidnap family members of government and military officials in the future, government officials remain targets. The Civil Aviation Director, an Air Force colonel serving in a civilian post, was abducted in early November.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The effort to enforce the code of procedures of the Armed and Security forces has had a positive effect. The timely notification of arrests to family and the ICRC, Tutela Legal, and CDH has decreased the number of abuses. The procedures state that physical abuse or intimidation are prohibited. All prisoners must be examined by a physician immediately upon entrance into a jail to determine whether they have been abused or are in need of medical treatment for any reason. These procedures were strengthened when the Minister of Defense and Public Security, General Vides Casanova, issued a document on March 27 which reemphasized the illegality of inhumane treatment of prisoners and their right to read the confessions they sign. The CDH and the military chaplains under Father F. Delgado now give human rights classes to the Armed Forces and police on a regular basis. A widely disseminated "Handbook on Human Rights," issued in June is another positive effort to educate the military and police on human rights values.

The CDH, ICRC, and Tutela Legal, who work directly with prisoners, say that complaints of torture and other forms of abuse continue, although at a lower level than in past years. Most abuses are reported to occur during the initial hours of capture and range from threats of death to physical torture. The most common complaints are of prolonged and continuous interrogation; being forced to stand for long periods, often while blindfolded; and sleep deprivation. There are reports that forced confessions still occur and that prisoners are sometimes not permitted to read their confessions before signing them.

According to government figures, 215 guerrilla combatants and an additional 453 guerrilla supporters voluntarily turned themselves in between January and October 25. After debriefing, such persons are transported by the CDH to the destination of their choice. Captured guerrillas have, in general, received adequate treatment. For example, foreign doctors were permitted to perform surgery on captured guerrilla leader Nidia Diaz to improve movement in her injured hand.

There were no complaints of torture in the penitentiaries in 1985. The guards are not abusive and prisoners receive family and conjugal visits. Although problems at the larger penal institutions include meager food rations, scarcity of potable water, and overcrowding, there are some opportunities for gainful employment by the prisoners. Inmates charged with subversion are permitted their own internal organization and give political classes which they organize and teach themselves. Punishment cells are primitive, but reportedly are rarely used.

The FMLN claims that it respects the "physical and psychological integrity" of its captives. However, there are many credible reports of civilians being kidnaped and later killed by guerrillas and of soldiers being executed after surrendering to the guerrillas. Fifteen members of the Armed Forces and one member of the Civil Defense were kidnaped and killed by guerrillas between January 1 and October 25, 1985. The guerrillas denied medical treatment to Antonio Hernandez, town administrator of San Simon, Morazan, who had been injured in an accident prior to his kidnaping in late April. The guerrillas abandoned him on the bank of the Torola River in Morazan, where soldiers found him on September 26, unconscious and near death.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides for the suspension of civil guarantees in times of emergency. Special legislation (Decree 50) provides for separate procedures and judicial handling of politically-motivated crimes such as treason, sabotage, rebellion, and participation in organized groups dedicated to the overthrow of the Government by force. Holding political views opposed to the Government, without actively supporting political violence against the Government, is not a basis for arrest.

Under present state of emergency legislation, arrests can be made by the Security Forces without a warrant and can be made upon denunciation by an accuser who remains anonymous. The disposition of arrested persons is determined by an instructional magistrate who, like trial magistrates at various levels of the judicial process, may decide on the release or continued detention of a suspect for additional investigation before charges are brought or trial begins. In practice, it is impossible to say how many arrests are not based on reasonable cause, as even dismissal of charges at the investigative level often reflects ineffective investigation or is a matter of convenience in an overburdened judicial system.

Salvadoran arrest procedures require prisoners to be taken directly to the brigade or police headquarters and registered. For the most part, the police and Armed Forces have complied with this regulation. However, there continue to be some charges of prisoners being taken to unofficial interrogation sites before entering a penal institution. Once registered in a detention center, arrestees can be held for eight days before they can be visited by the ICRC, CDH, and Tutela Legal.

Under Decree 50, arrestees must be released or consigned to a military "investigative" judge within 15 days of arrest. Many prisoners are released during this initial phase, after preliminary interrogation and investigation. If consigned to a judge, arrestees must be informed of the charges against them within 15 days of consignment. Once they are so informed they have a right to legal counsel. The investigative judge must reach a decision within 60 days of receiving the case. If the case has merit, he sends it to the military judge of the First Instance (the actual trial judge). Decree 50 requires the First Instance judge to hand down a decision within 43 days of receiving the case. In practice, few cases are handled so quickly; Decree 50 cases usually stay on schedule until they reach the First Instance court, and remain at that stage for an indefinite period.

Processing of Decree 50 cases was halted in May 1985, when guerrillas assassinated the sole First Instance Judge handling those cases. The judge was replaced in July and adjudication of cases resumed. As of the end of September, about 500 persons held under Decree 50 were awaiting trial, about the same number as a year previously. Between January and November of 1985, 30 persons were convicted under Decree 50 and seven were acquitted. Charges were dismissed in 113 other cases.

In cases of common crime, police may detain a suspect up to 72 hours before presenting him to an investigative judge for release or detention for further investigation. In theory, the investigational phase may not last more than 87 days, subject to extension for investigation. In practice, these time limitations are not always followed; the backlog of cases in the system is the major reason for delay.

There are no legal provisions for exile, or for the revocation of citizenship.

The Government prohibits forced labor. However, leftist guerrillas have subjected kidnaped Salvadoran peasants to forced labor. Victims state that they were forced to travel with the guerrillas and cook, do laundry, and perform other chores.

EL SALVADOR

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In El Salvador, common crimes are tried publicly; Decree 50 offenses are adjudicated in the judge's office, without spectators. The inadequacy and inefficiency of the judicial system often cause long delays in bringing cases to trial. Incarcerated persons normally wait 6 to 18 months between the formal placement of charges and the adjudication of their cases. Only 10 to 15 percent of the prison population are actually serving sentences; the others are awaiting trial. When finally tried, most can expect to have the charges dismissed or to be acquitted, often due simply to the poor investigative capacity of the police and magistrates. Over the past 10 years, the overall conviction rate has never exceeded 20 percent; in 1984 it was 15.4 percent.

Aside from a lack of resources for carrying out investigations, the courts are hampered by the susceptibility of judges and juries to intimidation or bribery. A Judicial Protection Unit (JPU) was proposed to provide protection to judges, juries, and officers of the courts in sensitive cases in which intimidation might come into play. The JPU was temporarily activated to provide protection in the 1984 trial of the murderers of four U.S. churchwomen, but the prison guards who composed it returned to their regular duties after the trial. The executive decree to establish the JPU permanently has been approved, and the Government is drafting the implementing regulations.

Recognizing substantial problems within the judicial system, the Government has committed itself to a judicial reform program with four primary components: the JPU, described above; the Judicial Revisory Commission; improved judicial administration and training; and the Commission for Investigation. The Revisory Commission will examine the entire legal system in order to suggest modifications to the penal code to make it fully consistent with the 1983 Constitution, and will also review existing legislation governing arrest and detention procedures. The Commission for Investigation will obtain equipment and train personnel for forensic investigation.

The Salvadoran judiciary is independent from the rest of the Government. Supreme Court magistrates and the Attorney General are chosen by the Legislative Assembly after nomination by political parties. In May, the legislature removed the Attorney General from office. His appeal to the Supreme Court of his removal was decided in his favor in December and he was returned to office.

Judicial authority has historically not been applied to the military. Although lower-ranking military and police personnel are regularly discharged from their duties and arrested for criminal offenses, in practice the officers of the Armed Forces are treated differently from other citizens before the law. Magistrates are usually reluctant to bring charges against military officers or members of the Security Forces. Colleagues of the accused often cannot be relied upon to testify or otherwise cooperate in prosecuting crimes against other officers. Also, intimidation of judges and juries by members of the Armed Forces frequently overcomes prosecution efforts made by the Attorney General's Office.

No military officer has been successfully prosecuted for human rights violations in recent years. An ongoing prosecution, however, is that of Captain Eduardo Avila in connection with the murder of a Salvadoran labor leader and two U.S. advisors in January 1981. The Attorney General plans to present additional evidence implicating Avila before the courts to supplement that which was presented in June 1985. A lower court and an appeals court determined that the initial evidence was insufficient to warrant prosecution of Avila.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not arbitrarily interfere in the personal lives of Salvadoran citizens except in matters it considers related to the armed conflict. Both the Government and the guerrillas use networks of informers. Phone numbers for making accusations to the Armed Forces have been publicized (although little used), and the police rely on informers and anonymous tips about alleged criminal and subversive activities. There is no effort to coerce the public into acting as informants.

Members of the Security Forces use forced entry to carry out arrests and investigations. Government troops have compelled civilians to leave conflictive areas. In April the Army removed over 200 civilian supporters of the guerrillas from around the Guazapa volcano, a guerrilla stronghold.

The constitutional provision protecting the inviolability of correspondence is suspended under the state of emergency. Postal officials have the legal authority to inspect correspondence, but there is no government policy to do so, and it is not believed to occur frequently.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and the press is respected by the Government even though these rights are technically suspended under state of emergency decrees. The only instance during 1985 when the Government formally asked the mass media not to publish information was during the negotiations for the release of the President's daughter, kidnaped by the FMLN. Print and broadcast media did not universally honor the request, but the Government imposed no sanctions against media coverage during the negotiations. Self-censorship, sometimes out of fear of violent reprisal from the extremes of the political spectrum, is the primary constraint on free expression in El Salvador. Newspapers have published "communiqués" from extremist groups out of fear of reprisal.

The leading daily newspapers in the capital are conservative, and frequently and vigorously criticize the Government. The only response from the Government has been to reduce paid advertising by government agencies in one of the papers. The views of the radical left continue to be expressed in paid advertisements, which appear regularly in at least three of the four Salvadoran dailies and in articles published in the University of Central America's bimonthly journal "Estudios Centroamericanos" (ECA) and its biweekly newspaper "Proceso."

Radio news usually covers a wider variety of stories than the printed media and is more broadly diffused in Salvadoran society than either newspapers or television news. FDR leaders are regularly interviewed on local radio news programs and at least one local station offers air time to those FMLN front organizations which are operating openly in San Salvador. Local radio stations frequently repeat information broadcast by clandestine guerrilla radio stations.

The Government owns no newspapers. It owns one radio station and two television stations, one educational and one informational. There are four privately owned television stations.

A six-year old decree forbidding publication of anonymous communiques and statements remains in effect and is largely observed by the media. When it has been violated, the Government has taken no action against the reporting media.

Academic freedom is guaranteed by the Constitution and is broadly interpreted. As in many Latin American countries, university authorities routinely assert that local police have no jurisdiction on campus. The main campus of the National University of El Salvador, closed for four years following violent clashes between students and the army, reopened in early 1984. Though students are not immune from arrest, arrests do not appear to be made on the basis of student status or for violations of limits on freedom of speech and press. Two instructors were shot on two university campuses in October 1985; the killings remain unsolved, but political motives are not evident in either case.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

El Salvador permits any association not formed for criminal purposes. Social, labor, professional, religious, and political associations operate freely, including leftist groups critical of the Government. The groups place paid advertisements in the newspapers and hold marches and demonstrations free of government interference. Even the "Committee of the Political Prisoners of El Salvador" (COPPE), an association of those inmates being held for subversion against the state, is permitted to operate in the prisons of the country and to publish political advertisements. The Information Secretary of the non-governmental Human Rights Commission (CDHES) was arrested in November and charged with membership in a guerrilla organization, the Armed Forces of National Liberation (FARN). The National Police have stated that his employment by CDHES was unrelated to his arrest; Mr. Caceres had worked for CDHES for six years prior to his arrest.

EL SALVADOR

Employees of private businesses or autonomous government institutions have a constitutional right to form professional associations or labor unions to defend employee interests, to bargain collectively, and to strike. Although employees of non-autonomous public institutions are barred by law from joining unions, these employees in fact have legally recognized associations which act as unions, bargain collectively, and strike. The Government is studying a proposal which would extend collective bargaining rights to peasant labor associations. Salvadoran labor groups draw up their own statutes and elect their own officers. Government recognition of these groups is not based on political considerations. There is no government-sponsored labor group. Unions are independent of political parties, though some unions have worked on behalf of parties in political campaigns.

Unions may join national and international federations. The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the World Confederation of Labor (WCL) have Salvadoran affiliates. Some Salvadoran unions have loose links with the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). The Government and unions maintain ties with the International Labor Organization (ILO).

The Labor Ministry routinely mediates labor disputes at the request of the interested parties. In 1985 there were three instances in which labor and management voluntarily submitted to binding arbitration by the Labor Ministry. Groups across the political spectrum demonstrate openly and freely. In spite of an Armed Forces ban on a June 4 labor demonstration for which its organizers had not obtained a permit, the demonstration took place without incident.

Only one complaint has been made to the ILO since President Duarte's June 1984 inauguration, arising from the illegal occupation by strikers of the central Social Security Institute (ISSS) Hospital in May 1985. During the occupation, many non-striking Salvadoran workers were unable to obtain the social security medical treatment to which they were entitled. Also, the number of hospital patients who died during the strike was greater than normal though the number of patients being treated was smaller than usual. The strike's leaders made no attempt to disavow support they received from guerrilla radio stations, nor to separate themselves from death threats made against the ISSS Director General.

On May 27, a labor judge ruled the ISSS strike illegal because procedures prescribed by the labor code had not been followed by the union prior to calling the strike. The strikers ignored the judge's order to return to work. On June 2, police entered the hospital, arrested two union leaders for directing the illegal occupation of a public building, and then withdrew from the hospital. The police mistakenly shot and killed four policemen during the operation, but there were no deaths or injuries of hospital workers or patients because of the security forces' actions. The two arrested labor leaders were released June 5; they publicly stated they had been treated well while in police custody. Labor and management finally reached agreement and the strike ended June 6.

EL SALVADOR

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the Constitution and is respected in practice. Although the country is historically Roman Catholic, numerous Protestant denominations have gained adherents, often through the efforts of foreign missionaries. These missionaries and members of the non-Catholic denominations operate freely and without harassment. Although church members and workers (of both Catholic and Protestant denominations) have on occasion been arrested, these arrests were unrelated to the individual's religious beliefs or activities.

The Catholic Church continues to be one of the most respected and influential institutions in the country. The Sunday homily from the National Cathedral is broadcast live on the Government's television and radio stations and is a regular news item in the press and radio the following day. Clergy and church publications speak forcefully on human rights and on the need for an end to the war. Church statements have become increasingly critical of the leftist insurgency, but the Church has not hesitated to criticize the Government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Although the state of emergency decree formally suspends the constitutional right to free movement, this suspension is not enforced in practice. Local military commanders have on occasion denied entry for short periods of time from areas where military operations were underway. The continuing armed conflict has displaced an estimated 525,000 persons within El Salvador, primarily from the northern and eastern departments. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees lists another 35,654 Salvadorans as refugees outside El Salvador in Central America, with 20,000 in Honduras. An estimated 200,000 may be living in Mexico, and as many as 750,000 undocumented Salvadorans are in the United States. The Government, international organizations, and private voluntary organizations assist the internally displaced. The Government has imposed no control on emigration and has assisted amnesty beneficiaries who wish to emigrate after release. It also assists displaced persons and others wishing to return to El Salvador to reintegrate into society.

Movement in the eastern part of the country has been limited by traffic stoppages declared by the guerrillas and enforced with roadblocks, land mines, and the machinegunning and burning of vehicles traveling during the stoppages. The guerrillas declared nine such stoppages in the course of the year.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

El Salvador moved further in its transition to an open, democratic system in 1985 as it held its fourth national election in three years. The president is directly elected and serves for a period of five years. He cannot constitutionally succeed himself. The next presidential elections will take place in 1989. The legislature is unicameral and is made of 60 deputies who serve for three year terms. Like the president, they are directly elected.

Nine political parties, ranging from the moderate left to the conservative right, participated in the March 31, 1985 legislative and municipal council elections. Five political parties gained representation in the legislature. The Christian Democratic Party (PDC) of President Jose Napoleon Duarte won 52 percent of the vote and captured 33 of the 60 seats in the Legislative Assembly. The National Republican Alliance (ARENA) and the National Conciliation Party (PCN) captured 30 percent and 8 percent of the vote, respectively, and earned 13 seats and 12 seats in the assembly, divided according to a coalition agreement between them. The remaining two seats in the assembly were won by two smaller parties. The PDC won in 153 of the 262 municipalities; the ARENA-PCN coalition in all but one of the others. Mayors and municipal councils were also elected directly in the March elections for the first time since 1977.

Though the PDC has a plurality in the Legislative Assembly, debate in the Assembly is vigorous. The Assembly has altered bills submitted by the President before passing them, and the President has vetoed bills passed with the support of his party's deputies.

The Constitution requires the legal recognition of all political parties that do not advocate armed opposition, provided they are able to meet the required minimum membership standards of 3,000 followers. Several small political parties, while not represented in the legislature or municipal councils, do have legal status and freely organize and publish their views. The right to membership in any legally recognized political party is unrestricted. Two opposition parties of the left, the National Revolutionary Movement (MNR) led by Guillermo Ungo and the communist National Democratic Union (UDN), are legally recognized but have chosen not to participate in legitimate political activity. The MNR and UDN, together with the Popular Social Christian Movement (MPSC), make up the Democratic Revolutionary Front (FDR), the political front which, in alliance with the FMLN, is waging the insurgency. The Government and the majority of the constitutional opposition have expressed support for the integration of the armed leftist groups into the system as peaceful, legal political parties.

As in previous years, the guerrillas sought to disrupt the vote during the elections held in 1985. In the weeks prior to the elections, the guerrillas burned more than 25 municipal buildings. They proclaimed a national traffic stoppage three days before the elections in an attempt to prevent citizens from traveling to vote. On election eve, they mined several rural roads in Chalatenango Department, killing or injuring several civilians on their way to the polls. In spite of these efforts, approximately 1.2 million voters went to the polls, representing more than 65 percent of the electorate. Elections were carried out on site in all but 20 of the 262 municipalities in El Salvador. Elections in those 20 municipalities, representing less than six percent of the electorate, were held in neighboring towns. In El Salvador voting is no longer obligatory.

The Government invited representatives of more than 50 nations and international organizations to observe the March 31 elections. Almost universally, the 130 international observers declared the elections to be open, honest, and a valid demonstration of the popular will. A pastoral letter issued by the Salvadoran bishops on August 8 described the Government as "a constitutional government, the fruit of a democratic process, sanctioned by the massive turnout at the polls in four successive elections."

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights:

The Government maintains an open door policy toward human rights delegations. Key members of the Government, including high-ranking members of the military, have demonstrated their willingness to brief human rights groups and to be interviewed by them. Among those groups which have sent delegations to El Salvador are: Americas Watch, the Faculty for Human Rights in El Salvador - Central America (FHRES), the Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, U.S. congressional delegations, and various church and labor groups. Physicians from "Medical Aid for El Salvador" were given access to guerrilla leader Maria Valladares de Lemus (Nidia Diaz), to evaluate her condition and performed an operation on her injured arm. In March, Americas Watch assigned a representative to El Salvador who does not permanently reside in the country but does make extended visits. The Government has welcomed the frequent visits of the representatives of the ICRC and human rights groups to prisoners at brigade headquarters and penal institutions.

The U.N. General Assembly's Special Rapporteur on Human Rights in El Salvador made his fifth annual visit to the country in September and received from each ministry and autonomous agency of the Government a report on human rights within its area of responsibility. During his visit, the rapporteur interviewed government officials, visited prisoners held by the Government on charges of subversion, and spoke with representatives of official and nonofficial human rights organizations. In his report to the U.N. General Assembly on November 5, 1985, the rapporteur noted that, "As in previous years the cooperation...by the Government of El Salvador was and full and open."

There are several domestic human rights organizations which are active in El Salvador. The official Human Rights Commission (CDH) is an autonomous government agency which investigates complaints of human rights abuse. Tutela Legal is the legal assistance office of the Archdiocese. Other organizations which report on violence include Christian Legal Aid (Socorro Juridico Cristiano), and the non-official Human Rights Commission of El Salvador (CDHES).

EL SALVADOR

The CDH receives complaints of human rights violations by both the government forces and the FMLN. CDH representatives visit jails and prisons to look for persons reported missing, and its staff physicians examine arrestees to determine the validity of complaints of human rights abuse. To make itself more accessible to the public, the CDH has opened field offices in the departmental capitals of San Vicente, Santa Ana, and San Miguel. The CDH has been successful in representing individual interests before military and civilian governmental institutions.

Tutela Legal's small staff carries out some on-site investigations, takes testimony from individuals, and uses the press as a major source. The other organizations rely primarily on newspaper reporting, supplemented by other sources such as announcements by guerrilla groups and personal testimony. Socorro Juridico refuses to name its sources. CDHES and some other groups consistently and vocally criticize the Government and echo allegations of human rights violations broadcast on guerrilla radio. They have also justified the kidnaping of mayors as legitimate military targets and have repeated false guerrilla claims that some of the victims of the PRTC murder of 13 people in June were killed in a "cross-fire." However, no member of such groups has been harmed. One was briefly taken into custody on charges unrelated to her activity in these groups. The Government has arrested and charged two other members of these organizations with membership in and active support for guerrilla groups. Their cases are before the Decree 50 courts.

Amnesty International Report 1985, which covers events during 1984, expressed continued concern about arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention without trial, torture, disappearances, and extrajudicial executions. Freedom House rates El Salvador "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

El Salvador had an estimated population of 5 million in mid-1985 with a growth rate of 2.5 percent annually, excluding emigration. The estimated per capita GDP for 1985 is about $650. The GDP grew by 1.5 percent in real terms in 1984, following a cumulative decline of 25 percent between 1979 and 1983. Adjusted for population growth, the decline probably has not yet been arrested. In 1984, agriculture accounted for about 25 percent and industry for 17 percent of GDP. Coffee, cotton, sugar, and shrimp comprise the bulk of El Salvador's exports.

Adding to the adverse economic effects of six years of internal violence, El Salvador's economy has suffered from the world recession, declining prices for the country's main exports, and sharply reduced demand from its trading partners in the Central American Common Market (CACM). The violence prompted large-scale capital flight, precipitous reduction in private investment, and increased unemployment. Although this decline appears to have been largely halted, investment has been slow to resume and the economy remains troubled by a large balance-of-payments deficit, external debt, rising inflation, and an unbalanced budget.

A dramatic shift in the ownership of nearly 25 percent of El Salvador's agricultural land brought about under the agrarian reform program has affected El Salvador's social structure. The sweeping social and economic reform is designed in part to transfer ownership of farmlands from the small number of large landholders to those who worked the land.

EL SALVADOR

Under Phase I of the program, all farms of more than 500 hectares (1,235 acres) were converted into worker cooperatives. Of the 317 cooperatives formed, 37 are in conflictive zones and not operating. The rest are generally able to support their members, but the majority are unable to make payments on their land debt or 1980-1981 emergency credit debts.

The 1983 Constitution clarified Phase II of the reform by establishing a ceiling of 245 hectares (605 acres) that an individual may own and by giving affected owners three years to sell property in excess of that limit to peasants, small farmers, or peasant organizations. The state can expropriate any excess land not disposed of by December 1986. Twelve to 15,000 hectares of land are affected by Phase II and the Ministry of Agriculture is beginning to develop necessary implementing legislation.

Under Phase III of the reform, farms previously rented or sharecropped could be claimed in parcels of up to seven hectares (17.3 acres) by the former renters or sharecroppers, including family members. Under Phase III more than 300,000 Salvadorans have been moving towards ownership of the land they work. Many landowners affected by Phase III resisted strongly, some with violence, and forced eviction of beneficiaries. Many others filed legal protests with the Government; and at one point in 1984 about 20 percent of the legal challenges to Phase III claims were being decided in favor of the original landowner on the basis that the applicant for the land did not qualify under Phase III rules. Currently, there is less legal activity, and peasant organizations report that forced eviction is no longer a significant problem.

In 1984 the infant mortality rate was 67 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy was 64.5 years. The per capita caloric intake was 92 percent of nutritional requirements. The Government conducted a vaccination campaign in early 1985 to immunize young children against polio and other diseases, and followed it with an oral rehydration therapy education campaign to reduce the number of deaths from diarrhea. Most of the rural population does not have regular access to medical care.

Historically, El Salvador has had a shortage of low income housing because of heavy rural to urban migration, exacerbated in recent years by persons displaced from conflictive areas. The Government has initiated a major program to extend public services into squatter communities surrounding the major urban centers, install drainage works, sidewalks, and paving, and provide self-help housing.

Approximately 62 percent of El Salvador's adult population is literate. Some 15 percent of the primary school age population are not attending school. Since 1978, the country's internal conflict has contributed to the abandonment of over 800 primary schools and the closing of 2,140 more. In April 1985 the Government initiated a $150 million, three-year program to renovate primary school classrooms and purchase textbooks and other school supplies.

EL SALVADOR

The Constitution permits employment of children less than 14 years old only in those cases where their employment is necessary to provide for their subsistence or the subsistence of their families. Children less than 18 years old are prohibited from legally working at night or in dangerous occupations. The reality, however, is that teenage and even younger children work long hours.

The minimum wage for workers in the industrial and service sectors is about US$3.10 per day. In practice, the salaries of most workers in these sectors is above the minimum wage. These workers are paid overtime for working more than 44 hours in a week and are entitled to 15 days of annual paid vacation. The minimum wage for farm workers is about US$1.08 plus about US$.31 worth of food per day. Farm workers are paid more during harvest times. The national commission on minimum salaries has proposed an increase for farm workers over 16 years old and an additional increase for those partially incapacitated or under 16. The proposal has not been acted on. The piece rates paid at harvest times net workers triple or quadruple the minimum wage.

The Government requires that work sites be safe, and that drinking water, toilets, and adequate ventilation be provided workers. Major industrial enterprises generally meet these requirements. Between June 1984 and May 1985, the labor ministry made 467 inspections and studies of working conditions, initiated four campaigns aimed at preventing work related accidents, held four seminars on occupational safety and hygiene, and investigated 319 work-related accidents. The Labor Ministry carries out inspections either at its own initiative or on the basis of a complaint. However, the Labor Ministry complains that budgetary restrictions and guerrilla activities, such as the destruction of Labor Ministry vehicles, impede full enforcement of worker laws.

Under the Constitution women enjoy the same legal rights as men. Three women serve as deputies in the 60-member assembly, and about ten percent of the mayors elected in March 1985 are women. Women hold positions as vice ministers of culture, economics, education, interior, foreign commerce, and justice. Most elementary school teachers, nurses, and secretaries are women, as well as about 50 percent of the teachers on the high school level and between 30 to 40 percent of university professors. Women also play a role in private industry, especially as owners of small enterprises. Several major companies are owned and operated by women. Women serve on the boards of directors of several banks. Women are also well represented in the professions: about 30 percent of the physicians, 50 percent of the dentists and more than 30 percent of the attorneys are women. They are members of the Armed Forces as nurses, in administrative areas, and in intelligence. The National Police is training women as detectives and has a corps of policewomen.

A high proportion of women in the lower economic strata are heads of single parent households, often providing for large families. Seventy percent of the children in El Salvador are born out of wedlock, and most of these are not legally recognized by their fathers even when occupying the same domicile.

GRENADA

Grenada is once again governed under the parliamentary system it had on acquiring independence from the United Kingdom in 1974. Free and fair democratic elections were held in December 1984, a little over a year after the October 1983 landing of United States and Eastern Caribbean countries put an end to the chaotic conditions which followed the murder of Prime Minister Maurice Bishop by his former associates. In the elections, contested by three parties, the New National Party (NNP) led by Herbert Blaize won 14 of 15 seats in Parliament, and Blaize was elected Prime Minister.

Among its first acts in January 1985, Parliament restored the 1974 Independence Constitution and legitimized the court system inherited from its predecessors who had ruled by decree. Political and civil rights are fully guaranteed by the Government. The spectrum of political parties is composed of the moderate NNP and Grenada Democratic Labour Party (GDLP) (which was formed in February 1985 following the election), the Marxist Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement (MBPM) (organized by the pro-Bishop survivors of the October 19, 1983 anti-Bishop coup), and the Grenada United Labour Party (GULP) of Former Prime Minister Gairy.

During 1985, security in Grenada was partially maintained by the Caribbean Peacekeeping Force (CPF) composed of military and police contingents from neighboring countries, with United States military support. The last U.S. forces left the island on June 11, 1985, and the remnants of the CPF departed in September. Internal security in Grenada is now the sole responsibility of the Royal Grenada Police Force (RGPF) which includes an 80-man paramilitary Special Services Unit, which received training from U.S. military advisors until September, 1985.

The Grenadian economy is gradually recovering from years of mismanagement, political turmoil, and an inadequate, dilapidated infrastructure. The Government has introduced reforms to promote development and encourage investment.

In 1985, the NNP governed with full respect for the law and in accordance with international standards of human rights, including protection of the integrity of the person. Judicial proceedings follow accepted standards of due process, and those accused of murdering former Prime Minister Bishop and others were accorded the full scope of judicial protections.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Several of those being held and tried for the murders of Maurice Bishop and others have complained of torture and cruel treatment while imprisoned. When prisoners made allegations of torture, physicians were called in and on no occasion were these allegations substantiated.

During the initial sessions of the trial in 1985, defense attorneys repeated claims of torture and maltreatment of the 19 accused, which they alleged were committed with the consent and complicity of the Commissioner of Prisons. Although there were instances of abusive treatment by individual guards, no evidence has ever been provided to substantiate claims of systematic abuse or official complicity.

Observers from an impartial international organization investigating prison conditions in August 1985 found, after talking with the 19 accused, 3 instances of legitimate complaint: 3 of them claimed to need medical attention; 2 said they were denied the right to correspond with their minor children; and the 1 woman among the 19 was allowed virtually no contact with the other prisoners, including her husband. Government authorities state that the accused have had access to physicians but that the prisoners have insisted on seeing those of their own choice. (Eventually this was allowed.) Correspondence was also permitted, the authorities asserted, as was contact with visitors by the woman prisoner.

Later in August, the defense filed a motion in the trial claiming the accused were denied proper access to their attorneys, and they renewed the allegations of torture and arbitrary denial of privileges. An affidavit included allegations of beatings, public humiliation, mental torture, intense interrogation, and the denial of medical treatment, especially during the period of confinement while being supervised by U.S. and Caribbean forces between October 1983 and early 1984. This motion has not yet been heard in court.

On August 23, 1985, the prosecution and defense agreed on a consent order, issued by the Chief Justice, which ordered the Prison Commissioner to assure the accused liberal access to their lawyers and to writing materials, freedom to correspond with persons outside the prison, 10-1/2 hours of freedom to exercise per day, and freedom on a daily basis to associate among themselves. After some controversy on whether the writ was fully implemented, the defense stated in court in October that it was fully satisfied that the prison authorities were implementing the consent order.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were no reports of arbitrary arrests in Grenada in 1985. Grenadian police, by law, have the right to arrest individuals "on suspicion" without a warrant, but arrests must be accompanied by formal charges. In 1985, no one was detained for political reasons.

Those arrested are brought before an independent judiciary. They are allowed access to a lawyer of their choice and, for capital crimes, the courts appoint lawyers when the accused cannot pay for their defense. The 19 accused of murdering

Maurice Bishop and others are defended by 12 Jamaican lawyers of their choosing, all but 2 of whom are remunerated by the Grenadian Government.

There is a functioning system of bail, although those charged with any capital offense are not eligible. Grenadian law provides for writs of habeas corpus. Following a determination by a judicial hearing that there is sufficient evidence to substantiate a criminal charge, there is a 15-day period during which the defense may apply for judicial determination of the legality of a person's imprisonment, and a 2-month period during which a person in detention must be charged or released. These time limits were respected during 1985. People who have been charged can be held on remand for only a specified time while awaiting trial. This time limit is not always strictly adhered to because there are too few judges and other officials in the judiciary to process the caseload expeditiously.

No Grenadian citizen was exiled in 1985, although some members of the Peoples Revolutionary Government (PRG) have remained outside the country voluntarily.

There was no forced labor in Grenada in 1985.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Grenadians have the right to fair public trials, under law and in practice. The Bishop murder trial has been subject to a series of delays, in large part caused by the defense exercising its rights to file appeals and motions. One such motion, claiming the 19 cannot receive a fair trial in Grenada because of pretrial publicity, was filed in September 1985 and has not yet been heard.

Chester Humphrey was charged in the United States for smuggling weapons to Grenada in the late seventies. He fled the United States to return to Grenada where he was heralded a leading member of the New Jewel Movement (NJM). Following the 1983 rescue mission, Humphrey was detained in Grenada while the Grenadian courts reviewed a request for extradition to the United States. Although Humphrey claimed he was physically abused, these allegations were never substantiated. Humphrey went on several hunger strikes but received medical attention whenever required. In January 1986, the Grenada Court of Appeals, after a thorough review of the case, determined that Humphrey could not be extradited for the charges contained in the U.S. extradition request. Humphrey was released.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is no arbitrary interference by the State or any political organization in the private life of individuals. There is no forced membership in any organization and no arbitrary monitoring of telephones or correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Grenadians are free to say and publish what they want, and they did so in 1985. There are five weekly newspapers, two of which are independent. Three are affiliated with political parties. In addition, a local journalist publishes a newsletter irregularly, and the remnants of the Revolutionary Military Council on occasion distribute a flier, "The Revolution." Newspapers freely criticize the Government. There have been no suits for libel or slander.

There is one radio station in Grenada, the government-run "Radio Grenada AM." A second station, "Radio La Baye FM," operated for one week in 1985 before being closed by the Government for not having a license to broadcast. The owner claimed he did have a license, but he possessed only a letter from the Prime Minister's office encouraging him to apply for one. The owner was arrested and charged with operating without a license and also with importing broadcasting equipment on a false customs declaration. The case has not yet been heard.

There is a nascent television broadcasting system on Grenada, organized by a U.S.-based private foundation. The television capability was developed with the cooperation of the Grenada Government. The future of the television facility is under discussion between the foundation and the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Grenadians enjoy the right to assemble for any purpose, including the public protest of policies or actions of the Government. Supporters of political parties, including those which were in power prior to October 1983, meet frequently and hold public rallies. There are no controls on private or public associations, and permits are not required for public meetings. On one occasion the Government did attempt to prohibit the MBPM from using a public park for a rally, but it took place anyway, with no arrests or repercussions against the organizers.

Workers are free to organize independent labor unions and to participate in collective bargaining. Unions play a significant role in the Grenadian political process, with approximately 25 percent of the total work force belonging to unions. They can and do strike the public sector legally if they give advance notification. In 1985, all unions were free of government control, and none was given government support. Individual unionists are active in politics but must separate their private political involvement from their union activities. The Grenada Trades Union Council (TUC) participates in the conferences of the International Labor Organization (ILO) and is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) via the Caribbean Congress of Labour (CCL). Some CCL leaders boycotted the organization's 25th anniversary meeting in Grenada because they felt some of the leaders of the Grenada TUC were too close to the nondemocratic left wing.

c. Freedom of Religion

The predominant faiths are Roman Catholic and Anglican there are many Presbyterians and Methodists as well as Evangelical church members. There is complete religious freedom, which extends to non-Christians such as Rastafarians, who were harassed under the previous regime. Clergy, including missionaries, travel and preach freely. There do not appear to be advantages or disadvantages conferred by adherence to a particular faith, although Christian prayers and hymns are part of many governmental and political meetings.

GRENADA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement within Grenada, and the right to enter and leave is guaranteed to all Grenadian citizens. Emigration was not restricted in 1985, and all Grenadian citizens who left the islands were able freely to return.

There were no "repatriates" forcibly returned to Grenada in 1985, nor any official cases of refugees who have come to Grenada. (There is a Ba'hai community that has included Iranians who left their homeland to escape persecution). The Government has allowed students and others to return from Cuba and other Communist countries.

In one case the Government denied a citizen the right to a specific trip abroad. An organizer for the MBPM had his passport seized, an action which was upheld by the Chief Justice on the strength of government evidence that the subject would engage in activities harmful to the State if allowed to travel abroad. The decision has been appealed.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution guarantees free and fair elections at least every 5 years. The majority party in Grenada's Parliament is the New National Party (NNP) under the leadership of Prime Minister Herbert Blaize. Formed by the union of three parties in August 1984, the NNP represents a cross-section of Grenada's population. It was voted into office in December 1984 in elections in which 85 percent of eligible voters participated. The election, according to international observers, was free and fair and without violence. The NNP won 14 of the 15 Parliamentary seats, and the Grenada United Labour Party won one seat (its holder left the GULP to form his own party, the Grenada Democratic Labour Party, in February 1985). The Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement obtained only about 4 percent of the vote.

The political system is not dominated by any particular ethnic group, nor are there any restrictions which limit participation of any elements of the Grenadian population.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The present Government has welcomed visits of several human rights organizations, as did the Interim Council which preceded it. In February 1985 a representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross spent 7 days in Grenada, following up on a visit of July 1984. He inspected prison conditions, interviewed the Commissioner of Prisons, spoke with the 19 individuals indicted in the Bishop murder trial, and met with Government officials. A representative of Amnesty International also visited the island to observe judicial procedures and examine prison conditions.

There are no active internal human rights organizations in Grenada.

GRENADA

Amnesty International in its 1985 report (which covers events in 1984) expressed concern about the detention without charge of members of the People's Revolutionary Government, as well as allegations of mistreatment of those accused of the murder of Prime Minister Bishop and his followers. Freedom House rated Grenada as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The World Bank estimates Grenada's 1985 population at 93,000 with a growth rate of 0.8 percent. The estimated per capita income is $930 per year.

Grenada's economy has been improving slowly since its negative performance in 1983. The Interim Council and the Government of Prime Minister Blaize have embarked on a series of reforms to reduce unemployment by freeing the economy from those government controls which hinder development and by encouraging legitimate local and foreign investors. To date, the investment code has been revised, an industrial development corporation established, exchange controls reduced, many price controls lifted, and some state enterprises privatized. This process is continuing as the Government prepares to review proposals for the privatization of further state enterprises and to consider various tax reform options. Most foreign assistance is targeted at the improvement of Grenada's economic infrastructure and the diversification of agriculture. There are no reliable estimates, but unemployment is about 27 percent, with most unemployed in the 16 to 25-year-old age group.

The World Bank estimated infant mortality at 21.2 per 1,000 live births and the crude birth rate at 31.4 per 1,000. The Government estimates illegitimacy to be 80 percent of all births. Life expectancy is 70.8 years. Voluntary outward migration is the major factor that keeps Grenada's population at a relatively stable level. On the basis of these statistics, it is estimated that at least 32,000 people have emigrated from Grenada between 1970 and 1983, with emigration accelerating greatly during the PRG years. The estimated gross national product for 1984 was $86.26 million. Income distribution is more even than in most developing countries, although a small group of traders in St. George's, the capital, have incomes well above those in other sectors of the society.

A basic level of health care is available to all Grenadians, and the standard of care has been raised considerably with assistance from abroad. However, according to Project Hope officials who work with the Ministry of Health, a significant health care problem is the lack of trained Grenadian personnel willing to stay and work in Grenada. Medical care facilities, including a general hospital, six health centers, and several "visiting stations," are found throughout the islands. They are not always in good repair, and medical equipment is frequently old or unusable. Methods of recording births, deaths, and diseases are not standardized, making it difficult to rely on local statistics to estimate the extent to which the population's health needs are met.

Adult literacy, according to the World Bank, was 97.8 percent in 1979 although that figure appears high. Functional illiteracy is high among youths and was unofficially estimated at 30 percent in 1980. There is compulsory education for all children between the ages of 5 and 16, but daily attendance varies greatly and is not enforced. All the urban population and 77 percent of the rural population had access to safe water in 1975. This may have declined slightly by 1985 due to chronic problems of water distribution in the urban area around the capital. The ratio of calorie supply available for consumption was almost 90 percent (1977) of nutritional requirements. Although it is estimated that malnutrition is not a significant problem in Grenada, due in part to the fertility of the land and availability of fruits, vegetables, and fish to even the poorest, there are high levels of gastroenteritis.

The employment of persons under 16 of age in industry is prohibited by statute, although industry is a very small sector of the economy. Minors do work in family-run shops and farms, a much larger sector. There is no regulation of work hours or minimum wage law although the Government has acted as a model in setting wage rate standards. There are no laws dealing with occupational safety, but common law does allow employers to be sued for negligence.

While there is no formal government-sanctioned discrimination against women in Grenada, they frequently are paid less than men performing the same work. "Skilled" jobs for women such as spice processing also tend to be the lowest paid jobs. In more highly paid work, women tend to be equally paid, although there are fewer women in such positions. Two of the 14 members of Parliament and 4 of the 7 top-level civil servants, permanent secretaries, are women.

GUATEMALA

In 1985 Guatemala made an orderly and open transition from a military regime to civilian rule through elections for the presidency, congress, and municipal governments. The general elections provided a broad array of political options, including the formerly persecuted Social Democrats, who returned from voluntary exile to participate in the 1985 elections. Sixty-nine percent of the eligible voters cast ballots in the November 3 elections, choosing 2 presidential run-off candidates, congressional deputies, and mayors. Sixty-one percent cast ballots in the December 8 presidential run-off election. International observers characterized the elections as efficiently run and free of fraud. The military maintained strict neutrality throughout the campaigning and voting; military, police, and military commissioners were prohibited from voting. Though insurgent groups carried out an active propaganda campaign against the elections, there were no reported insurgent attempts to disrupt the voting. Vinicio Cerezo, the Christian Democratic presidential candidate, was elected to a 5-year term in the December 8 Presidential run-off elections.

Guatemala is primarily an agricultural country, with a dual culture in which the indigenous population continues to preserve its cultural traditions. The economy experienced a deep recession in 1985, exacerbating tensions and curbing the Government's ability to respond to recognized social needs.

The Special Rapporteur for Guatemala of the United Nations Human Rights Commissioner (UNHCR) noted improvement in overall human rights conditions during 2 visits to Guatemala in 1985, citing the movement towards democratization and elections. Politically-related deaths continued to decline and kidnappings and disappearances also decreased. While politically motivated abductions continue, they are now at the lowest level in this decade. Amnesty for insurgents remained available. Government and military sensitivity to human rights questions grew modestly. Some 245 policemen were dismissed for crimes or corruption, and 4 members of a civil defense patrol were sentenced to prison for murdering a villager. Although sporadic abuses still occurred at the local command level, the military displayed an increasing awareness of the importance of human rights. The successful elections, and the road building and model village programs have taken much of the initiative away from the guerrilla organizations. Insurgents still engaged in military actions during 1985, but the number of such incidents decreased, and the number of reported combat deaths was approximately 60 percent of 1984 levels.

A local human rights group, the Mutual Support Group (GAM), continued to function openly. However, one of its members was found tortured and murdered, and another member, along with her son and brother, died under suspicious circumstances. The Government accepted visits by foreign human rights groups and, in fact, extended invitations to several of them. Press freedom was evident; labor union activities continued relatively unimpeded. The rights to private property and to pursue private interests remained untrammelled. Among the negative aspects of the year's developments were the continuation, although at a significantly reduced rate, of killings, disappearances and other abuses by both guerrilla and security forces. The officer corps is still immune from prosecution, and the justice system is unable to respond to human rights violations by government officials.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were an estimated 304 civilian non-combatant deaths in Guatemala in 1985, a significant decline from the 491 killings the previous year. Some of the dead were believed to be victims of the Guatemalan security forces or civil defense patrols, while others were killed by insurgents. In all, approximately 597 persons are believed to have been killed either for political reasons or in combat in 1985 compared to an estimated 992 in 1984.

While there were fewer reports of politically motivated violence in the countryside, there were still allegations of abuses against the Indian population. Most of the alleged incidents reported in 1985 involved persons in the western highlands, where clashes between insurgents and the army are still frequent and often fierce. However, there were no credible reports of massacres during the year. A report that 125 Indians had been massacred in April at Santa Anita las Canoas, department of Chimaltenango was proved false by an onsite inquiry made by U. S. Embassy officials.

At least 50 policemen and 7 military commissioners were killed in 1985. Insurgents tortured and executed an army corporal and an army specialist in the department of Suchitepequez. They also assassinated the chief of the military police intelligence service in August. Insurgents continued their campaign against members of the civil defense forces, killing 33 in 1985.

Victims of violence by the 4 Marxist-led guerrilla organizations in their program of physical intimidation in 1985 included municipal workers, farm owners and managers, and other civilians. Guerrillas in the departments of San Marcos, Retaleheu, Quetzaltenango, Escuintla, Chimaltenango, and Santa Rosa executed 11 farm owners. Four small businessmen were blown up in 2 hand grenade attacks by guerrillas in the department of El Peten, and 2 farm managers were killed near Lake Atitlan. During a May attack on the Santa Ana Berlin military detachment in Coatepeque guerrillas killed 3 civilians, including a woman and a child. In July, near Chico Zapote, guerrillas shot to death 4 civilians, including 2 minors, whom they apparently mistook for army guides. In their most spectacular act of violence, guerrillas blew up an airplane carrying the Norwegian honorary consul, his son-in-law, and 2 others, on October 23, as it landed at a small airstrip; all were killed.

The response of Guatemalan security forces to insurgent violence has on occasion been excessively violent. For instance, following the killings of 2 military commissioners and several civil defense patrol members in Patzun the local military commander carried out a series of abductions and assassinations. By the time reprisal and counter-reprisal had finished, 22 people were reported dead by the local press. Town records, however, show 10 people dead and 42 kidnapped; of these 42, at least 10 have reappeared.

Killings have also been attributed to some of the 900,000 members of the civil defense patrols, sometimes in clashes between neighboring patrols or between civil defense members and civilians over land disputes, and sometimes in personal vendettas. There continued to be allegations that civil defense patrol members summarily executed some guerrillas or suspected guerrillas.

The Government has not generally punished members of the security forces for such extra-judicial killings, although some offenders have been dismissed or jailed. In August a police spokesman said that 245 policemen were dismissed during the previous month for "illegal activities", and, in October, 4 members of a civil defense patrol were given 20-year prison terms for murdering a villager. The Guatemalan army continued its unwillingness to punish offenders. After a series of killings and disappearances in Patzun were linked to the local military commander, the army transferred the officer to another post, but it brought no charges against him.

It is difficult to assign responsibility or motive to many of the killings in Guatemala. The guerrillas on occasion use the same weapons, tactics, and uniforms as the army in an effort to place blame on the government forces. Security forces have been charged with using the same tactic. Bodies normally appear without any group taking responsibility for the killings, and even without any evidence that the killings were politically motivated. Such cases, in which there is much speculation and few facts, comprise the bulk of the killings in Guatemala.

Examples of the kind of violence endemic in Guatemala include the March murders of two professors from the National University of San Carlos; the March murder of Manuel Francisco Sosa Avila, a retired general and former Director of the National Police and Minister of Government; the June murder of a university board member and professor; and the August killing of Roberto Castaneda Felice, a prominent businessman and private sector leader. Although any of these deaths might have been politically motivated, there is no evidence which definitively links the deaths to the victim's political or professional activities, and no group has taken responsibility for any of these killings.

The number of kidnappings and disappearances fell in 1985 to the lowest level in the 1980's. An estimated 198 people were abducted in 1985, compared with 425 in 1984 and 307 in 1983.

As in the past, the government security forces were accused of abducting people in order to question them about subversive activities. For instance, the local leaders of the Christian Democratic party in Chichicastenango charged security forces with kidnapping a party member in May, and in July an agricultural workers' union in the same town accused the civil defense force of abducting a union member. Security forces have also been linked to the May disappearance of three Rafael Landivar University extension workers. The security forces generally deny knowledge of the whereabouts of disappeared persons in response to inquiries.

The insurgent groups used kidnaping to commandeer labor and to punish government collaborators. In March guerrillas in the department of Chimaltenango kidnaped a civil defense patrol member, a catechist, and a farm owner. Insurgents operating in the department of El Quiche kidnaped a supervisor of the National Institute for Electrification at the Chixoy Hydroelectric Project site. Guerrillas also kidnaped whole villages in order to use the villagers as "masas," or providers of food and labor. Occasionally, the army announces the freeing of such groups. In June the army declared that it had rescued 105 residents of the village of El Tumbo, department of El Peten, who, according to the army, were being abducted to Mexico by insurgents.

Students and faculty at the National University of San Carlos continued to be kidnaped in 1985, and some of these cases were attributed to government security forces acting against suspected insurgents or their supporters. In March 2 members of student associations at the university were reported kidnaped, and in July a student social promoter was abducted in Quetzaltenango. Violence affecting university students and faculty is neither unusual nor easily attributable to specific perpetrators or motives. San Carlos has an enrollment of over 50,000 students, many of whom attend on a casual basis for many years. Thus, a victim's association with the university may be only coincidental. The university also is a center of narcotics trafficking and drug-related crime is common.

The Mutual Support Group (GAM), formed in 1984 and comprised largely of families of missing students, named 3 relatives as victims of disappearances in the first 6 months of 1985. This compares to 40 reported disappearances in 1984.

As with killings, it is difficult to assign responsibility or motive for most disappearances and kidnapings. Besides political reasons, kidnapings have also been carried out for criminal purposes (ransom gangs and narcotics traffickers) and for personal vengeance. Among the factors limiting the ability to link a disappearance to a definite faction or group are the inaccuracy of media reporting, the unwillingness of relatives and friends in some cases to reveal the occurrence (especially if a large ransom was paid), and the difficulty of separating political from other motives.

Some disappearances were found to have other explanations. For instance, in August the National Police announced that among the missing person cases they had solved, one "victim" had been working as a maid in Guatemala City, another had joined the army, and a third had run away with her boyfriend. In July a librarian at the University of San Carlos in Quetzaltenango was reported missing. Later, she was discovered at the home of some relatives in the capital city. Also, persons involved with the insurgency are known to leave the country for travel to Soviet bloc countries, including Cuba, or to Mexico, by pretending to disappear; friends and relatives report them as kidnaped or disappeared. In March the army reported that a guerrilla captured at Sayaxche, in El Peten, admitted that he and several workers from a mill in Escuintla, whose photos had appeared in the Guatemalan press as "disappeared," had really gone to Cuba to receive military training.

GUATEMALA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the civil and criminal codes expressly prohibit physical and mental torture, the practice continues. The press regularly reports the discovery of bodies of persons who had been tortured. In only a few cases has the identity of the perpetrators been established, but it appears that torture is employed by many groups. Government security forces, vigilante groups, guerrilla organizations, and criminals have all been held responsible for such acts.

There is strong evidence that harsh treatment and torture are inflicted on some detained persons by government security forces. For instance, in October the police claimed that a young man, Cesar Ramos, attempted suicide in the bathroom of a Guatemala City police station by shooting himself in the head with a pistol he stole from a police officer. Family members, however, charged police with beating and then shooting the young man. In September a Guatemalan mother claimed that she was abducted and forced to watch alleged Government security agents beat her son, who had been abducted a day earlier by men identifying themselves as policemen.

The guerrillas also have not hesitated to use torture to intimidate and to punish government collaborators. In August, 4 Indian members of a civil defense patrol who had been abducted by insurgents were found bound, tortured, shot, and with their throats slashed. The bodies were left on the Coatepeque-Port Ocos Road, department of Quetzaltenango. Guerrillas in Suchitepequez tortured and killed an army corporal, and in May a farmer in Chimaltenango was abducted, beaten, and shot by insurgents. In October, the Guatemalan army rescued 62 peasants who had been held by insurgents near the municipality of San Juan Cotzal. The rescued peasants, all of whom were in poor health and suffering from malnutrition, were used as camp workers by the guerrillas. Included among them were 37 children.

Several human rights groups have accused the Government of operating secret prisons where torture is used during interrogation. The Government denies these allegations, and their accuracy has never been confirmed. The United Nations Human Rights Commission's Special Rapporteur for Guatemala, Viscount Colville of Culross, announced in August that he had found no evidence of secret jails. An Amnesty International group inspected police facilities in Guatemala City without finding clandestine detention centers. In September, following rumors that secret jail cells had been found in the basement of the Ministry of Finance, reporters and television news crews were given free access to the building. They found no cells.

Allegations that the "model villages" constructed under the "Development Poles" rural resettlement program are concentration camps are not credible and do not accurately reflect the views of inhabitants or most outside observers. Two of the 50 communities under development in the model village program, Sarraxoch and Acamal, serve as "half-way" houses for guerrillas who have taken advantage of the Government's amnesty program. Access to these 2 villages by nonresidents is controlled.

GUATEMALA

As in 1984, the principal government prison, Granja Penal Pavon, was the site of a riot in which several prisoners were killed and others wounded. Government officials acknowledge that the prison population is in excess of the facility's capacity, and that the budget is inadequate for the number of prisoners. Prison officials blame overcrowding and gang warfare for much of the violence. There is no policy of physical punishment at Pavon or at the other prisons, and the facilities do not have a reputation for inmate mistreatment. However, in 1985 a Guatemalan court indicted prison guards for their role in a 1984 riot at Pavon, and several top prison officials were dismissed after the death of several inmates during rioting in 1985.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government does not use involuntary exile as a form of punishment, nor are critics of the Government arrested and convicted on unrelated charges. During 1985 the Government facilitated the voluntary departure from Guatemala of several people who sought protection in the Colombian, Venezuelan, and other diplomatic missions. As a matter of policy, the Government regarded these people as "guests" of the diplomatic missions in which they requested asylum and refused to refer to them as "asylees."

The Government claims that service in the civil defense patrols is voluntary. However, in many rural areas it is required of able-bodied males. In areas where service is required, exemptions may be obtained for medical reasons or by paying another man to perform the service. In a recent pastoral letter, the Metropolitan Archbishop of Guatemala City criticized the civil defense patrols as "obligatory service" and said patrol members' time would be better spent providing for their families. In conversations with Embassy officials, heads of the civil defense patrols in conflict zones expressed little doubt about the important role the patrols played in protecting their villages from guerrilla attack.

Under the legal code, persons may not be held for more than 48 hours without being brought before a judge and charged with a crime. Despite this and other legal provisions, the illegal detention of individuals suspected of being insurgents or insurgent sympathizers continues to be a serious problem. The Government officially denies that any persons are held in custody for political reasons.

In September, in response to 700 writs of habeas corpus filed by the Mutual Support Group, the Supreme Court advised that it had been unable to find any of those missing. In May the Mexico-based Guatemala Human Rights Commission, which is a front for the guerrilla movement known as the Organization of People in Arms (ORPA), requested 103 writs of habeas corpus. These writs also did not lead to the discovery of any detainees.

Compulsory labor is prohibited by law and is not practiced in Guatemala.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although there is little overt military interference in the operation of Guatemala's courts, judicial officers tend to respond to indications of special interest in particular cases by high government or military officials. The practical effect of such "influence" is that the judicial system is unable to respond to human rights violations committed by the authorities.

Persons arrested in Guatemala are guaranteed the right to legal counsel at all hearings, and lawyers are provided by the state if the defendants cannot afford them. However, the lawyers provided are usually law students. Also, the majority of the nation's lawyers live near Guatemala City, and it is difficult to retain legal counsel in the countryside.

Defendants may be released after posting bail at the discretion of the magistrate. However, the judicial machinery is cumbersome and slow and it is not unusual for defendants to spend several months in prison before the courts render a decision on their guilt or innocence.

In 1985, the Constituent Assembly enacted new laws of habeas corpus and amparo which went into effect January 14, 1986, upon the inauguration of the civilian Government.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The new Constitution guarantees the inviolability of the home and of personal correspondence and private papers. During 1985 the Government continued to set up roadblocks in the interior to check documents of travelers and to search vehicles for security reasons. The Treasury Police also used roadblocks to search for contraband and to interdict smuggling across Guatemala's 4 borders. Security forces have entered homes without warrants in search of guerrilla safehouses and arms caches. Government security agents have allegedly entered homes of kidnap victims without judicial authorization in search of weapons or other items.

Charges that private correspondence is tampered with continue to be made. Postal authorities acknowledge that this sometimes happens and blame dishonest employees. Letters bearing checks to relatives of Guatemalans living in the United States are a particular target of mail theft. In September the Government initiated a new mail-handling system to counter such thievery. There have also been allegations of mail tampering and telephone tapping by security forces.

Although the security forces have an intelligence network, there is no organized system of government informers or neighborhood watch committees in urban areas. However, civil defense patrols have served as a means of reasserting government control over the countryside. The involvement of large segments of the rural population obviously contributes to the Government's ability to monitor the movement of its citizens, an important function of the civil defense patrol in countering the insurgency. Guerrilla organizations have accused military commissioners--rural civilian representatives of the military--as well as other rural government employees of being "informers." Insurgents have assassinated a number of such persons.

GUATEMALA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government affirms these rights, and no major abuses were reported in 1985. There were no indications of any attempt to prevent the media from freely airing diverse viewpoints and actively covering the spectrum of political opinion during the election. In fact, there were concerns that the close relationship between parts of the media and some candidates in the Presidential election might threaten the "independent" stance of the media.

This situation of press freedom contrasts sharply with that of recent years when newspaper reporters and broadcast journalists were frequent targets of political violence. Lingering fears still serve to limit the exercise of press freedoms somewhat. While opposition views and even criticism of the Government are aired freely, journalistic self-restraint results in only perfunctory coverage of topics dealing with the military, national security, official corruption, police investigations, and some judicial proceedings. Journalists are not prevented from entering or covering newsworthy events in conflict zones, but they rarely do so. Guerrilla organizations and civil rights groups, including the GAM, have access to the media through communiques and manifestos, the Government no longer preventing their publication. In fact, in September the Communist Guatemalan Workers' Party (PGT) published a message in the press on its anniversary.

Radio is Guatemala's most pervasive medium, with over 100 privately-owned stations operating throughout the country. The Government owns and operates 6 radio stations and one television station, which broadcast a variety of news, educational, and entertainment programs. Four major independent daily newspapers are published in the capital. The Government publishes one daily with official announcements, decrees, and selected news items.

There is no censorship of either local or foreign books in Guatemala, but a few local writers and artists continue to live and work outside Guatemala. In March immigration officials confiscated several publications that a foreign priest brought into Guatemala. Authorities claimed the publications were Marxist literature but later returned them to the cleric.

The main campus of the University of San Carlos has been a center of violence, political and other kinds, in recent years. Students and faculty continued as victims of disappearances and killings in 1985. Though some of these acts were attributed to Guatemalan security forces, there rarely was evidence which strongly linked the disappearances and killings to the victim's association with the university. In September the army occupied the campus of the university for two days following a week of widespread rioting over bus fare and other price hikes. The Government charged that student groups headquartered on campus were using the economic-inspired unrest as an opportunity to provoke further civil disorder.

GUATEMALA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Basic Statute of Government affirmed the rights of petition, assembly, and political association. These rights have been reaffirmed through the process of democratization that began with the elections for the Constituent Assembly in July 1984, the political activities which followed that election, and the election of a civilian Government in November 1985.

Twelve political parties met the requirements for running candidates in the November presidential, congressional, and municipal elections. Politically, these parties span the spectrum from social democrats on the left to extreme conservatives on the right. Beginning with the 1984 Constituent Assembly elections, and continuing through the general elections of November 1985, freedom of political assembly has been respected by the Government. Although some political activities have been struck by violence, there is no indication that any such incident was linked to the Government.

Workers have the right to organize, strike and bargain collectively in conformity with the labor code, which requires a process of negotiations and conciliation before a legal walkout can take place. These procedures often make it difficult to call a legal strike. However, the new Constitution which went into effect on January 14, 1986, specifically expands workers' rights, including the right to organize for government workers. The new Constitution requires a revision of the labor code and it is expected that many of the factors inhibiting strikes and other labor actions will be removed.

There are approximately 300 active labor unions in the country and their organization is basically divided into two types: legally recognized and active centrals, and underground centrals. The largest and most significant legally recognized central is the AFL-CIO-affiliated Confederation of Sindical Unity (CUSG), a democratic confederation that follows the principles of the free trade union movement and emphasizes economic unionism. In mid-1985, it consisted of 11 federations with approximately 150,000 members. The balance of 200,000 organized workers belong either to independent federations or to independent locals. The CUSG is an affiliate of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

Two union organizations have links to Marxist groups. They are the Autonomous Syndical Federation of Guatemala (FASGUA), the trade union arm of the orthodox Guatemalan Communist Party, with some 6,500 members, and the National Workers Central (CNT), a Marxist-dominated ad hoc group of union locals without legal recognition, representing about 4,000 members. Although local affiliates of these organizations are often active in labor disputes, the 2 parent groups are not active in Guatemala. However, they issue press bulletins and manifestos from outside the country.

During 1985 there were several pending complaints against the Government before the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labor Organization (ILO) about abductions of trade union leaders and legal advisors. These complaints had been filed by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and by the Latin American Permanent Worker's Congress (CPUTAL). Also, the ILO cited Guatemala for noncompliance with Conventions 87 and 98, which affirm public workers' right to strike and the right of unions to engage in partisan political activities.

Aside from trade unions, there are numerous professional and trade associations in Guatemala. These groups operate autonomously, without government interference, and often exercise considerable political influence.

In 1985 labor leaders continued to be targets of violence. In March, Alfredo Castillo Jimenez, an agricultural labor leader, was killed in front of union headquarters in Jutiapa. The son of the CUSG's secretary general was kidnapped by unidentified persons and then released, as was Julio Celso de Leon, head of the Institute of Studies and Social Development (IGEPOS), part of the American Workers' Central (CLAT). Though violence against labor leaders has dropped considerably, the head of one union claimed that the "climate of violence" continued to inhibit union activity.

c. Freedom of Religion

The right to freedom of conscience and to free exercise of religion is recognized and these rights are respected in practice. Legal recognition is granted to all denominations.

More than 70 percent of the population practices Roman Catholicism. Many Indians, however, combine Roman Catholic tenets with elements of the traditional Mayan religion. Evangelical churches have grown rapidly, especially among Indians, and their followers number about one-quarter of the population. In addition, there is a small Jewish community.

Foreign Catholic clergy and religious workers actively proselytize in Guatemala. Foreign Protestant evangelical clergy have been joined in their efforts by local representatives of Guatemala's growing evangelical movement. One result of this religious mixture has been some tension between Catholics and Protestants. Although authorities deny any deliberate policy of discrimination, evangelicals nevertheless have cited cases of intimidation by the National Police and other government officials.

Catholics and evangelicals are freely permitted to preach and develop congregations. However, some have reported misunderstandings with local authorities over civil defense patrol duties. In January, 5 evangelical ministers were abducted in the department of El Peten. Press reports attributed the kidnappings to military commissioners. The 5 have not reappeared. In March a Guatemalan Mennonite social promoter was killed in Santiago, Sacatepequez. In a case which drew international press coverage, the army captured an American Seventh Day Adventist, Thomas Greenley, transporting a boatload of medicines up the Rio Usumacinta on the Guatemala-Mexico border. Greenley, who carried no identifying documents, claimed he was on a medical mission for a Seventh Day Adventist clinic based in Mexico. The military, however, accused him of delivering medicines to the guerrillas. Despite this suspicion, the Government turned Greenley over to United States consular officials and expedited his departure from Guatemala.

GUATEMALA

In 1985 the Guatemalan Catholic Church took outspoken stands on human rights issues. The Archbishop issued a pastoral letter in October which condemned violence and disrespect for human rights. The Guatemalan Bishops criticized the "democratic opening" as incomplete, since some elements of Guatemalan society supposedly feared to take part in the elections. The letter also expressed concern that the civil defense patrol leaders might try to force their patrol members to vote for a specified candidate (a fear which subsequently proved to be unfounded.) The Archbishop appeared in several newspaper advertisements calling on people to vote, and participated as a panel member in one presidential debate. In August the Archbishop called for respect for human life and law and for dialogue between the "factions" of Guatemalan society. He cautioned against blaming any one sector of society for the violence which has beset Guatemala, claiming many groups were responsible.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not limit the freedom of movement of its citizens within the national territory. There are no restrictions on foreign travel or on the right to reenter the country. All citizens are free to migrate to other countries.

The UNHCR estimated that approximately 46,000 Guatemalan refugees, mostly Indians from areas afflicted by insurgent activities, continued to live as refugees in Mexico, primarily in the border areas of the state of Chiapas. The Guatemalan Government has accepted this figure as accurate. Since 1982, the Government has followed a policy of encouraging "voluntary and orderly" repatriation of all displaced persons and assisting their reintegration into the country. In a recent speech to the United Nations, then-Foreign Minister Fernando Andrade said "the infrastructure" is in place to provide returning persons with security, housing, food, and the opportunity to become productive members of society. The Government tries to return displaced persons to their former villages. However, in cases where this is impossible, due either to the destruction of the village or the refugees' fears of reprisals, the Government places them in one of the model villages in the rural resettlement program. These villages are home to some 50,000 people, approximately 1.4 percent of the highland population.

Following a general decline in guerrilla activity, and the decision by Mexico to relocate the displaced persons to near the Bay of Campeche, away from the border, displaced persons began to return to Guatemala. The number who returned in 1985 is difficult to estimate, since most came in small groups and entered Guatemala the way they left, avoiding government immigration stations along the border. Some international refugee assistance organizations estimate that 3,000 refugees returned to Guatemala in 1985.

Some foreign clergy familiar with the western highlands of Guatemala contend that it is not safe for many displaced persons to return. They assert that the refugees will be improperly identified as guerrillas and killed. The Government denies this, pointing out that many towns near the Mexican border, such as Nenton in the department of Huehuetenango, are largely populated with people who returned safely from refugee camps in Mexico. Civil defense patrol leaders in towns along the border told United States Embassy officials in October that those displaced persons who were not part of the insurgency have nothing to fear in Guatemala. However, they did say that such persons who were regarded as having been active insurgents and having killed people would not be welcomed and could expect to be treated in the same manner as they had treated their fellow villagers before fleeing. There is no evidence that returning displaced persons have been singled out for persecution by government security forces.

Some groups have charged that the model village program violates the right of freedom of movement by herding people into "concentration camps." This characterization is rejected by inhabitants of the model villages and most observers who have visited them. With the exception of two villages discussed in Section 1.c., which act as "half-way" houses for once-active insurgents, there is no official policy of limiting movement into or out of the villages. However, especially in model villages located in conflict zones, the usual practice is for a villager to request a "pass" from the local civil defense patrol leader when the villager wants to travel outside of the village. The villager must present this pass to the civil patrol in each village he visits. Civil defense patrol leaders claim that this pass ensures the "safe conduct" of their villagers. They note that such a method of control is necessary to prevent guerrillas from infiltrating their towns. In some model villages, inhabitants have been restricted to the village area during the construction period. Later they have been free to leave if they wish. Many go to the coast for seasonal agricultural jobs. Some families have returned to their traditional mountain homes.

In addition to those who sought haven in Mexico, a major by-product of the insurgency was the internal displacement of as many as 400,000 persons since 1981. Both government and private agencies working with displaced persons agree that the number is now substantially below that figure. As one measure of the decline in the number of displaced persons, the Guatemalan army noted that 244 displaced persons applied for assistance at model villages in the departments of El Quiche and Alta Verapaz during the first six months of 1985. This compares with 731 in 1984 and 975 in 1983. Various government programs have resulted in assistance to almost all the displaced and the permanent resettlement of the majority.

Insurgent groups continued to set up roadblocks, extracting war taxes and haranguing the people they stopped. They carried out several ambushes on roads south of Lake Atitlan, robbing and killing several civilians. In October they also briefly occupied Tikal, a prime tourist attraction.

Following a pattern that began under the Rios Montt Government in 1982, Guatemalans living in voluntary exile continued to return to the country in 1985. For instance, members of the formerly persecuted Social Democratic Party returned to Guatemala and participated in the November 1985 elections.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

Guatemala was ruled throughout 1985 by a de facto military-controlled Government which took power following a coup on August 8, 1983. The Chief of State, General Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores, governed with the advice of a council of military commanders and a cabinet of ministers composed of both military officers and civilians.

Constituent Assembly elections took place as planned on July 1, 1984 when 1,157 candidates ran for the 88-seat Assembly. Of an estimated 3,500,000 eligible voters, 2,554,000 registered to vote, and of these 72 percent cast ballots. In 1985 the Assembly drafted a new Constitution, completing its work on May 31. The Constitution went into effect on January 14, 1986, when the civilian Government was inaugurated. It guarantees individual rights and provides for a human rights commission which is to be composed of a deputy from each political party represented in Congress. Congress will select a human rights procurador, or ombudsman, from candidates proposed by the commission. The procurador will have judicial powers and the prerogatives of a member of congress and will be empowered to enforce constitutionally guaranteed human rights. The Assembly also drafted a new electoral law and new habeas corpus and amparo laws.

National elections were held on November 3, 1985 and December 8, 1985, in spite of a deteriorating economic situation, serious rioting in September, and an election-inspired upturn in guerrilla violence which seriously tested the army's ability to guarantee the safety of voters and polling places in the departments of El Quiche, San Marcos, and Huehuetenango. Some 2,750,000 citizens registered to vote in the general elections, an increase of 250,000 over the Constituent Assembly elections, and 69.2 percent cast ballots in the general elections. Voters chose two presidential run-off candidates, Vinicio Cerezo and Jorge Carpio, from a field of eight candidates. Voters also chose 100 members of Congress and 330 Mayors. The Christian Democratic Party (DCG) won 38.6 percent of the presidential vote and 51 seats in the Congress. Its nearest competitor was the Union of the National Center Party, which won 20.3 percent of the presidential vote. The National Liberation Movement (MLN)/Institutional Democratic Party (PID) alliance won 12.5 percent of the vote, and the United Anticommunist Party (PUA)/National Unity Front (FUN)/ Emerging Movement for Harmony (MEC) coalition trailed with 1.9 percent. The Social Democratic Party won 3.4 percent of the vote and elected 2 members to Congress. In the presidential run-off election, Christian Democratic candidate Vinicio Cerezo won 68.37 percent of the vote. His opponent, Union of the National Center candidate Jorge Carpio, garnered 31.63 percent of the vote.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights:

The Government maintained an open door to visits by human rights groups during 1985. Such visitors included the UNHCR Special Rapporteur for Guatemala; Americas Watch; The American Friends Service Committee; Amnesty International; the Faculty for Human Rights in El Salvador and Central America; the Fellowship of Reconciliation; the Inter-American Human Rights Commission; the International Human Rights Law Group; the Peace Brigades International; the Nicaragua-Honduras Education Project; the Unitarian-Universalist Service Committee; the Washington Office on Latin America; and French and German parliamentarians.

GUATEMALA

The UNHCR Special Rapporteur, Viscount Colville de Culross, visited Guatemala in February and August of 1985. He met with the Chief of State, the Foreign Minister, the Minister of the Interior, the President of the Supreme Court, the Supreme Electoral Tribunal, and the Auxiliary Archbishop. He also traveled to the interior. Mutual Support Group representatives chose not to meet with him. In public statements, Viscount Colville declared that the process of democratization was on track and that he looked forward to the elections with "great enthusiasm." He expressed concern about the unsolved disappearances and killings but also stated that the human rights situation continued to improve, and he suggested that such progress should be encouraged. He found no evidence of secret jails or clandestine interrogation centers.

Human rights groups continued to criticize human rights abuses in Guatemala in 1985. Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report on Guatemala (which covered events in 1984), charged that paramilitary groups "acting under government orders or with official complicity (the so-called 'death squads') were responsible for massive human rights violations, including arbitrary arrest, torture, 'disappearance' and extrajudicial executions." While acknowledging that many peasants had died in guerrilla attacks, Amnesty International claimed that "the majority of killings and other abuses of non-combatant civilians were carried out by uniformed and plainclothed military and security agents acting under orders."

Americas Watch claimed in a report issued in September 1985 that the "human rights situation under General Mejia was no better than under General Rios Montt."

The Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), in its August 1985 report, "Security and Development in the Guatemalan Highlands," said the "rhetoric with which the military government presents its security and development programs is laudable and contains many positive elements." However, the report went on to conclude that the civil patrol system and some model villages "entail continuous and widespread violations of civil and labor rights."

The Mutual Support Group (GAM), a Guatemalan human rights group formed in 1984 to locate missing relatives, continued its activities in 1985. In a June communique, GAM listed 693 relatives as "detained-disappeared" since 1980. GAM's dissatisfaction with the efforts of the Tripartite Commission, founded by General Mejia in late 1984 to investigate cases of missing persons, led to a series of public protests. GAM's actions included demonstrations in Guatemala City and the peaceful occupation of the National Congress building and some government executive office buildings. In March, following one "occupation," a government spokesman warned GAM to obey the law. Shortly thereafter, the Chief of State said GAM was being unwittingly manipulated by subversives. Following this accusation, GAM member Hector Gomez Calito was abducted, tortured, and murdered by unidentified assailants. In early April, a GAM director, Rosario Godoy de Cuevas, was found dead in her automobile at the bottom of a ravine near Guatemala City. Dead along with de Cuevas were her child and brother. These killings led to a GAM-led protest march in Guatemala City which attracted international attention.

GUATEMALA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guatemala has a population of over 8 million and it is growing at a rate of 3 percent annually. The per capita income of $1,055 has fallen by 14 percent during the last 3 years.

Guatemala has sharp economic class distinctions. A small economic elite controls a significant portion of the commercial, agricultural, and financial resources of the country: approximately 50 percent of private investment, 20 percent of coffee production, and 100 percent of the largest industries. The middle class accounts for less than 20 percent of the population. Together, the upper and middle classes receive two-thirds of total income. According to the latest available figures, 21 percent of the urban population and 25 percent of the rural population are below the poverty line. The economy is divided into traditional and modern sectors. The traditional sector is rural and agricultural, and consists mostly of subsistence farmers and farm laborers. Of the 2,470,000 economically active people in Guatemala, approximately 1,482,000 work in the traditional sector, existing outside or on the edge of the money economy.

The economy has been in recession since 1980. A combination of world-wide recession, political instability in Central America, low commodity prices in world markets, and the disruptive effects of the insurgency on internal demand have had a devastating impact. The unit of currency, the quetzal, has gone from parity with the U.S. dollar to an exchange rate of almost 3 to 1 in less than a year. Inflation is running at 60 percent. Currently, 10 to 11 percent of the population is unemployed and 30 to 40 percent is underemployed. This situation is chronic and there is little hope for change in the near future. The economy is contracting and cannot supply nearly enough jobs for those who enter the work force each year. In 1983 the real rate of economic growth was minus 3.2 percent and employment fell by 5 percent. One study estimates that of the 75,000 people who entered the work force in 1984, only 33,000 were able to find employment. The desperate nature of this situation is underscored by the fact that 55 percent of the population is under 19 years of age.

In 1982, the latest year for which statistics are available, the caloric supply available for consumption was 97 percent of nutritional requirements. Despite considerable public investment in potable water projects, medical centers, and clinics, health services and sanitation are generally poor in rural areas. In 1980, again the latest year for which figures are available, 45 percent of the total population, but only 18 percent of those living in rural areas, had access to safe drinking water. Life expectancy at birth was 61 years in 1985, but the infant mortality rate rose from 63 per 1,000 live births in 1984 to 67 in 1985.

The literacy rate was 46 percent in 1973; 53.6 percent for males and 38.5 percent for females. In 1983 the enrollment in primary school was 72 percent, with males 77 percent and females 66 percent. Because half the population of Guatemala are Indians, who learn Spanish as a second language, literacy is a particularly difficult problem. To attack it and address the educational needs of the Indian populace, the Government has developed a bilingual education program.

The Government continued its model village rural resettlement program, a joint civilian/military effort to reconstruct and settle 49 villages on or near their original sites. Each town each has a potable water supply and electricity, at least one school, a church, postal and telegraph service, private bus service, and a health clinic. Some of the model villages have a military detachment nearby to provide security. In 1985, 24 villages had been completed and are inhabited.

Guatemalan workers are protected by a variety of laws which establish minimum wages, minimum working age, and maximum working hours, and attempt to establish minimum safety standards at the workplace. However, regulations are frequently ignored by employers, and the Government's ability to enforce these laws is less than adequate.

Guatemala is a Latin society in which most women play traditional roles; there is no discrimination against women by law, but de facto discrimination is rooted in centuries of cultural practice. Although figures show that over one-half the female population has not been educated and that 94 per cent of the women residing in rural areas had less than 3 years of schooling in 1978, it is estimated that 30 percent of the students enrolled in Guatemalan universities are women. They study education, law, business administration, pharmacy, humanities, and psychology and go on to careers as health workers, teachers, or office workers. The number of women occupying professional and managerial positions is small.

Several women university graduates have been named to high government positions. General Mejia appointed Eugenia Tejada de Putzeys as Minister of Education in 1983. When de Putzeys resigned in 1985, General Mejia replaced her with another woman, Aracely Judith Samayoa de Pineda. Other women serve as judges of lower courts, principally in the area of family law. The Ministry of Labor established an Office of Women's Affairs which has responsibility for encouraging the advancement of women. There was a continuation of the participation of women in politics during 1985. Three women served in the 88-member Constituent Assembly. Only 3 other women had been elected to the National Congress in the previous 35 years, and none to past Constituent Assemblies. There are 7 women deputies in the new Congress, including one Indian woman from the Department of Chimaltenango. President-elect Vinicio Cerezo has announced that he will appoint Ana Catalina Soberanis Reyes as Minister of Labor.

GUYANA

Guyana is a republic headed by an executive president, with a parliament, an independent judiciary, and a multiparty system. For twenty years Guyana's politics were dominated by Linden Forbes Sampson Burnham, who died unexpectedly on August 6, 1985 of a heart attack. His People's National Congress (PNC) first came to power in a coalition government with the United Force (UF) Party in British-supervised elections in December 1964.

Upon Burnham's death, Prime Minister Hugh Desmond Hoyte became President and was elected as leader of the PNC. The 1980 Constitution was followed to the letter, with Hoyte replacing Burnham in an orderly succession. President Hoyte dissolved Parliament on October 29, and national and regional elections were held on December 9, 1985. According to official results, the PNC won 78.5 percent of the vote. Its closest rival, the People's Progressive Party (PPP), won 15.8 percent of the vote. In the 1980 elections, the PNC got 77.6 of the vote. Prior to elections, several Guyanese electoral practices were revised which in the past had helped to call into question the fair and free character of Guyanese elections. However, these changes were insufficient to ensure that the voting and ballot counting processes were not marred by serious charges by opposition parties and by some civic organizations of election rigging.

On December 12, 1985, Desmond Hoyte was sworn in as Guyana's president for a 5-year term. The next day, five opposition parties held a public rally to protest what they described as widespread election fraud by the PNC. PPP leader Dr. Cheddi Jagan said he would call for strikes and demonstrations to bring down the Government. President Hoyte responded by saying he would not tolerate any attempt to disrupt the peace and create unrest. By year's end, calm prevailed despite continued allegations by critics of the PNC that they were being harassed by the Government in retaliation for condemning the elections as fraudulent.

Race apparently was less of a factor in the 1985 elections than previously. Although some members of the Indo-Guyanese community allege that the Government discriminates against them on grounds of race, the Government has denied these allegations. The Government and party leadership include a significant proportion of Indo-Guyanese, both Muslim and Hindu.

Individuals are free to pursue private interests, and rights to private property are respected. Social services and employment in the public sector seem to be open to all citizens on a racially nondiscriminatory basis. Indo-Guyanese continue to dominate the entrepreneurial aspects of the economy while Afro-Guyanese dominate the public sector, including the civil service.

In 1985, the human rights climate improved. There were fewer allegations of police killings of criminal suspects or of wanted criminals, and security personnel at Timehri International Airport conducted fewer random body searches. The Mirror, the newspaper of the opposition PPP, was allowed to receive part of a shipment of newsprint which it had been sent as a gift. There was more publication of opposition viewpoints in the government-owned media, although opposition views were still given very selective treatment. The Government continued its refusal to permit the independent Catholic Standard newspaper to import free gifts of newsprint.

International human rights activists were barred from coming to Guyana to investigate electoral conditions. Guyana Trades Union Congress (TUC) president George Daniels was confronted by progovernment efforts to undermine his TUC leadership. Police failed to prevent a progovernment group from totally disrupting the annual general meeting of the Guyana Council of Churches on March 12.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no politically motivated killings or summary executions in Guyana.

b. Disappearance

There were no politically motivated disappearances, clandestine detentions, or abductions in Guyana.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by the Constitution. In March, the government-owned Guyana Chronicle carried an editorial in support of Amnesty International's week-long observance of abolition of torture. There have been no allegations of the use of torture in Guyana as a deliberate tool of political control. However, human rights activists believe that confessions are often forced from prisoners by police. The Government admits that during its ongoing campaign against criminal activities, some mistreatment of criminal suspects has taken place due to undisciplined police. In its annual report covering August 1984 to August 1985, the Guyana Human Rights Association (GHRA) alleged five cases of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment in 1985.

The GHRA has charged that physical conditions within prisons are "deplorable," although it concedes some improvement. While prison conditions are Spartan, the Government claims adequate diet and medical facilities are available.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Constitution, no person may be deprived of personal liberty except as authorized by law. The right of habeas corpus exists and is generally respected. There have been a few allegations of individuals arrested and held for periods of from several hours to several days and up to 3 weeks.

In June 1985, the National Security Act was renewed. It provides that persons suspected of crimes under the act may be held up to 3 months without charges, after which they must be released or charged. It also authorizes searches without a warrant. No one has been detained under the Act since 1977. The GHRA questioned the renewal when "there is no political unrest or external threat to the country."

GUYANA

In the past, the Government has tried to use the legal system for political purposes. The courts have frequently dismissed charges which were obviously politically motivated; however, the litigation has been time-consuming and expensive for members of the political opposition. Such actions have constituted a form of harassment.

There have been no exiles from Guyana.

The Constitution provides that "no person shall be held in slavery or servitude and no person shall be required to perform forced labour." Government opponents claim that "voluntary" labor by civil servants one Saturday a year on Hope Estate, a government-owned coconut plantation, is forced labor because government employees are afraid of losing their jobs if they do not attend these work sessions. The practice of offering volunteer workers at Hope the opportunity to purchase scarce goods at favorable prices is used as an inducement to attract workers.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Guyana maintains a British common law system and legal procedures. Many lawyers and members of the Guyanese judiciary were trained in the United Kingdom. The Constitution protects the right of anyone charged with a criminal offense to a hearing by a court established by law. This right is respected in practice. Guyana has a functioning bail system, and defendants are accorded fair public trials and represented by counsel, who are court-appointed when necessary. Timely charges are presented, and appeals can be made to higher courts. There are no special courts for political security cases nor any political prisoners. Although opponents of the Government have asserted that "as an institution" the judiciary "has shown an increasing inability to resist the encroachment of politics," they cite no specific legal cases to support their allegations. No trials have been held in private. The independence of the judiciary and the integrity of the judicial process have been respected.

There are apparent delays in the judicial proceedings, due in part to shortages of trained personnel and materials. The GHRA believes the judiciary places too much emphasis upon enforcing the Government's policies against "economic crimes."

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In addition to the National Security Act's continued authorization of searches without a warrant, a rice bill became law this year which contained a provision to prevent smuggling of rice by granting appropriate authorities the right to "enter and search any premises...where padi or rice is stored;...or stop and search any aircraft, ship, carriage, animal or thing." However, there were no complaints or abuses under this new law.

The Government generally respects the right to privacy of those persons who are not actively engaged in any effort to express public views or to work in active political opposition to the Government. Some Working People's Alliance (WPA) and PPP activists have complained of politically motivated searches without a warrant for weapons, ammunition, or contraband. Under the National Security Act, such searches are legal. In December, police revoked Dr. Jagan's license to possess a firearm. The GHRA reports that the constitutionally questionable practice by Timehri International Airport authorities of randomly conducting "body searches" has "diminished." Forced resettlement of the population has not occurred in Guyana.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution affirms freedom of speech and press. However, the Government has control over the media both directly through ownership of the country's only daily newspaper and only radio station and indirectly through licensing of the importation of newsprint and printing presses used by other publishers. The PNC presents its views in the government-owned Guyana Chronicle and the ruling party's New Nation. Opposition viewpoints are freely expressed without prior censorship in several weekly papers, which, because they have only limited access to newsprint, resemble news sheets more than newspapers. In 1985, the Government reversed its previous policy of not permitting the importation of donated newsprint by allowing the PPP's newspaper, The Mirror, to receive a gift of newsprint from the Soviet Union, on condition, however, that the newsprint be distributed among all newspapers in proportion to their circulation figures. In fact, the gift was divided between the PPP's Mirror and the PNC's "New Nation" with the latter getting most of it. In addition, the Government promised to assist The Mirror by facilitating the importation of a new printing press. However, the Catholic Standard, weekly newspaper of the Roman Catholic Church, has not been permitted to receive donations of newsprint despite repeated requests to the Government. Apart from restrictions on newsprint, opponents of the Government allege that libel suits have been used as an "intimidatory device" against opposition weeklies. But there may have been some instances when careless investigation of reports and exaggerated rhetoric by weeklies legitimately invited libel suits.

Guyanese receive printed materials from abroad, but scarce foreign exchange is generally not available for subscriptions to foreign publications. The Caribbean Contact, a monthly regional newspaper which is published in Barbados and which has been unrelenting in its hostility to the Government, is freely available and sold locally for Guyana currency. Foreign and regional radio broadcasts, including Voice of America, can be received.

The Government owns the country's only radio station, the Guyana Broadcasting Corporation (GBC), which broadcasts the BBC World News Service twice daily. GBC is highly selective in reporting the views and activities of opposition parties, although in 1985 it appears to have aired the views of the parliamentary opposition parties--the PPP and the UF--more frequently than in previous years. This year Guyana's elections commission allocated free radio time to opposition political parties. The Chronicle published objective summaries of these broadcasts and publicized opposition meetings. However, the WPA filed suit against the GBC for refusing to sell it air time in addition to what was provided gratis. Because the Government believes that the media should serve "developmental" needs, which in practice is defined as supporting government policies, journalists employed by the government-owned media employ self-censorship; unfavorable or objective reporting has cost such journalists their jobs on occasion. The Guyana News Agency (GNA) edits items which the government media receive from wire services. In the past, GNA largely relied on the Soviet news agency TASS and the Cuban news agency Prensa Latina for the bulk of the international articles appearing in the government-owned Guyana Chronicle. By the end of 1985, GNA drew much more frequently on American and other wire services for its news articles. As a result, reporting on world events became more balanced than in past years.

The Government record on academic freedom is good. Several opposition Working People's Alliance leaders and Guyana Human Rights Association activists teach at the University of Guyana. Opposition parties have organized student groups there.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees freedom of assembly and association, and in general, individuals can freely associate. However, under the Public Order Act, police permits are required for public political meetings. At his discretion, the police commissioner can refuse permission for a meeting without explanation. In March 1985, the court decided an action brought by a WPA activist in October 1981, concerning the constitutionality of the police commissioner's refusal to grant permission to hold several public meetings in various locations. The commissioner based denial of the request on the "volatile social climate." The case was dismissed on the grounds that the activist had applied to the wrong police station for holding the meetings.

In general, opposition political parties complain of delays in receiving permission from the police to hold public political meetings or of inadequate police protection to prevent some of their meetings from being disrupted by toughs allegedly associated with the ruling party. However, opposition political parties held public rallies which were not disrupted. According to Guyana's police commissioner, parties applied to hold over 700 public meetings during the 6-week campaign period. Of those, he said few had to be rescheduled due to conflicts with other meetings. The Government did not attempt to disrupt the public rally sponsored by opposition parties on December 13.

Workers in Guyana are legally free to join unions and to strike. Legislation setting out democratic procedures enabling unorganized workers to choose a union and organized workers to change unions has been proposed but not yet enacted. Guyana has militant and powerful unions which oppose the Government. Strikes in the government-owned sugar industry are common, and strikers are generally not penalized. However, strikes in other public sectors have met more resistance. After a 1983 strike in the government-owned bauxite industry many workers, including all shop stewards, were dismissed. The Guyana Trade Union Congress (TUC) is still negotiating for their reinstatement. The Government has the authority to declare any strike "political or illegal." Although it has not exercised that right since 1979, some trade unionists believe that the mere existence of this authority has an intimidating effect on independent trade union activity.

GUYANA

The TUC is the sole national trade union center; its 70,000 members and 24 affiliates constitute the entire unionized work force. It is responsible for centralized collective bargaining although a court challenge to legislation which gave it this status is still pending.

Seventeen TUC unions support the ruling Government while seven unions, including the two largest, oppose the Government and are either affiliated with the opposition PPP or the WPA or are politically independent. Until September 1984, the progovernment unions, which have disproportionate voting power in electing the TUC's executive board, dominated the organization. At the 1984 annual TUC conference, the dissident unions narrowly won control of the executive board. Since that election, the new TUC leadership has been embattled. Legal actions brought against unions which are in opposition to the Government seem to be designed to frustrate union activity. In spring 1985, progovernment dissidents in the Public Service Union (PSU) obtained injunctions against the holding of PSU elections and its annual conference, thus virtually paralyzing union operations and forcing it to incur large legal expenses. Another suit brought by a progovernment faction is pending against the opposition Guyana Mine Workers Union. Even if the unions are ultimately victorious in the courts, the delay and expense of the court procedures weaken and intimidate them.

In May 1985, the Government pulled PNC-affiliated unions out of traditional TUC-sponsored Labor Day rallies and mounted government/PNC-sponsored rallies which overshadowed and seriously diminished the effectiveness of TUC rallies. Arbitration, mediation, due process, and judicial review are all available to unions in Guyana. Unions, trade associations, private associations, and professional bodies freely maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields, both public and private.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees freedom of religion and there is complete tolerance of religious faiths in Guyana. Christians (44 percent), Hindus (42 percent), Muslims (12 percent), and Baha'is (2 percent) are free to practice their religions without restrictions. There is no favored or official state religion. Foreign missionaries are permitted to enter the country to proselytize. Adherence to a particular faith does not confer any advantage in civil, political, economic, military, or other secular status.

On March 12, a demonstration by a PNC-formed ad hoc group called "Concerned Christians," supported by adherents of the "House of Israel," a paramilitary religious cult led by a fugitive from U.S. justice, forced the Guyana Council of Churches (GCC) to cancel its annual general meeting. The demonstration was apparently prompted by a GCC working paper critical of the Government's economic policies and accusing the Government of political repression and of eroding human rights. On March 18, the government-owned radio station carried an "official commentary" characterizing the GCC document as "nothing short of treason." In addition, Anglican Bishop Randolph George was singled out for abuse in a government-owned media campaign which lasted several weeks. A suit was filed against Bishop George in November by a member of the Anglican Church who was reportedly active in the "Concerned Christians" group. The suit charges that the April 16 and 17 Diocesan elections were fraudulent. In a possible effort to reconcile political differences between the Government and certain religious groups, one of the first official acts of President Hoyte was to form a religious advisory committee. However, it was not apparent by the end of the year that this committee was serving a conciliatory role.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within Guyana is guaranteed by the Constitution and is permitted. However, since the colonial period, travel to certain Amerindian areas has required government permission. In the past, permission has at times been withheld, apparently on political grounds, but there were no such reports in 1985.

Guyanese are free to travel abroad, to emigrate, and to return to Guyana. Occasionally opposition politicians have been stopped and searched at the international airport, but reports of such searches diminished in 1985.

During 1985, no Guyanese had his citizenship revoked or his passport taken permanently for political reasons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Critics of Forbes Burnham had charged that he maintained himself in power for over 20 years through control of the security apparatus, rigged elections, harassment and intimidation of the opposition, as well as through state control of the economy and public sector jobs. Prime Minister Hugh Desmond Hoyte, who became President in a smooth and orderly constitutional succession on Burnham's death in August has activated three new mechanisms to channel the participation of Guyanese who are not members of the PNC into the decisionmaking processes of the State. He has established two 15-member presidential advisory committees, one on the private sector and another on religious affairs. The third mechanism for increasing popular participation in governmental decisionmaking is the 123-member National Economic and Social Council which met for the first time on September 14, 1985, even though its creation was provided for in the 1977 State Planning Act. The Council is supposed to facilitate the widest possible participation of the Guyanese people in the policy-making, planning, monitoring, and evaluation connected with development programs.

Despite an effort by the Marxist-Leninist PPP to get PNC agreement to postpone elections indefinitely, constitutionally mandated parliamentary elections were held on December 9, 1985. The elections were marred by allegations of fraud by opposition parties, by some civil organizations, and by the bishops of the Anglican and Roman Catholic Churches. The Government admits some irregularities but denies that they were extensive. The PNC won 78.5 percent of the vote which gave the party 42 seats in the National Assembly, a gain of one seat. The PPP won 8 seats, losing 2 from the 1980 elections. With 3.4 percent of the vote, the UF retained its 2 seats. The WPA which boycotted the 1980 elections got 1.3 percent of the vote and was given one seat. Three other opposition parties ran in the elections but won no seats. The PNC won a similar victory in elections for seats on the regional democratic councils of Guyana's 10 administrative regions.

Constitutionally, all citizens 18 years of age or older were eligible to participate in the political process and to vote; citizenship has not been denied on political grounds. Opposition parties and other critics of the Government mounted a pre-election campaign for free and fair elections. The Government was partially responsive by eliminating postal balloting and by severely restricting overseas and proxy voting. Also, it gave preliminary voters' lists to all political parties in a timely manner to permit identification of possible errors and allowed additional time for opposition parties to appoint agents to monitor polling stations and counting centers. Nonetheless, these and other measures failed to ensure that the 1985 elections would be perceived to have been completely free and fair. The Government admitted foreign journalists to cover the elections but did not allow admission of foreign human rights observer groups. Under the "Representation of the People Act," the Government may or may not choose to count the ballots at the polling stations as demanded by the opposition.

Opposition parties charged there was widespread disenfranchisement of their supporters, multiple voting by PNC members, and instances in which opposition polling agents were prevented from carrying out their functions. The PPP and WPA withdrew their polling agents in protest of alleged fraudulent practices before the polls closed. In response to such criticism, the GBC carried an official commentary in which the Government admitted to imperfections in the election process which it said even caused some of its own supporters to be denied the opportunity to vote. The commentary claimed that these imperfections did not constitute fraud and suggested that if opposition parties were serious about their allegations they could refer them to the courts.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has regarded outside criticism of its human rights practices as interference in its internal affairs. In 1985, the government media paid more attention to human rights matters. Their reaction to the "1984 Country Report on Human Rights Practices" was moderate. The Government has responded to past criticisms and has moved to correct some human rights abuses such as police killings, instances of police brutality bordering on torture and complaints about the deteriorating social infrastructure of the country such as water, electricity and sewerage.

In February 1985, the Government refused visas to a "Joint Mission" from the British Parliament Human Rights Group (PHRG), Americas Watch (AW) and the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ), which was proposing to visit Guyana "to inquire into and to make recommendations concerning the legislation and procedures governing national elections in Guyana." The Government said the Mission constituted interference in Guyana's internal affairs and warned that the groups would not be allowed entry into Guyana under any circumstances. Despite the Government's public rejection of the "Joint Mission," Americas Watch and the PHRG went ahead with the proposal. The ICJ dropped out. The Joint Mission conducted its "investigation" from Port of Spain, Trinidad, and met with representatives of many of the opposition groups. Lord Chitnis, a member of PHRG, headed the panel. The "Interim Report of the joint mission to Investigate Political Freedom in Guyana" concluded that although "to some extent freedoms still exist in Guyana and some of the worst human rights abuses taking place in other countries of the region are not found here, there are serious grounds for concern, especially about the guarantees necessary for free and fair elections and the functioning of authentic democracy." The report of the "Joint Mission" was widely publicized in the opposition press in Guyana.

The Guyana Human Rights Association (GHRA) is a nongovernmental organization formed in late 1979 with support from trade unions, professional organizations, and churches. It issues periodic press releases and an annual report on human rights observance in Guyana.

The association has attempted to draw international and regional attention to the human rights situation in Guyana but has been hampered in its campaign by insufficient documentation of the alleged human rights abuses. The GHRA claims that, to preserve its objectivity, political activists are discouraged from holding executive positions. Yet its executive committee is dominated by leading critics, if not opponents, of the Government. Government media have denounced the GHRA as an opposition entity, and the Government is clearly irritated by the GHRA's reporting, which it labels "antinational and unpatriotic." Nevertheless, there has been no physical violence against human rights activists in Guyana.

Guyana generally has not been active in international human rights forums, but the Government has taken a leadership role in criticizing human rights violations in South Africa, Namibia, and "Palestine," openly conceding in these cases that human rights transcend international frontiers and that concern for human rights does not constitute interference in internal affairs.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guyana has a population of about 800,000, which is estimated to be growing at the rate of 0.4 percent per year. Many Government opponents question these population figures, however, arguing that Guyana's population has actually declined to about 650,000 as a result of emigration. Guyana's "official" economy is comprised of public, private, and co-operative sectors, with the public sector dominating. Agriculture and mining are the most productive activities with sugar, bauxite, and rice accounting for approximately 80 percent of export earnings. There is also a large and vibrant black market economy which is fueled by the illegal exports of gold, diamonds, shrimp, rice, and practically any other locally-produced commodity which can be sold abroad. Although opinions differ and statistics are impossible to obtain, some observers believe that this black market accounts for nearly 50 percent of the economic and commercial activities in the country. In 1984, the Guyanese economy underwent a mild recovery, growing approximately 2 percent over a disastrous 1983. There was some recovery of production in the sugar and bauxite industries. However, the medium-term economic outlook for Guyana is bleak. World market prices for sugar and bauxite are extremely low. Declining production, obsolete plants and equipment, emigration of skilled personnel, and the absence of incentives for private investors (both foreign and domestic) have all contributed to the current economic crisis, as have high prices for imported goods, adverse weather conditions affecting rice and sugar production, and inefficient management. Unemployment is estimated at about 35 percent; however, statistics in these areas are hard to obtain and their accuracy is open to question.

The Government has taken various measures to cope with the economic crisis. In 1985 it announced new price incentives for the rice, beef, dairy, and peanut industries. Negotiations to reach an agreement with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) on a standby facility continue, but in May 1985 the IMF declared Guyana ineligible to make further drawdowns from the fund's resources, and the Government publicly stated that it was not prepared to accept the IMF's "harsh and unsuitable terms of conditionality."

In 1985, the Government began efforts to reverse the deterioration of essential services such as water, electricity, sanitation, and health care, utilizing local funds and financial assistance from the Netherlands, the Inter-American Development Bank, and the European Economic Community.

Guyanese have a life expectancy at birth of 70 years; the infant mortality rate is 33.6 percent per 1,000 live births. Many school buildings are in poor condition, text and exercise books are in short supply, and the number of teachers has declined. According to World Bank figures, in 1980, the adjusted primary school enrollment rate was 103 percent for males and 105.8 percent for females. In 1970, Guyana has an estimated adult literacy rate of 91.6 percent. Since 1975, the Government has had a formal policy of providing free education from nursery school to university; however, it has proven costly to maintain. Opponents accuse the Government of politicizing education and allege that this is the principal cause of declining educational standards.

In Guyana, children under age 14 may not be employed in factories or related enterprises, or on ships, but may be employed by their parents as long as their employment does not interfere with school attendance. Women and children under fourteen may not work at night except in special circumstances. The Government is empowered by law to prescribe minimum wages, and, in November 1985, a joint Government-TUC agreement was announced stating the 1986 minimum wage in the public sector would be raised from $15.10 per day to $16.80 per day. The TUC had called for a minimum wage of $25 per day which, it claimed, was the minimum necessary to sustain an urban family of six. Wages in the private sector which are governed by collective bargaining agreements tend to be higher than public sector wages. In 1984 the Ministry of Manpower instituted 17 prosecutions for failure to pay prescribed wages, allow holidays, pay overtime rates, or produce required wage registers. Substantial fringe benefits for both private and public sector workers, such as vacation, transportation, housing allowances, annual automatic step increases, etc. make it difficult to generalize about real income.

GUYANA

The Government may, by law, prescribe the daily or weekly working hours, but hours are generally negotiated between organized labor and employers. In November 1985, a joint Government-TUC committee was established to implement a reduction of the public sector work week from 44 to 40 hours. Laws regulate the health, welfare, and safety of workers, setting minimum standards of cleanliness and general maintenance. In 1984, the Ministry of Labor made 565 inspections of work places, investigated 600 complaints, and instituted eight prosecutions. The Government runs occupational safety and health campaigns regularly, urging workers to consider such things as fire safety.

The Guyanese population is divided into 51 percent East Indian, 43 percent African and mixed Africans, 4 percent Amerindian, and less than 2 percent European and Chinese. Many Indo-Guyanese allege that the Government discriminates against non-PNC members in the allocation and distribution of social services and employment in the public sector.

However, historical, cultural, religious, and demographic factors, rather than any overt discrimination, seem to be largely responsible for the existing racial patterns. Most Indo-Guyanese parents prefer their children to be businessmen, independent farmers, or professionals rather than civil servants, policemen, firemen, or soldiers.

The Government has emphasized the role of women in development and acted to promote and to protect women's rights. There is still discriminatory legislation against women in Guyana's statutes, but the 1980 Constitution clearly makes discrimination against women illegal and therefore unconstitutional. While most Guyanese women continue to occupy their traditional roles as homemakers, a number have moved into important positions in government, business, and the professions and serve as role models for other women. Mrs. Viola Burnham, the wife of the late President, was appointed Vice President for Education and Social Development. Afro-Guyanese women are among the principal supporters of the ruling People's National Congress.

HAITI

Haiti is ruled by President-for-Life Jean-Claude Duvalier, who succeeded to the presidency upon the death of his father in 1971. In June 1985 the National Assembly adopted Haiti's first political parties law and passed 31 constitutional amendments. The amendments created a prime ministership but also augmented the president's powers, reaffirming the ultimate authority exercised by the President-for-Life. Legislative elections were advanced from February 1990 to 1987. The unicameral Assembly is normally elected to 6-year terms, but, like all government institutions, is dominated by the President. Most opposition politicians have rejected the political parties law but two parties, one independent and one progovernment, have begun the registration process in order to contest the 1987 elections. Elections under the Duvaliers historically have not been free, although the 1983 municipal and 1984 assembly elections were actively contested and less impeded than prior elections.

The police are a part of the Armed Forces of Haiti under the Ministry of Interior and Defense. The national militia, called the Volunteers for National Security (or VSN by its French acronym), report directly to the President. Neither the Armed Forces nor the VSN plays a significant role in the governmental decisionmaking processes.

Haiti remains the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere. Nearly 80 percent of the rural population and more than half the urban population live below the absolute poverty level. The Government receives economic assistance from international donors to help address problems resulting from overpopulation and an agriculture devastated by soil erosion. Despite an expanding assembly industry, Haiti's economic problems remain acute.

Continuing a trend which began in late 1984, the independent media have criticized the Government and commented on contentious political issues with unprecedented vigor. In addition, on April 19, a presidential amnesty freed 37 political and state security prisoners. The Government claimed that the April amnesty cleared the jails of political prisoners, but the amnesty left the whereabouts of several persons unaccounted for.

Two Haitians allegedly distributing political pamphlets were killed by security forces on April 22. In July the police arrested six persons for circulating an unregistered newspaper and expelled three Belgian priests, including the director of the church's Radio Soleil for news reporting which the Government contends exceeded the station's charter. In December the radio station itself was closed by the authorities for 3 weeks. In November, security forces fired on student demonstrators in the town of Gonaives, killing 4 and wounding 14 and thereby setting off widespread protests in other cities. On December 17 the Government announced the arrest of some officials for the shootings. Also in December, the Government detained for 4 weeks a leading opposition figure and former minister, Hubert Deronceray, allegedly for possession of subversive documents.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During the night of April 22, two Haitians were shot and killed by government security forces, according to the Government, while they attempted to flee after being caught distributing political pamphlets near Port au Prince City Hall and exchanging shots with the police. Nongovernment sources reported that both men were killed at a military prison in the presence of a government minister. No pamphlets or other evidence were presented to support the government's version of events. The Government stated that it sincerely regretted the killings and that they did not represent a new repressive policy or strategy. On November 28, 4 students were killed and 14 people were wounded as the result of military actions to quell demonstrations in the town of Gonaives. Two of the killings were apparently unprovoked, and a commission of inquiry was formed to investigate the shootings. Two officials were subsequently arrested for shooting the students.

Questions continued to be raised throughout 1985 about the killing of Father Albert DeSmett, a member of the same order as the priests expelled in July, which occurred several days before the expulsions. Church officials at the time reported that available evidence indicated DeSmett was killed during a robbery in his room, presumably by the same intruder who had burgled DeSmett's room the previous week. The Government's autopsy and police investigation reports, which might help clarify the matter, have not been made public.

b. Disappearance

Following the April 1985 amnesty, the Government was asked about 15 unaccounted-for persons, all but 2 of whom had reportedly been detained before 1985. Of these two, one was subsequently released, while the second remains unaccounted for. (A previously unknown detainee was also released.) The Government has stated its intention to investigate the reports of these persons' detention and to attempt to determine their whereabouts.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A number of political prisoners were reportedly seriously beaten during 1985 while being interrogated. One of those released in the April amnesty, Antoine Leroy, bears scars from the beatings. He was rearrested in October on suspicion of being involved in a conspiracy to overthrow the Government. Other political prisoners released in April described cases of beatings they had witnessed or had heard about from fellow inmates. Abuse of nonpolitical prisoners is less frequent but does occur, usually in the smaller towns by unsupervised police or militia. In mid-December the director of a Protestant school in Gonaives, Fritz Bernard, died while in the Gonaives jail, allegedly from a severe beating.

Prison conditions are generally primitive in Haiti, but prisoners are normally permitted to receive visitors, food, and medical treatment. However, particularly in the early stages of an arrest or when they are taken to the Casernes Dessalines military prison, prisoners are often kept in degrading circumstances, such as stripped to their underwear in crowded and unsanitary conditions. The cells in the Casernes have no windows, no lights, and only buckets for toilets. Visitors usually are not allowed into the Casernes, and food is not always provided. An American citizen, implicated in an October coup plot, was denied visitors at the Casernes for 2 weeks following his arrest.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Haitian law requires the arresting authority to present to the accused a warrant specifying the alleged violation of law. If an arrest is made without a warrant, a judicial ruling on the validity of the detention must be obtained within 48 hours. This procedure is not always observed, although there are indications that the Government is increasingly attentive to observing legal procedures. Generally, those persons confirmed as having been detained for political reasons in 1985 were released within 48 hours or held longer only after the Government obtained the necessary judgment. However, the Government failed to respect this procedure in the cases of two American citizens and Hubert Deronceray, all of whom were facing political charges. In 1985, detainees were normally allowed contact with family members; previously, detainees had often been held incommunicado.

On April 29, a presidential amnesty freed 37 political and state security prisoners including the 19 persons detained in November 1984 and members of the Heraux Group, who had been tried and convicted of a 1983 bombing in Port au Prince. At that time the Government stated that it no longer held any political prisoners. However, the amnesty left several persons unaccounted for, and there were several detentions reported in late 1985 in connection with an exile plot to overthrow the Government, as already mentioned. As 1985 closed, the number of persons detained in Haiti without charge is unknown, but the figure for political detainees, judging from the list of unaccounted-for persons, could range up to 20.

Haitian law requires a suspect to be charged at least 2 weeks prior to the trial. This does not always happen in practice. The law permits legal counsel for defendants, but a client is sometimes not allowed to meet with his lawyer until immediately before the trial. There is no system of bail, though "provisional liberty" can be obtained in some cases. Juries and tribunals are both used to hear cases, render judgments, and impose sentences. Defendants have the right to appeal a conviction within 3 days of the decision.

During 1985, the Government twice resorted to the expulsion of persons deemed to pose a political or security threat to the regime. Three Belgian priests were expelled in July because of alleged political activities. Former Minister of Interior and Defense Roger Lafontant, although not legally expelled, was compelled to leave Haiti on October 4. Two persons freed under the April amnesty are known to have heeded government warnings to leave Haiti for an extended period.

A 1984 amendment to the labor code revised the provisions on forced and compulsory labor to bring them into compliance with the relevant convention of the International Labor Organization (ILO).

HAITI

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary is independent of the executive only in theory. The culmination in 1985 of legal proceedings stemming from a 1984 shooting death illustrates the degree of political interference in some cases. The incident involved a bodyguard to the then-Minister of Interior and Defense who was shot to death by a nightclub owner in what appeared to be self-defense. The issue erupted into a test of political strength between government factions. The owner was released and rearrested in a series of judicial reversals after two senior Ministry of Justice officials became involved in the case. The Supreme Court finally acquitted the owner in March after it had been instructed by the President to see that justice was done. The decision was hailed in some legal circles as a victory for Haitian justice, but in fact the case illustrated the limitations on the judiciary's independence.

In early April, the National Security Court was convened for the first time to retry the Heraux Group, five suspects in a 1983 Port au Prince bombing which killed several persons. The defense had appealed their earlier convictions by the ordinary courts, arguing that the case was political and therefore properly in the domain of the National Security Court. The defense prevailed and the second trial (like the first in 1984) was conducted in conformity with normal judicial procedures. The trial was open, and lawyers for the accused mounted a vigorous defense. The original convictions were sustained, but the life sentences were reduced to 9 years, which local legal observers regarded as more appropriate to the crime. All five Heraux Group convicts were later freed in the April 29 presidential amnesty.

After a 52 percent budget increase in fiscal year 1985, the Ministry of Justice received a further 32 percent rise in fiscal year 1986. In September, Justice Minister Theodore Achille introduced legislation designed to reduce the backlog of cases plaguing the courts. The changes include lengthening the annual court calendar, extending the hours for daily court sessions, and imposing penalties on judges who do not complete caseloads and lawyers who do not vigorously defend clients.

In the past, political prisoners in Haiti were seldom brought to trial. The 1985 retrial of the Heraux Group before the National Security Court followed an appeal of earlier convictions. The failure to bring other political prisoners to trial in 1985 appeared to result either from the brevity of their detention (the journalists in June) or from their release under the presidential amnesty before their cases were ready for trial. In nonpolitical cases, it is not uncommon for the accused to wait at least 6 months before the case comes to trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is no systematic interference with the right of privacy or the sanctity of the home. However, when searches and the monitoring of homes do occur, it is generally without a warrant. No one is known to have been subjected to house arrest in 1985.

The Volunteers for National Security (VSN) is a national militia. It performs security functions and serves as an informer system, reporting to the President on the political opposition and threats to the regime. This group is responsible for a number of abuses and is known to act arbitrarily, often in areas nominally falling under police jurisdiction.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution guarantees each citizen the "right to express his thoughts in all matters and by every means at his disposal," government actions and legislation sharply curtail this right. The 1980 press code requires that all publications be submitted 72 hours in advance for governmental review, that all journalists be accredited by the Ministry of Information, and that no material critical of the Duvalier family be published. The first of these requirements is often unenforced, but the media are aware that their freedom to operate depends on the sufferance of the Government. This induces an awkward attempt to gauge the current depth of government patience and the degree of self-censorship necessary to avert a government crackdown.

On balance, 1985 witnessed some improvements as well as setbacks in the ability of the media to perform an important role in Haiti's political development. Just as previous periods of relaxed press controls have coincided with government attempts to project itself as a liberalizing institution, expanded media activity has accompanied President Duvalier's repeatedly expressed intention to democratize Haiti. The Government's steps towards implementing its reform program provided the media with many opportunities to play a wider role in political events.

Encouraged by President Duvalier's January 2 speech promising major reforms, the independent media became increasingly bold in reporting, analyzing and debating contentious political issues. The three established news magazines (Le Petit Samedi Soir, Information, Inferno, and Le Courrier, a new entrant) featured articles by and about the major opposition leaders and their critical views of government policy. These publications are able to attract advertising by major businesses without government interference. New subjects receiving independent comment in 1985 included the political parties law, presidency-for-life, policy differences between the International Monetary Fund and the Government, and achievements of Haitian emigres. Some press accounts contradicted government claims of a massive turnout in the July referendum and detailed local voting irregularities.

In August, a government official lost his job after he criticized the referendum in Le Courrier. Although the Government apparently reacted against one of its own officials criticizing its policies, rather than against the article per se, the incident received extensive comment in press circles.

There are four Haitian dailies: one is the official government paper, and the others, while privately owned, are basically progovernment. The daily press is still considerably less adventurous than the magazines, but it too is expanding the scope of its coverage to include controversial events which sometimes cast the Government in an unfavorable light (for example, official corruption). The progovernment Le Matin welcomed the annual commemoration in July of the founding of the VSN with paeans to its service to the Government and country; the next day it ran a blistering editorial condemning the random shooting sprees many VSN had engaged in following the formal celebrations. Le Matin criticized the Government for having allowed the rampages to occur and followed up the next day with reports of casualties and pictures of some of the wounded. In 1984, opposition figures were almost never mentioned by name; this year, some of the opposition communiqués appeared in the dailies, and Gregoire Eugene's treatise, "The Haitian Miracle is Possible," received balanced reviews.

The church-owned radio stations, Radio Soleil (Catholic) and Radio Lumiere (Protestant), are important outlets for independent information. The Government expelled Radio Soleil's director in July. The Government also embargoed utility services to the station, forcing it to rely on an expensive generator for nearly a month. In December the Government closed Radio Soleil for 3 weeks reportedly for ignoring repeated government warnings to refrain from "sensationalist" broadcasting. In light of this disturbing action, Protestant station Radio Lumiere suspended its own news programming in an apparent effort to steer clear of the controversy and to protect its own broadcasting license. The government-run Radio Nationale and Television Nationale reflect only government views. A privately owned cable television company servicing Port au Prince (Telehaiti) generally broadcasts uncontroversial news, although in its coverage of the referendum, Telehaiti quoted a New York Times dispatch citing widespread voting irregularities.

The arrest of six persons on July 20 at the offices of Inferno in connection with the banned journal, Conviction, was another reminder of the constraints on journalism. The Government regards Conviction as illegal because it is not properly registered and is the organ of a political party, Sylvio Claude's Haitian Christian Democratic Party, which is also considered illegal.

There are generally no restraints on the sale or distribution of Haitian publications, but foreign publications are reviewed by the Government upon arrival and those deemed offensive are confiscated. Dailies depend heavily on Agence France Presse for international and even local news; articles with Haitian themes often are tailored to fit local sensitivities. Publications openly hostile to the Government, such as those of U.S.-based exile groups, are barred from the country.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Constitution grants Haitians the right to assemble peaceably and to form unions, political parties, and cooperatives, all formal associations and public assemblies of more than 20 persons must have government authorization. Professional, cultural, religious, trade, and smaller nonpolitical groups, however, generally operate unhindered and associations are usually free to affiliate with overseas groups.

In 1985, there were two attempts, one successful and the other not, to organize independent mass rallies in Port au Prince. Nearly 80,000 youths marched in February under the auspices of the Catholic Church, ostensibly to commemorate International Youth Year. Because of persisting church-state tensions, however, some government officials viewed the march as a provocation. The Government proscribed a second attempted youth march, proposed in June for the purpose of protesting Haiti's economic and political systems. Widely believed to have been instigated by leading oppositionist figure Hubert DeRonceray, this march was banned on the grounds that it would have unconstitutionally opposed the presidency-for-life and been a threat to public order. On November 28 street demonstrations in the town of Gonaives were marked by violence as police fired on demonstrators. At least 4 persons were killed and 14 wounded in this disturbance. On December 17 the Government announced that persons implicated by the Commission of Inquiry in these deaths had been detained for further judicial proceedings.

In September, DeRonceray and five associates were detained for several hours; the Government accused them of attempting to stage a provincial rally without the permit required by law for any public assembly of more than 20 persons. The Government also claimed that DeRonceray was acting outside the limits of the political parties law. For similar reasons DeRonceray and three others were prevented from visiting the Jacmel area on September 29. On the evening of December 4 Hubert DeRonceray was arrested by police officials allegedly for possession of subversive documents found in a search of his home and office. He was released a month later without ever being formally charged or brought before a judge.

The Government amended the labor code in 1984 to facilitate the formation of unions by employees, to protect the rights of Haitian workers abroad, and to prohibit forced labor. Haitian workers have the legal right to strike. The labor code allows Haitian labor unions to engage in collective bargaining. In practice union demands have usually been subject to compulsory arbitration under the Ministry of Social Affairs.

Haiti's nascent trade union movement continued to grow in size and stature in 1985. In his May Day address, President Duvalier reaffirmed the legality of the Federation of Union Workers (founded in 1984) and stressed the "potential of these unions" to improve living conditions for the working class. Also in May, the 300-member Central Sugar Cane Union of Les Cayes became the tenth union to join the Federation, raising the total membership to 2,800. This gave the Federation its first affiliate outside the Port au Prince area and extended representation to workers who have historically labored under very poor conditions.

The president of the Federation, Joseph Senat, has worked hard to seek international respectability for his organization. He represented Haitian workers at the June conference of the International Labor Organization in Geneva. He later met with officials of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and with AFL-CIO officials to discuss assistance to the Federation. In March, a delegation of the ICFTU's regional organization, the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers, visited Haiti to assess the local labor situation. In 1985, four federation members received labor training in the United States.

HAITI

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholicism is the official religion of Haiti and is embraced to varying degrees by about 80 percent of the population. Voodoo, a religion combining Christian and African animist elements, is also practiced by a majority of Haitians. All other religions are freely practiced by their adherents, including Bahaism, Judaism, and numerous Protestant sects. The Government generally does not interfere with proselytizing, missionary activities, sects which affiliate with overseas coreligionists, religious instruction, or publishing.

For many years now, the Catholic Church and the Government have competed in several areas, notably in the provision of such social services as education. Because of the church's independent influence, the state has traditionally been suspicious of the church and its foreign connections. The quality of church-state relations fluctuated in 1985, and they were troubled by five events: February's church-sponsored march in Port au Prince; an April incident in which a VSN member shot at a priest in the Port au Prince archbishopric; the July expulsion of the three Belgian priests; the December closing of Radio Soleil; and the death of Father DeSmett. The relationship reached a nadir when the church, to protest the expulsions, refused to participate in the VSN state ceremonies. The Government responded with a harsh week-long, antichurch campaign in the official media. The church continues to complain of government interference in clerical matters (such as the assignments of priests).

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not normally restrict domestic travel of citizens or foreigners. A sparse network of military checkpoints operates irregularly across the country, and foreigners and interurban transports are required to register with them before entering some towns. There are no restrictions on persons changing their residence or place of work. A few political activists have in the past been placed under police arrest and some must still inform the police each time they plan to leave Port au Prince.

Haitians are legally required to purchase passports and exit visas before leaving the country. The exit and reentry visas are a tax used to raise revenue, and travel documents normally are not issued or denied based on political considerations. Expatriates are free to return to Haiti and many regularly do so. The Government encourages skilled Haitian emigrants to return to Haiti. Immigration officials at Port au Prince maintain and use a list of persons to be prevented from leaving or entering the country because of criminal, security, or political reasons. On occasion, the Government confiscates the passports of political activists such as Sylvio Claude who, until he had his restored in September, was effectively barred from traveling abroad.

An increasing number of Haitians are attempting to leave Haiti because of the country's poor economy; Their primary destination is the United States. Pursuant to the 1981 U.S.-Haitian bilateral agreement on interdiction of undocumented migrants, 2,163 "boat people" were repatriated by the U.S. Coast Guard in 1985 (more than one-third of the total since the accord was signed). In addition to serving as an effective obstacle to illegal migration from Haiti, the Coast Guard rescues hundreds of Haitians each year from unseaworthy, distressed vessels.

Follow-up trips to the Haitian countryside by the Creole-speaking returnee officer of the U.S. Embassy continue to demonstrate that the migrants' incentive is primarily economic, and that the Government is honoring its commitment not to harass or persecute Haitians who have illegally left the country and then been returned. In the first 9 months of 1985, 582 returnees were interviewed and no one alleged persecution or intimidation by the Haitian government.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Haiti is ruled by President-for-Life Jean-Claude Duvalier. He is assisted by a small group of advisors, but by law and custom he exercises absolute power. The Constitution grants the President-for-Life the right to name his Cabinet and all important government officials and to designate his successor. When the National Assembly is not in session, he may rule by decree. When in session, the Assembly follows the lead of the President, as it did during June 6-9 when, with almost no debate, it unanimously approved his proposed 31 constitutional amendments and the political parties law. This legislation provided for regulating the functioning of political parties and creating a prime minister to be appointed by the President from the party winning the most Assembly seats in the next elections. The amendments also strengthened significantly the powers of the President in some areas, and slightly expanded the legislative prerogative of the Assembly. Elections for the Assembly were advanced from February 1990 to February 1987. The political parties law, Haiti's first, specified the conditions a party must fulfill to be registered and function legally. Key provisions require that parties accept the primacy of the president-for-life and submit to the Government the names and addresses of supporters whose numbers must constitute at least 0.3 percent of Haiti's population (approximately 18,000).

The Government contends that the presidency-for-life provides Haiti with invaluable stability and is therefore non-negotiable. It further argues that the registration requirements are modeled on foreign laws and are reasonable, given claims by opposition leaders that they have extensive popular followings.

There was widespread disappointment with the limited nature of the political changes. Opposition politicians immediately rejected any participation within the new framework. Critics focused on the handpicked nature of the prime minister, as well as the amendments strengthening the president's powers, the reaffirmation in the amendments and the legislation of the presidency-for-life, and the large number of affirmative declarations of party membership required by the political parties law. In the aggregate, the opposition argued, these provisions undercut any real democratization and in fact strengthen the power of the presidency. Oppositionists further dismissed the requirement for affirmative declarations of membership as unrealistic given Haiti's troubled political history. They insisted that radical changes, particularly the elimination of the presidency-for-life, are necessary before they can consider participating in the new system.

Faced with opposition and foreign rejection of the constitutional amendments and political parties law, the Government held a referendum to obtain popular backing for the measures on July 22 and claimed that 99.98 percent of a 90 percent turnout voted in favor of the new law and amendments. However, the ballot did not offer a negative option, the mechanics of the poll compromised the secrecy of the vote, and observers confirmed that far less than 90 percent of the electorate actually voted in the referendum. Opposition leaders had called for abstention. The refusal of the Government to engage the opposition in a dialogue on the substance and execution of the referendum, not to mention the flawed manner in which it was conducted, revealed a broad lack of appreciation of democratic principles within the Government and was judged by international observers to be a setback for the President's promised political opening.

Shortly after the referendum, several delegates of the National Assembly and many senior government officials announced the formation of a progovernment political party, the National Progressive Party. In November, Gregoire Eugene announced that he would begin the process of registering his previously inactive Social Christian Party of Haiti. Eugene is an independent lawyer who returned to Haiti in 1984 after 4 years of exile in the United States.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

An important difference between the regimes of Francois Duvalier and Jean-Claude Duvalier is the latter's regard for international opinion. Visits by international human rights organizations to Haitian prisons have been accepted. In early 1985, representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross and the Paris-based International Federation of Human Rights met with a total of 19 political detainees at the Casernes Dessalines military prison, and at the national penitentiary. In June, a delegation of the Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights met with members of the government human rights commission, judges and officials from the Ministry of Justice, private sector activists, and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Another group of American human rights activists was received in August by the Foreign Minister and many others.

Two human rights organizations exist in Haiti. The first is the government-sponsored National Human Rights Commission created in 1982. This nine-member commission investigates citizens' complaints of government abuses, but it has only advisory powers and does not involve itself in "political" cases. The Haitian Human Rights League, founded in 1979, is affiliated with the International Federation of the Rights of Man. While articles by its president, local attorney and educator Gerard Gourgue, occasionally appear in the local press, the League itself is only minimally active. In late 1985, Gourgue served several times as an intermediary between the Government and opposition figures, securing in September the release of two detainees and the return of the confiscated passports of three oppositionists.

HAITI

The April 1985 release of a special Amnesty International report on Haiti caused widespread, indignant comment in Haiti, including by some anti-Duvalierists who agreed with government supporters that the report contained serious inaccuracies and failed to recognize the human rights improvements registered under Jean-Claude Duvalier.

The chapter on Haiti in the Amnesty International Report 1985, covering events during 1984, expressed continued concern about the incarceration and mistreatment of prisoners of conscience. Freedom House rated Haiti as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Haiti's population, growing by 1.9 percent annually, is estimated at 5.7 million, with over 1 million in the Port au Prince area. Haiti is the poorest nation in the Western Hemisphere with an estimated 1983 per capita income of about $300, although in rural areas it is considerably less.

The economy is basically unregulated, but single companies (parastatal and private) control the distribution or production of many basic commodities. A small elite and a growing middle class in Port au Prince control most of the wealth in the country. Approximately 80 percent of the rural and half of the urban population subsist in dire poverty, which has provoked massive emigration, particularly during the last decade. Foreign remittances, estimated at up to $100 million per year, are a crucial element of survival for many extended Haitian families.

Haiti suffers from a dearth of natural resources and a topography which is 80 percent mountainous. In addition, erosion of the topsoil resulting from the destruction of forest cover on the hillsides, combined with frequent droughts and floods, have greatly lowered agricultural production and income for peasants. Coffee, essential oils, and more recently mangoes have been the primary agricultural exports. Most farming is on small plots owned by peasant families and subdivided for generations through inheritance. Consequently, agriculture is fundamentally inefficient. The entire output of goods and services grew by about 1.7 percent in 1985 while the rate of inflation exceeded 8 percent.

The most dynamic sector of the economy is the assembly industry, which has created over 60,000 jobs in the past 15 years. This has resulted from favorable government investment policies, high labor productivity, and a low minimum daily wage. The U.S. economy receives over 90 percent of the output from the assembly industry, which profits from duty free privileges for many of its products under the Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI). Although vulnerable to international market trends, the assembly industry is expected to continue to grow. Employment generation in this sector has only marginally reduced Haiti's extremely high unemployment rate. Based on surveys, the International Monetary Fund estimates that the "effective" unemployment rate (which factors in underemployment) is 48 percent.

The future of Haiti's small, open, and impoverished economy depends upon how it exploits its export potential. Restrictive trade practices are key constraints to industrial and agricultural export expansion. Import-substitution industries are protected by import licensing requirements and quotas, government import monopolies, and a highly differential tariff structure. This protection system distorts the structure of domestic prices relative to that of the world market, making local production uncompetitive. It also reduces the living standards of Haitian consumers, who must purchase some products at a price 20 to 50 percent higher than they would be in an open and competitive economy.

The Government provides limited support to agricultural cooperatives designed to improve productivity and access for farmers to markets at home and abroad. The fiscal year 1986 budget reflected the government's position that the country's development priorities are education and agriculture. Food imports are essential; however, many imports are sold at prices above the free market level because of high duties. According to 1982 figures, Haitians, on average, receive only 85 percent of their daily caloric requirements and more than 60 percent of children under age 5 suffered some degree of malnutrition--nearly 10 percent of the cases were characterized as serious. An estimated 88 percent of the population (100 percent in rural areas) did not have access to potable water in 1980. The infant mortality rate stood at 106.90 in 1985, and life expectancy at birth was 54 years. The adult literacy rate was 20 percent, and the primary school enrollment ratio was 77 percent, according to World Bank statistics for 1981.

The labor code provides for a daily minimum wage adjustable when the official annual inflation index exceeds ten percent. Presently, the minimum wage is $3.00 per day in Port au Prince and $2.64 elsewhere. The Ministry of Social Affairs employs approximately 15 inspectors responsible for overseeing legislation mandating safe, healthy working conditions. The minimum age for even limited employment is 12. Fierce adult competition for factory jobs ensures that child labor is not a factor in this sector. Many children, especially young teenagers, work long hours in cottage industries for less than the minimum wage.

Haitian society consists of at least four broad groups. The extremely poor peasantry is numerically largest, but the urban poor, because they have a higher cost of living than the peasants, may be even more deprived than the peasants. The urban poor constitute at least 50 percent of city dwellers and perhaps 15 percent of the national population. Both of these groups are overwhelmingly black. Above them on the economic scale is a small but steadily expanding middle class, and at the top is an elite, about 1 percent of Haiti's population. The elite comprise businessmen (largely mulatto) and top government officials (mostly black). Conflicts and distrust among these Haitian social groups have produced a weak tradition of public service. Mass education, for example, has at times been resisted actively by members of the elite as socially destabilizing. The same attitude has retarded agricultural and infrastructural development, health care, and openness to the outside world. More recently, however, the level of government cooperation with international donors and financial institutions has improved.

The role of women in Haitian society is limited by tradition. Since 1982, there has been no legal discrimination between the two sexes; women enjoy full rights to education, property, and such social prerogatives as divorce. Particularly among the peasantry, however, women are still confined to the traditional occupations of marketing, sewing, and housekeeping. Middle-class women often work out of economic necessity. They comprise a large part of the assembly workforce and dominate secretarial, teaching, and nursing positions. Few, however, rise to prominent positions in the private sector, even in the cultural and educational areas. Greater opportunities are generally available to women in the government bureaucracy. There have been a few women Secretaries of State in the last several years (there are two at present), and women are well-represented at the mid- and upper-level managerial ranks. Women may serve in the armed forces only as nurses.

HONDURAS

Honduras' return in 1982 to democratic, constitutional rule was consolidated in November 1985 by national elections marked by over 80 percent voter participation. A new president, three vice presidents, 134 members of the unicameral National Congress, and several hundred municipal officials were elected for four-year terms.

National police functions are performed by the Public Security Force (FUSEP). FUSEP is fundamentally a civilian police force with limited military capabilities (although commanded by an Army officer) and traditionally has enjoyed a non-adversarial relationship with the Honduran people. Major FUSEP elements include the COBRA incident response unit, the Directorate of National Investigations (responsible for criminal investigations and some intelligence activities), the Traffic Police, and training academies for police officers and enlisted personnel. The Armed Forces are the traditional guarantor of Honduran internal and external security. Closely linked to rural Honduras and to the economic middle-class, the Armed Forces are strongly supportive of the democratic process and of broadly-based social and economic development.

Honduras is among the economically least-developed nations in Latin America. Although 1984 and 1985 saw inflation largely under control and positive economic growth, economic problems remain severe. Combined unemployment and underemployment exceed 50 percent of the workforce. Honduras has a mixed economic system in which private sector economic production receives significant government and international support. A number of government-owned autonomous agencies provide both goods and services; the public sector is the largest employer.

During 1985, President Suazo and the current military leadership have demonstrated increasing sensitivity to the importance of strengthened human rights. This attitude is expected to continue under the newly-elected government. Honduras enjoys a vocal political opposition, a free press, and a generally good human rights record. A national program is being developed to improve the administration of justice and otherwise to strengthen the judiciary system. However, the mistreatment of detainees and the incommunicado detention of accused persons for longer than the 24 hours allowed by law continue to occur. Although the Constitution guarantees judicial due process, the administration of justice is uneven, slow, and often subject to improper influences. Honduras continues to feel the effects of civil strife in neighboring countries, including external efforts to foster subversion in Honduras. In August, several casualties resulted from efforts by government forces to detain Salvadoran guerrillas operating in refugee camps near Colomocagua. The country hosts over 85,000 refugees, including at least 65,000 from Nicaragua and more than 20,000 from El Salvador and Guatemala.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1. Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Unlike previous years, there were no public accusations of politically motivated deaths in Honduras in 1985. The Honduran Armed Forces published a preliminary study on reported disappearances through early 1984 which indicated that some of those missing may have died at the hands of expatriate Nicaraguans in Honduras. The allegation was not repeated in the inconclusive final report published on October 17, 1985.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances were documented in 1985, although human rights organizations continue to assert that 118 disappearances between 1974 and 1984 remain unexplained. An Armed Forces' investigation of alleged disappearances reportedly included interviews with human rights activists and with those members of the Armed Forces mentioned by name as having been involved in disappearance cases. The final report concludes that no evidence exists to determine that any military officials were involved in any disappearances, that no reportedly "disappeared" persons are held in military or public security facilities, and that the information provided to the investigation by human rights activists was vague and at times contradictory. The inconclusive preliminary and final reports were heavily criticized by human rights spokesmen. The report recommends that any further accusations of involvement by members of the Armed Forces be taken to the proper judicial court. On December 12, a criminal court case against six officers accused of involvement in disappearances was dismissed.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited under the law; however, physical and mental mistreatment of prisoners exists. Beatings, humiliation, and at times more severe treatment are known abuses. These are identified by the Honduran Human Rights Committee (CODEH) as the most severe current human rights problem. Prisons are crowded and medical attention for prisoners is poor. Prisoners are allowed visitors during regular hours, and many depend on these visits for food and supplies. Due to the inefficiency of the court system, as many as one-third of those in prison at any given time have not been tried and convicted of any crime.

Confession is the most common basis for holding a prisoner. When a judge finds that an accused person has been beaten or that a confession otherwise has been obtained illegally, the case is dismissed. This procedure is said by public security authorities to stimulate false accusations of torture. However, several allegations of mistreatment by the police were officially investigated in 1985, and at least three police officers, including one DNI detective, were imprisoned for their actions.

In August, an American priest, Father John Donald, S.J., was detained for 48 hours by Honduran authorities for investigation of charges of involvement in subversive activities. Father Donald complained of having been bound and blindfolded when transported and deprived of food and sleep while held by Honduran military authorities. (The charges against Father Donald were determined by the investigation to be without substance, and he was allowed to continue to work in Honduras.)

HONDURAS

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The judicial system continues to be cumbersome and often inequitable. Honduran law requires that a person be presented to a judge within 24 hours of arrest and that the judge must decide within 6 days whether there is sufficient evidence to hold the accused for trial. In practice, these rules are not always followed. Persons accused of subversive or terrorist activities frequently have been held incommunicado for several days or, at times, even weeks.

Government security forces continue to maintain that suspected subversives at times must be held incommunicado for longer than the 24 hour period allowed by the law in order to protect national security. Suspected subversives captured in Siguatepeque in February initially were unaccounted for but later were interviewed by the press at the central penitentiary following an "appeal for personal exhibition" filed by CODEH. Former labor leader Anselmo Ronero Ulloa was released on August 23 from incommunicado detention pursuant to a request of habeas corpus and the intervention of a presidential advisor.

An "appeal for personal exhibition" can be filed with the Supreme Court to locate an individual believed to be detained. Such appeals have received faster attention following a restructuring of the Supreme Court in June. The courts and police officials are increasingly responsive to habeas corpus and personal exhibition demands. On at least three occasions in 1985 the authorities allowed general searches of prisons by court-appointed authorities for persons alleged to have been improperly detained. No evidence was found to substantiate the allegations of improper detention. Much of the improvement in this regard has resulted from efforts by the Armed Forces Commander to resolve the issue of disappearances and to improve the adherence to the law by the security services.

Forced or compulsory labor is not practiced.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Honduran law provides for fair trial, although social and economic status are factors in the dispensation of justice. There are no secret tribunals nor political prisoners. Detainees are allowed to contact lawyers, and bail practice is liberal. Public defenders are, in theory, available but the system is not effective in practice. A new penal code went into effect in March 1985, and attempts were made by the Honduran Bar Association to educate lawyers and judges throughout the country regarding changes. Nevertheless, judicial guidance in implementing the new code has been minimal and few substantive changes have resulted thus far. A revised code of procedures, which also took legal effect in March 1985, has yet to be published.

The Supreme Court is appointed by the Congress for four-year terms; it administers the court system and appoints all other judges, including justices of the peace. The Constitution provides for judicial independence; however, the courts are subject to political influence. A June 1985 restructuring of the Supreme Court following an attempt by the Congress to impeach several justices resulted in a less politicized court which has proven more responsive to demands for habeas corpus and has shown a willingness to consider charges of judicial misconduct. A positive development is the increased role of the Honduran Bar Association in the administration of justice. The Bar Association sponsored forums to explain new laws and also acted against at least one judge accused of improper conduct.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government normally does not interfere with the private lives of its citizens. Citizens are free to affiliate, move, and live as they choose. A "spoils system" is characteristic of public employment, and, as the national election approached, some public employees were dismissed due to their political affiliations. Some officials and private individuals claim that their telephones have been monitored or their movements observed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Constitution and all viewpoints are tolerated and printed in the Honduran press. Local radio stations (there are over 100) broadcast numerous programs which allow the public freely to express opinions. The television stations are privately owned. Freedom of the press is widely respected; both the newspapers and radio stations openly criticize the Government, the courts, and the Armed Forces without fear of reprisal. Academic freedom is respected and student groups play a major role in the formation of university policy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to organize and demonstrate is recognized and exercised by labor unions, political parties, professional organizations, students, and human rights groups. Trade unions enjoy a thirty-five year history and are independent, strong, and varied in political orientation. Most industries have unionized labor forces. Workers have the right to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike.

Honduras' trade unions maintain close ties with international trade union organizations. Its largest confederation, the Confederation of Honduran Workers (CTH), is an affiliate of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the ICFTU's regional arm, the Inter-American Regional Workers Organization (ORIT). The second largest confederation, the General Workers Central (CGT), is an affiliate of the World Confederation of Labor and its regional arm, the Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT). The Unitarian Federation of Honduran Workers (FUTH) is an affiliate of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). The three principal labor organizations claim to represent approximately twenty percent of Honduran workers, including a substantial number of peasants and rural laborers.

Honduran labor and peasant leaders played a major role in the resolution of a March-May constitutional confrontation between the executive and legislative branches. Labor and peasant organizations actively participated in the electoral process, meeting on several occasions to affirm their support for the constitutional process. Labor leaders ousted by competing internal factions have claimed that government or political party interference led to their defeat. The International Labor Organization's Committee on Freedom of Association noted in mid-1985 that the Government of Honduras had not replied to charges made in 1984 which alleged the wounding and disappearance of trade union members, unwarranted dismissals, and interference of the Government in trade union affairs. Union leaders regularly travel to international meetings and some were elected to the national Congress.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although predominantly Roman Catholic, Honduras has no state religion. All religions are tolerated. Missionaries operate in many parts of the country. Members of the clergy occasionally have been detained but only on the basis of alleged secular offenses.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Hondurans freely travel within and outside of Honduras. There are no permanent travel restrictions for Hondurans or foreigners in the country, although national security concerns have led to increased police checks for proper personal documentation. Those who do not have proper identification are held until documentation is produced but are not charged with an infraction. Exit visas are required for Hondurans wishing to leave the country and constitute a form of control over international travel. Exit visas almost always are granted without dispute, although the wife of former Armed Forces Commander Gustavo Alvarez was refused permission to leave for several days.

Attempts are made to identify and register the thousands of undocumented foreigners--principally Salvadorans and Nicaraguans--residing in Honduras. In addition, Honduras hosts some 85,000 refugees (approximately 40,000 under UN sponsorship) who are allowed to remain in Honduras without threat of involuntary repatriation. Refugee experts generally consider the protection of the refugees to be good. On August 29, government forces entered the refugee camps near Colomoncagua in an effort to detain Salvadoran guerrillas known to be operating there; the ensuing confrontation with the camps' residents resulted in two deaths and over a dozen casualties. The UNHCR recognizes the right of Honduran authorities to exercise their police function in the camp but complained about the way in which the action was taken.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

On November 24, 1985, following an active and sometimes stormy political campaign, nearly 1.6 million Hondurans went to the polls to choose their next Government in elections marked by popular enthusiasm for the exercise of democracy. Nine candidates representing four political parties were on the ballot, each with his own slate of vice presidents, congressional deputies, and municipal officials. Voting is mandatory and by secret ballot. The Constitution guarantees to all Honduran-born citizens of legal age the right to hold office and, despite controversy about some, the National Electoral Tribunal officially accepted all candidates.

HONDURAS

Through the Armed Forces Commander, General Walter Lopez, the Armed Forces have endorsed the election process and declared their intention to support the Constitution. A two-month-long political crisis arising from disputes over the selection by the political parties of presidential candidates was resolved in May by a compromise agreement worked out among the democratic labor unions and peasant organizations, the Armed Forces, and political leaders, with Catholic Church mediation. An attempt in late October by some members of the National Congress to convert the Congress into a Constituent Assembly and to postpone the elections was halted by a popular outpouring of support for the constitutional process and by the public refusal of the Armed Forces to support the action.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

The Government continues to cooperate with local and international human rights organizations. Foreign Minister Paz Barnica has spoken frequently with human rights groups and declared publicly his interest in investigating allegations of human rights abuses. The Armed Forces investigation of alleged disappearances was completed in March and published in October, although adding little to already existing knowledge. Local human rights leaders and visiting members of human rights organizations are widely quoted in the press.

In addition to the two major private human rights organizations (CODEH and the Families of Disappeared Persons), the Honduran Bar Association has an increasingly active committee on human rights. A congressional committee on constitutional guarantees exists and exhibited some interest in examining extrajudicial procedures.

Amnesty International Report 1985, which covers events in 1984, expressed concern about the arrest without warrant of political detainees, their detention without trial in both unofficial and recognized detention centers, and allegations of torture, "disappearances" and extrajudicial executions. Freedom House rates Honduras "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Honduras is 4,499,000 and is growing at an estimated annual rate of 3.3 percent. Despite the presence of a sizeable middle-class, the 1985 per capita gross national product was only $815. Honduras is among the economically least-developed nations in Latin America. Well over half of the population lives in rural areas. Almost 55.0 percent of the rural population and 14.0 percent of the urban population were considered in 1978 (most recent data) to live below the absolute poverty level. The Honduran Ministry of Education claims that the literacy rate has risen in recent years from less than 60 percent to near 70 percent. The Ministry's claim of 86 percent primary school enrollment is considered by many to be inflated; a more accurate figure is about 74 percent with many children of varying ages and abilities often attending classes given by one teacher in one room. The national university is available to those who satisfy basic academic qualifications and the cost is minimal. Technical training is severely lacking at all levels.

Health care is poor for the majority of Hondurans. Although there are sufficient doctors, many areas have no health care facilities and, in many cases, medical centers built in the last several years are unoccupied. The life expectancy rate at birth is 60.73 years; the infant mortality rate is 73.3 per 1,000 live births. Forty-four percent of the people have access to safe water; the 1977 caloric supply relative to nutritional requirements was approximately 95 percent.

Discrimination against women is banned by law. Cultural practices reduce the number of women occupying key positions in the Government and business. However, education is equally available and women who manage to obtain positions are accepted. Legal discrimination against women in domestic cases exists; attempts to correct this are underway. Ethnic minorities, concentrated on the north coast, enjoy legal and--in most cases--social equality.

The Constitution and the labor code require that all labor be fairly paid and limit the hiring of children under 16. Minimum wages, working hours, and occupational health and safety are regulated by law. The daily minimum wage varies among productive sectors, ranging from 4.60 to 7.10 lempiras (2 lempira equal $1.00). The standard work period is 8 hours per day and 44 hours per week. The labor code provides for a paid vacation of ten workdays after one year and twenty workdays after four years. Despite violations of the above laws and regulations by individual employers, workers' rights are generally respected. There is no evidence that either the government or employer associations systematically seek to deny workers' rights.

JAMAICA

Jamaica is a constitutional parliamentary democracy with a mixed economy emphasizing the private sector. It is a member of the British Commonwealth. A Governor General, appointed by the Crown on the advice of the Prime Minister, represents the Queen, while the elected Prime Minister, the leader of the majority party in Parliament, is the country's chief executive. The Parliament is comprised of the elected House of Representatives (currently 60 members) and the appointed Senate of 21. The powers and procedures of Parliament correspond to those of the Westminster model.

Two major political parties have alternated in power since the first elections were held in 1944. The Jamaica Labour Party's leader, Edward Seaga, has been Prime Minister since November 1980. The Constitution requires that general elections be held at least once every 5 years; the last general election was held on December 15, 1983. However, because an outdated voters' list was being used, the PNP boycotted the election and the JLP gained all 60 seats in the House of Representatives. The next parliamentary elections must be held before March 15, 1989.

The opposition's boycott created an anomalous and unprecedented situation for democratic Jamaica. The Jamaica Labour Party has attempted to compensate for the absence of an elected parliamentary opposition by appointment of independent senators to the upper chamber and enhancing opportunities for citizens to appear and address the House.

The small, apolitical security apparatus comes under the Ministry of National Security and consists of the Jamaica Constabulary Force, the Jamaica Special Constabulary Force, and the Jamaica Defense Force. The latter consists of a regular and a reserve force and includes an Air Wing and a Coast Guard. Since 1974, the Jamaica Defense Force has been authorized to conduct joint operations with the police in order to maintain the peace under the Suppression of Crime Act.

During 1985 human rights were generally respected in Jamaica. Political demonstrations and protests occurred on several occasions, including a 3-day island-wide general strike in June. The Government maintained order, and violence and arrests associated with the protests were minimal. Violent crime continued to be a major social problem, especially in the Kingston area. Instances of excessive violence by the police were criticized in newspaper editorials, by human rights advocates, and by the Police Commissioner himself. Problems associated with a poorly trained, overburdened, and underpaid police force continue to generate the country's most persistent human rights concerns.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Officially sanctioned murder of political opponents does not occur in Jamaica. However, Jamaica suffers from a high level of violent crime, some of which has political overtones. Both major parties, as well as the Workers Party of Jamaica (WPJ) which is communist, have supporters who occasionally resort to violence. The legal system has not been effective in dealing with these cases because of a code of silence enforced at the local level and the reluctance of the police to get involved in political disputes.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence of abduction, hostage-taking, or disappearances perpetrated by security forces. In most incidents where people disappear and are later discovered dead, the victims are involved in criminal activities or were suspected of being police informers.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government does not sanction or condone the use of torture. However, criminal suspects frequently allege that they were beaten or mistreated by police while being held in police lock-ups. Some individuals have brought suit successfully against the police for these actions and the Government has had to pay damages.

During 1985 there was a public outcry concerning the level of violence associated with the police. Impromptu demonstrations protesting indiscriminate police killings have taken place in various communities. There have been frequent editorials and speeches, including several by the new National Police Commissioner, on the need to improve the force through better training, better supervision, and elimination of unsuitable persons, but the process of reform is slow.

The lynching of criminal suspects by local inhabitants, especially in rural Jamaica, occurs periodically. Victims, typically, are those caught stealing crops or cattle or guilty of rape or housebreaking. Although these incidents are publicized, prosecutions of vigilantes are rare.

Prison conditions in Jamaica are acknowledged by the Government to be substandard. The Parliamentary Ombudsman reports conditions have further deteriorated since 1984, when he released a study on the deplorable state of facilities and the degrading conditions in the nation's jails. Overcrowding, lack of functioning plumbing facilities, and limited medical care are particularly bad in the island's two maximum security prisons. With government resources extremely limited, one citizens group began a fundraising campaign to aid the women's prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Suppression of Crime Act, which has been extended for 6-month intervals since its adoption in 1974, security forces do not need a warrant to detain persons "reasonably" suspected of having committed a crime. Although the Act is conceived of as an extraordinary measure, security forces rely on it extensively. Particularly in ghetto areas, detention of suspects without a warrant is regularly practiced. Nearly all detainees are eventually released without being charged. Some are held for as long as 2 weeks without being brought before a judicial officer as required by law. Habeas corpus is available, but many detainees are not aware of their rights.

JAMAICA

The Jamaica Council for Human Rights reports that 90 percent of its routine daily caseload involves assisting people attempting to locate and gain the release of detained family members. The Council reports that in 1985, under the administration of a new Police Commissioner, supervisory officers have been more cooperative than in the past in providing information about detained persons.

For those suspects who are charged, a functioning system of bail is available. In minor cases, bail is set by the local police supervisor, while a judicial officer is involved in more serious matters. For those unable to make bail, detention prior to a judicial hearing frequently exceeds the limits set by law. Outsiders are permitted access to the accused. There are no political prisoners in Jamaica.

Although the Constitution of Jamaica does not specifically address the matter of forced or compulsory labor, Jamaica is a signatory to the ILO convention prohibiting compulsory labor. There have been no allegations of this practice in Jamaica.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Jamaica has an independent judiciary. Persons who have been charged with a criminal offense have access to legal representation, and legal counsel is provided to indigents in criminal cases. The Court of Appeal and the Parliament may refer cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the United Kingdom. However, the legal system is overburdened, and many cases take years to come to trial.

In addition to the regular courts, there is also the Gun Court, which was established in 1974 as an extraordinary means of dealing with the serious problem of violent crime. It considers cases involving the illegal use or the possession of firearms or ammunition. There are restrictions on public attendance and less stringent rules of evidence apply in the Gun Court. Hearings are conducted before a judge. In capital cases, hearings before the Gun Court serve as preliminary hearings to jury trials under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The 1983 Gun Court Amendment Act eliminated several of the special exceptions to normal judicial rules and procedures which had applied to the Gun Court. A committee of senior judges continues to review and revise the sentences of persons given life terms prior to the adoption of the Gun Court Amendment Act.

Intimidation of witnesses in criminal cases is a chronic problem hampering criminal prosecutions in Jamaica. Jurors, too, have reported receiving threats from associates of criminal defendants. Some convictions have occurred for such attempts to subvert the judicial system, and the police have announced they will provide assistance to any witness who requests protection.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary intrusion by the State into the private life of the individual. Individual rights are protected, and there is no arbitrary monitoring of correspondence or telephones, or restrictions on the receipt of foreign publications.

JAMAICA

Under the Suppression of Crime Act, search warrants are not required to enter homes or business when a crime is "reasonably" suspected. This authority is sometimes abused by police, especially in ghetto neighborhoods. Regulations approved by Parliament in 1980 require that every effort be made by the security forces to have the owner or occupant of the premises present during the search.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are guaranteed in the Constitution and are observed in practice within the broad limits of the libel laws and the State Secrets Act. There is no censorship or interference in academic studies. Jamaica's principal, privately owned daily newspaper, The Daily Gleaner, has been critical of Jamaican governments through the years. Several small newspapers and magazines are also published, including two by the opposition parties, both of which are highly critical of government policies. Foreign publications are generally available.

The Government owns and operates one radio network and the island's only television network. The other radio network is partially owned by the Government. A new media policy announced by the Government will retain public ownership of television and partial ownership of radio, although some television time will be leased out. The officially owned television and radio network has often been accused of bias in favor of the Government by whichever party is in opposition.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are guaranteed in the Constitution. A large variety of professional groups and private associations function freely. Public demonstrations and rallies are staged by all political parties, although the law requires application for a police permit, which is usually granted. In January there were widespread but generally nonviolent public protests for 3 days over a 21 percent rise in the price of gasoline. Several deaths occurred during the protests. However, there were few arrests and the security forces were publicly praised for not overreacting to a difficult situation. In May, the People's National Party obtained a permit to demonstrate at the formal opening of Parliament. When party leaders announced at the last minute that the protest would be held instead at one of Kingston's busiest intersections, the police denied permission. When PNP supporters rallied at the new location without a permit, police dispersed the crowd with tear gas. There were no arrests. In November, police denied without explanation a request for a march permit for an antiapartheid demonstration in the New Kingston business district.

Freedom of association includes the right to join a trade union. The Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act of 1975 sets forth workers' rights regarding union membership and collective bargaining. No worker is compelled to join a union as a prerequisite for getting a job, nor, having found employment, is he compelled to join the union that represents that bargaining unit. Unions are free to elect their own representatives, draw up their constitutions, and determine their action programs. Jamaican unions are affiliated with various international and regional labor organizations.

Jamaica has several strong trade unions which are among the most active organizations in the country. The two major unions, the Bustamante Industrial Trade Union (BITU) and the National Workers Union (NWU), are affiliated respectively with the ruling Jamaica Labour Party and the opposition People's National Party. These two unions can act independently, however, and on occasion take issue with party policies. The number of registered trade unions is approximately 78; in practice, only about 20 are active. Until recently, approximately 25-30 percent of the work force was organized, although the Government's public sector reduction program has lowered this figure.

There is no right to strike in either common or statutory law. What exists in practice is a freedom to strike, which Jamaican workers have consistently exercised over the years. There have been differing legal rulings on the "right to strike." Workers may exercise their "freedom" to strike and be immune from criminal liability. There is, however, no parallel guarantee under the law that they will retain their jobs.

In June 1985, trade unions called on workers to strike in protest against the Government's public sector staff reductions and wage offers, spiraling costs for basic commodities, and insufficient communication by government officials with workers' representatives. After the strike a number of firefighters and public service company electric workers were dismissed. The firemen were later recalled, but the case of the electric workers is now before the Industrial Disputes Tribunal. The dismissals have sparked charges of victimization (politically motivated dismissal) by the unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and is well established in Jamaica. A great variety of religious groups and cults operate freely. More than 80 percent of the population professes one Christian denomination or another. Evangelical Christian movements have gained substantial followings in recent years, and foreign evangelists visit Jamaica regularly to preach.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees Jamaican citizens freedom of movement throughout the country, the right to reside in any part of it, the right to enter, and immunity from expulsion. There are no national restrictions on foreign travel or emigration. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

Jamaica's central location in the Caribbean makes it a potential hub for illegal migrants and would-be refugees or asylum seekers. Consequently, Jamaica has avoided any declarative policy on refugees. As a party to the 1951 U.N. Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, it honors its treaty obligations, dealing with refugees on a case-by-case basis. Jamaica's reasons for not accepting migrants are largely economic ones, and include high domestic unemployment.

JAMAICA

In recent years, individuals from Cuba, Haiti, and Nicaragua have arrived in Jamaica claiming to be refugees. Haitians have been treated as economic migrants and have been returned to Haiti. Six Cubans are currently in Jamaica under the protection of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees pending resettlement in a third country. All of the Nicaraguans have been permanently resettled in Jamaica and elsewhere.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In Jamaica, the Prime Minister, who is the leader of the majority party, and a cabinet made up of ministers appointed by him, constitute the executive power. The Executive usually takes the initiative in legislative matters and is responsible to the House of Representatives.

The Constitution requires that elections be held not later than 5 years from the first sitting of Parliament; within that period, the Prime Minister can call an election whenever he sees fit.

Two main parties, the Jamaica Labour Party (JLP) and People's National Party (PNP), have regularly alternated in power since the first elections under universal adult suffrage were held in 1944. The JLP came to power in November 1980 when it won a majority of seats in the House of Representatives. Other opposition groups, including the Communists, operate freely, and no group is denied participation in the political process.

In August 1983, voter registration was commenced to bring voting lists up to date and help protect the electoral process from fraud. In December 1983, prior to completion of this process, the Prime Minister called a "snap election." The PNP boycotted the vote, alleging that the JLP previously had agreed not to hold an election until new voter lists and identification cards were ready. As a result of the boycott and the failure of any of the seven third-party candidates to be elected to the House, there is currently no official Leader of the Opposition. As the elected House, composed of 60 seats, is now under exclusive control of the members of the JLP, Jamaica has a "one-party house" but is not a "one-party state." Although the 1983 election was constitutional and held in conformity with election law, the PNP has continued to question its legitimacy. The Government, however, continues to resist calls for new elections prior to the expiration of its current term in 1989.

Parliament has also acted to postpone local elections, originally due in June 1984. The delay has been due to disagreement over the number of possible Council seats. On October 16 the Electoral Advisory Commission announced that both major parties had accepted a reduction of Council seats from 278 to 189. Acceptance of the plan paved the way for the actual redrawing of local constituency boundaries and, ultimately, for local government elections. Current legislation extends the deadline for local elections until the end of July 1986.

Despite the unprecedented situation caused by a one-party Parliament, the democratic tradition remains strong in Jamaica. All parties operate freely and have an opportunity to state their positions. Eight independent senators, appointed by the Prime Minister in the absence of a parliamentary opposition, serve as a check on government actions.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There has been little interest among international or nongovernmental groups in investigating human rights in Jamaica. Freedom House rated Jamaica as "free." Amnesty International expressed concern in its 1985 report over the continued use of the death penalty.

There are no restrictions on human rights organizations in Jamaica. The Jamaica Council for Human Rights is the only independent human rights organization. The Council is critical of police abuses and has called for reform of the force. Its small paid staff spends the majority of its time on cases involving police detention of suspects and on complaints from prisoners. Its pool of volunteer attorneys frequently represents those appealing death sentences. The Council is also involved in international human rights issues, particularly those dealing with southern Africa.

The Government is also a strong advocate of human rights in international forums, such as Caricom and the UN. Jamaican leaders, including the present Prime Minister, have spoken before regional and other international bodies in opposition to apartheid.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Jamaica's population of 2,266,000 grew at an annual rate of 1 percent in 1985, and the per capita gross national product was $1,300 (1983 figure).

While revenues from bauxite/alumina exports, the traditional foreign exchange earner, increased during 1984, earnings fell sharply in 1985 due to the closure of one mining/refining facility and the temporary closure of another because of weak markets. Receipts from tourism also fell. Real gross domestic product fell by 8.4 percent in 1984; inflation went up by 31.3 percent, a significant increase over the 16.7 percent figure recorded in 1983. The unemployment rate fell marginally from 25.6 percent in April 1984 to 25.4 percent in October 1984.

The shortage of foreign exchange and budget cuts have left the Government with fewer resources to deal with pressing economic and social problems. It has therefore given priority to maintaining the flow of raw materials and capital goods needed to support Jamaica's private sector-oriented recovery program. The import licensing regime has been abolished for all but a few items and replaced with higher customs duties, prices of most items under price controls have been deregulated, and a 50 percent depreciation of the local currency took place in 1984. The Government has tried to limit the impact of these measures on the basic nutrition of the poor through the establishment of a food security plan which included food stamps and school lunch programs.

There are wide disparities in income levels. In October, 1984, the unemployment rate for males was 16 percent, while that for females was more than 36 percent. Rates for young men and women were considerably higher. The Government sought to reduce some of these disparities through a major agriculture program designed to increase production and employment in rural areas, job training programs for youth, and programs to assist individuals in starting their own businesses.

The adult literacy rate in Jamaica is officially 96.1 percent, but the Minister of Education stated in 1985 that the functional illiteracy rate was nearly 50 percent. There is nearly universal primary school enrollment, but attendance has suffered recently as more parents cannot afford to send their children to school. Jamaica's educational system is free, but families must provide most school books and uniforms for the students.

Under the Government's austerity program, access to education, housing, health care, and other services for the low income groups has been reduced due to cuts in budget expenditures. In the health care area, a proposal to introduce "user fees" at primary health clinics was dropped following public opposition.

A minimum wage law was enacted in 1975. Government and most private sector employees work a 5-day/40-hour week. While there is no statutory provision for overtime payments, unions seek overtime and holiday pay benefits in their collective bargaining agreements. Statutory provision for leave with pay covers vacation, public holidays, sick leave, and maternity leave.

A juvenile act provides that no child under age 12 shall be employed except by parents or guardians. Such employment can only be in domestic, agricultural, or horticultural work. Children under age 12 cannot be employed at night or at any industrial site. In actuality, children under age 12 are often seen peddling goods and services on the streets.

Under the Factories Act, all plants must be registered and approved by the Ministry of Labour (MOL) before they can begin operations. The MOL's industrial safety division is responsible for, at minimum, yearly inspections of all facilities. Because of budget constraints, these site inspections are often not performed. The MOL has no authority to oversee private sector work sites and other places of employment which do not meet the statutory definition of a factory. Other Acts of Parliament establish minimum standards for working conditions. It is left to management, in consultation with workers or their representatives, to negotiate improvements in these standards. Industrial health and safety precautions and education are seriously lacking in Jamaica.

Jamaican women are accorded full equality under the Constitution, and the 1975 Employment Act guarantees them equal pay for equal work. The legal status of women is reflected in the number of influential positions they hold in the civil service and the Government, including Minister of Education, Director of the Jamaica Information Service, and President of the Senate. Nevertheless, because of cultural and social values, women often suffer economic discrimination. This discrimination frequently evidences itself in hiring practices. Access to higher paying jobs and positions outside traditional "female" areas is limited. The higher paying senior-level positions in business and commercial areas are still predominantly held by men. The 1975 Act has helped to narrow the gap between men's and women's salaries, but disparities remain.

The Government has a number of programs to help women with the problems they face: primary health care clinics for mothers and their children; education programs in family planning, population, and family life; a special food stamp program for pregnant and lactating women and women whose income is below a specified minimum amount; agricultural and technical training projects and centers to provide continuing education for pregnant women. The Government has created a national advisory committee for women's affairs. Family law reforms based on a report from the Family Law Committee set up in 1975 have not yet been acted upon by Parliament.

Jamaica participated actively in the 1985 end-of-decade Conference on Women held in Nairobi. Not only was there an official delegation of 10 members, but Jamaican women also took part in the Nongovernmental Organizations meeting held in conjunction with the conference. The current President of the Inter-American Commission for Women, Princess Lawes, is a Member of Parliament.

MEXICO

Mexico is a Federal Republic which has been governed by the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) since 1929. The Constitution of 1917 provides for the separation of powers among a bicameral legislature, a judiciary, and an executive, but the powers of the presidency far outweigh those of the other branches in Mexico's highly centralized system.

The PRI dominates politics at the federal and state levels. Opposition parties, viewed by the Government as outlets for criticism and dissatisfaction, have been able to make some inroads on the municipal level. Opposition strength, especially that of the conservative National Action Party (PAN), is growing but has yet to challenge the PRI successfully on the state level, let alone for the presidency. Most opposition party opportunities have been thwarted by nation-wide PRI voting strength and organizational power, by maneuvers to divide the opposition, extensive public patronage, and, the opposition claims, by continuing electoral fraud. In the July 1985 gubernatorial elections, the PAN mounted particularly strong campaigns in the northern states of Nuevo Leon and Sonora. According to official Government election returns, the PRI won substantial victories in both states. The opposition and many journalists asserted that massive fraud took place in the elections. Others, however, asserted that attractive PRI candidates, hard campaigning, and PAN failure to get out its vote were determining factors. Nationwide, the PAN won eight out of 300 Deputy seats in the single-member constituencies. In addition, opposition parties split the 100 seats reserved for them in the Chamber of Deputies.

Mexico is an urbanized country with a sizeable and modern industrial sector. There are also large peasant and indigenous populations in the rural areas which continue greatly to rely on manual labor. The pattern of income distribution is severely uneven.

In 1985 human rights organizations continued to express concern over the fate of Mexico's "disappeared" and to make allegations concerning arbitrary arrests, especially of members of opposition parties, unions independent of the PRI, and peasant organizations. The National Committee in Defense of Prisoners, Persecuted, Disappeared, and Political Exiles in Mexico currently estimates there are 475 Mexicans who have disappeared since 1969 and whose whereabouts are unknown. The Committee states that 11 of them have disappeared during the current administration. The Committee charges that all of those unaccounted for are being held clandestinely in government prisons, a charge which the Government denies. The Committee also currently alleges the existence of 140 political prisoners who have been arrested during the current administration and remain in jail; the vast majority are peasants involved in land disputes.

Concern over alleged use of torture by police reached a peak in the aftermath of the September earthquakes which destroyed the Mexico City Attorney General's building. A number of bodies, both Mexican and Colombian, were found, allegedly bearing signs of torture. Though this was officially denied, by the end of the year the Senate had passed an anti-torture bill, the Attorney General of the Republic had admitted that Mexican police had used torture in some instances but that torture was not "institutionalized," and the Mexico City

Attorney General had been replaced. Her successor had publicly stated that "bad public officials" had been responsible for torture in the past and promised to eliminate such practices. A number of deaths have also taken place, especially in the rural sector in disputes over land. The Federal Government continues efforts to curb misuse of political authority; local leaders on the municipal level, however, especially those involved with influential private landowners, allegedly place a low priority on the protection of human rights, and abuses appear to stem largely from that sector.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The investigation into the 1982 Tula River killings, reopened last year, is continuing. During 1985, some members of the former Division of Investigation for the Prevention of Delinquency (DIPD), the main body implicated in the killings, were interrogated. Of those members for whom arrest warrants have been issued, many remain fugitives, but at least four have been arrested and are in jail pending completion of the investigation. On November 18, a former Commander of the DIPD, also in prison in connection with the Tula River killings, was found dead in his cell in the Reclusorio Oriente, an apparent suicide. In addition, three members of the former Federal Security Directorate (DFS), for whom warrants also are outstanding, remain fugitives. The former Director of the Federal and Transit Police, on whose instructions, according to testimony, the killings took place, is currently awaiting extradition from the United States.

Peasant organizations charged that, during 1985, at least 21 peasants were killed in confrontations in the states of Chiapas, Veracruz, Hidalgo, Sonora, Oaxaca, Puebla, and Guanajuato. Such charges have come not only from independent peasant organizations such as the Independent Center of Agricultural Workers and Peasants (CIOAC) and the National Coordinator for the Plan of Ayala (CNPA) among others, but also from the PRI-affiliated National Confederation of Peasants (CNC). The independent groups attribute the killings to paramilitary bands supported by local landowners (caciques) as well as to members of the CNC, and to local police. For its part, the CNC attributes fatalities in its ranks to members of the independent unions, encouraged, they say, by leftist political activists. Others, however, suggest that for the most part CNC members who have been killed were victims of internal CNC struggles.

A major incident in 1985 involved the killing of Alejandro Cardenas Peralta, a Unified Socialist Party of Mexico (PSUM) Federal Deputy, on February 27 in Oaxaca. The PSUM accused an agent of the State Attorney General and two agents of the State Judicial Police in Oaxaca of having carried out the murder. Other allegations are that his opposition to a tourist project which would have entailed expropriation of communal lands was a factor in his murder. An investigation has been ordered, but its results, if any, have not been made public and no arrests have been made.

MEXICO

Representatives of the peasant organization Campesinos Unidos de la Sierra Oriental (CUSO) in the states of Hidalgo and Veracruz charged in 1985 that powerful landowners' interests are being protected by local judicial police. They have alleged that such activities have resulted in the murder of 20 peasants and they have asked the Governor of Hidalgo to order an investigation. Peasant organizations in Oaxaca have charged that large local landowners, with the complicity of local authorities, have been able to carry out campaigns of murder, intimidation, and attacks on their members. The Triquis, an indigenous group which is concentrated in Oaxaca, claim they have been singled out as a target of such tactics, and have accused the Governor of Oaxaca of complicity.

Amnesty International has continued its investigations into incidents along the Mexican-Guatemalan border in which Guatemalan refugees were killed in 1984. In January 1985 the Mexican Government gave assurances to Amnesty International that the Government will continue to provide its traditional protection and relief to all refugees. The Government works in close cooperation with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees to achieve these ends, but some refugees continue to allege mistreatment, at the hands of not only Guatemalan forces but also the Mexican security forces.

The Committee in Defense of Prisoners, Persecuted, Disappeared, and Political Exiles of Mexico, led by Federal Deputy and Revolutionary Workers Party (PRT) 1982 presidential candidate Rosario Ibarra de Piedra, continued to press the Government for information on the fate of Mexico's disappeared. Alleging a total of 475 disappearances since 1969, including eleven during the current Administration, the Committee continues to charge that the disappeared are being held in a variety of clandestine, government-controlled prisons, where they are subject to torture. It supports these claims with reports by other human rights groups, news reports, and letters smuggled out of prison. The Government, in formal reports and interviews, steadfastly denies the existence of any such prisons, as well as involvement in the disappearance of individuals, and states that those unaccounted for were killed in encounters with security forces, changed their names and went underground, or voluntarily went into exile. In reference to the eleven specific cases, there are indications the Government has made some efforts to determine the whereabouts of the missing but to date has not been able to resolve the cases.

In February 1985 U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Enrique Camarena and his Mexican pilot were kidnapped in Guadalajara and subsequently killed. The crime involved a gang of narcotics traffickers, as well as local and state police, some of whom have been arrested during the investigation of the killings. The investigation itself is continuing and the trial is expected to take place by mid-1986.

In January 1985 an American citizen doing research for a book on drug-trafficking in Mexico and a friend disappeared in Guadalajara. Their bodies were discovered months later. It appears that at least some of the individuals implicated in the Camarena case were involved in these murders as well.

MEXICO

In December 1984 four Jehovah's Witnesses missionaries disappeared in Guadalajara. They are still missing. Investigations are continuing. Their disappearance while conducting door-to-door missionary work may be related to inadvertent contact with drug traffickers.

The UN Human Rights Commission's Working Group on enforced and involuntary disappearances considered evidence presented by Mexico at the 39th session of the Commission. At that time, Mexico was removed from the list of countries considered by the Working Group.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture is prohibited by the Constitution, human rights organizations have charged that the police have tortured both political prisoners and those arrested for common crimes with electric shocks, often applied to the genitals; beatings; deprivation of light, food, and water; exposure to the elements for long periods; and other means. During 1985 two American citizens arrested on narcotics trafficking charges filed complaints of various abuses during their arrest, interrogation, and imprisonment. In response to these allegations the Government has initiated an investigation.

Rosario Ibarra de Piedra alleges that the Oaxaca State Government has tortured members of the Coalition of Workers, Peasants, and Students of the Isthmus (COCEI). On April 13, the PAN municipal head of Zimol, Chiapas, Roberto Alfonso Ruiz, accused Chiapas State officials of arresting and torturing peasants on a regular basis, naming the State Attorney General as culpable. Following the July-September occupation by members of the National Action Party (PAN) of the City Hall in Agua Prieta, Sonora, in protest of the July election results, the PAN National Executive Committee alleged that 16 of its 21 arrested activists had been tortured while in custody.

In August the magazine "Proceso" published an open letter from six prisoners held in the Reclusorio Oriente, a prison in the Federal District, asserting that they had been repeatedly tortured with electric shocks to their genitals to extract spurious confessions on various crimes. They alleged that the real motive for their mistreatment was their membership in the Popular Tacuba, a party of workers and peasants. The Government states that the prisoners' allegations of mistreatment are simply a means to escape punishment and that they are guilty of the charges made against them, and it denies that their confessions were coerced.

In the aftermath of the severe earthquakes in Mexico City which occurred in September and destroyed the Federal District Attorney General's office building, the local press reported that the bodies of four Colombian prisoners were found, bearing signs of torture. The discovery sparked inquiries from the Colombian Government, as well as other governments providing disaster relief. Also found in the structure was the body of a criminal lawyer, Saul Ocampo, which reportedly showed signs of beating and asphyxiation. Ocampo had disappeared a week before the earthquake, on September 13. The then Attorney General for the Federal District denied before the Justice Commission of the Federal Chamber of Deputies that the Colombians had been tortured, and she presented forensic statements that injuries and deaths were caused by the collapse of the building itself, though she admitted the Colombians had been arrested without warrants. On December 3, the Attorney General of the Republic admitted that police had tortured detainees in Mexico, although he emphasized that the practice was not "institutionalized." Media editorial comment on his statement was critical, observing that torture had become an established method of police investigation, based on inefficiency, corruption and lack of democratic controls on police bodies. On December 26, the Federal District Attorney General resigned after being named a Supreme Court Justice by President de la Madrid. Her successor stated in his first press conference that no attorney general had ever ordered police to conduct torture. He said, however, that some bad public officials had engaged in torture, and vowed to eliminate any such practices.

The Government's official position is that in the rare circumstances where torture occurs it is not officially condoned. However, on September 18, following allegations of torture of the Colombian detainees, the newly formed Senate Commission on Human Rights held a press conference to announce its drafting of a bill which, augmenting constitutional prohibitions against torture, would specifically prohibit the practice, as well as providing punishment for officials engaging in torture. In response to a question whether the Committee's position was a tacit acceptance that torture exists in Mexico, the Committee responded affirmatively.

The de la Madrid Administration, in apparent response to continuing allegations of torture by law enforcement officials, has conducted new recruitment into the various police forces and has emphasized education and training in legitimate investigative skills.

Prisons are overcrowded, and there are complaints about lack of trained personnel, a high turnover both in staff and administration, and mistreatment of prisoners which is related to corruption of prison officials. Since the current Administration took office, reforms have been carried out in the prisons of the Federal District, where two new prisons are under construction. In some other parts of Mexico, overcrowding has in a few instances been somewhat alleviated by new prison construction, but in actuality little appears to have been done to remedy the poor conditions outside the Federal District.

In March 1985 Mexico signed the U.N. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the Mexican Senate gave its consent to ratification of the Convention in December. President de la Madrid signed the formal instrument of ratification on January 20, 1986.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Leaders of peasant organizations and unions outside the framework of the PRI, as well as opposition party activists, claim that the police frequently make arbitrary arrests which result in extended periods of detention.

Allegations have appeared in the Mexican press that during a February demonstration of peasants in Tuxtla Gutierrez,

MEXICO

Chiapas, local police were responsible for killing one demonstrator, injuring 154, and arresting six. The Catholic Bishop of San Cristobal de las Casas, Samuel Ruiz, asserted that there has been a deliberate increase in the number of incidents of arbitrary arrest, harassment, and other repressive measures being taken against peasants in Chiapas on the part of state authorities.

Representatives of Campesinos Unidos de la Sierra Oriental (CUSO) in the States of Hidalgo and Veracruz have demanded a state investigation into the continued detention of twelve peasants in Pachuca. The press reported in March that a peaceful demonstration of the Unidad Obrero Campesino Popular (UOCP) in front of the Secretariat of the Interior was violently suppressed by police; one person was killed and another was arbitrarily arrested. In protest, the UOCP first staged a hunger strike and then seized the Greek and Dutch Embassies in Mexico City for a brief period of time.

Amnesty International has adopted as prisoners of conscience four members of the Coalition of Workers, Peasants, and Students of the Isthmus (COCEI), including one of its founders, Leopoldo de Gyves Pineda, who have been in prison since December 1983. The four have been charged with offenses against the public order, illegal carrying of arms, and incitement to riot. The COCEI claims that the charges are politically motivated, following the forcible ousting of the PSUM/COCEI municipal government of Juchitan, Oaxaca, in July, 1983. (The PSUM/COCEI coalition had won the 1981 election).

Practically all opposition parties have lodged charges of arbitrary arrest against PRI-controlled local authorities. In Tamaulipas, both the PSUM and the PAN claim that the police are harassing and arresting opposition leaders solely on the basis of their political views. The PAN alleges that four of its members were held in jail for 20 days in January 1985 without any charges before finally securing release. In the Yucatan, the PAN reported that 11 PAN members in the town of Peto were arrested in April for their political activities, and that four of the group were held for 60 days before their release. Peasants marched in Oaxaca in April to protest the detention of thirty-three peasants whom they termed political prisoners.

Jose Francisco Velazquez, President of the Bar Association in Mexico State, asserted in an address on April 17, 1985, that fully 40 percent of the prisoners held in the State of Mexico are innocent of all charges, and that torture and kidnappings characterize police methods there. He demanded that the Government either formally charge all prisoners and bring them to trial, or release them. In response, the Assistant Attorney General for the state denied that prisoners are being mistreated or arrested without cause. According to press accounts, the state Attorney General's own records show that, though there were over 7,500 detainees in 1984, only 1,914 orders of detention had been issued.

The Mexican Senate has approved a change in the criminal code preventing any "unregistered" arrests by the judicial police. The new section of the law Article 197, requires that those arrested be brought before a judge from the moment they are placed in a holding cell and that the arrest be immediately registered. Supervisors of holding cells will be required to note the date and time the prisoner is brought in.

MEXICO

There are legal prohibitions against forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under the Constitution, trial and sentencing must be completed within 12 months of arrest for crimes that would carry at least a 2-year sentence. Despite efforts at reform, this standard is often not met because of delays caused by cumbersome court procedures, backlogs of cases, and the defendants' inability or unwillingness to pay bribes to bring their case to trial. Especially in the criminal field, lack of judicial independence and low pay for judges combine with procedural inflexibility and an overburdened bench to weaken a judicial system which is highly advanced in many respects, and make it vulnerable to corruption.

Allegations have been made by the political opposition that the failure to bring to trial detained peasant activists, independent union members, and those in the political opposition is politically motivated. All judges are placed in position via renewable appointments made by the President, State Governors and the head of the Federal District, as the post dictates. The political opposition alleges that the judiciary is not independent of the Executive Branch of Government, especially where the opposition has sought legal recourse to combat purported electoral fraud.

Defendants have a right to counsel and public defenders are available. Although certain sections of the criminal code provide for the convoking of tribunals with juries, in practice this almost never takes place. In most cases, a judge, generally acting alone, examines written statements, expert opinion and, less commonly, oral testimony and then renders his verdict.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although the Mexican Government generally does not intrude on the privacy of individuals, and search warrants are required by law, Mexican human rights activists and members of the political opposition have complained that they are followed by the police and their telephone lines are tapped. Members of independent workers' and peasants' organizations, particularly in the northern states, say they have been frequent targets of these practices. There have also been charges of invasions of peasants' homes by local landowners accompanied by police without warrants, and allegations that these incidents sometimes involved robbery, rape, and the burning of homes. Urban squatters allegedly have been similarly victimized.

Section 2 Respect For Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and of the press are guaranteed by law. The Government is tolerating more direct public criticism, and bolder press articles have appeared. Certain topics, such as direct criticism of the President and the military, have traditionally been avoided by the media. Mexico's press is a primary source for reporting allegations of human rights violations, and although there continue to be instances where reports of violations are not carried, the coverage generally speaks positively for press efforts in this area.

MEXICO

Despite the trend towards press liberalization, in March the political magazine "Contenido" had to stop publication, allegedly because of government warnings that its political coverage was offensive and dangerous to the public interest. Notable among the articles in the last issue was extensive coverage of former President Jose Lopez Portillo, alleging that he had profited personally from his term in office.

Press sources report that the Administration influences the press by giving financial supplements to individual reporters for favorable articles, by withholding newsprint and ink (government monopolies) from critical papers, and, more significantly, by selectively placing government advertising, an important source of income for the press. Some payments to journalists have reportedly been reinstated by the de la Madrid Administration, after having been suspended following the Administration's entry into office. In some cases, the payments are indirect, as when a journalist receives a percentage of the advertising sold to the entities which he covers. Opposition parties and some journalists have publicly accused the PRI's Office of Information of making large payments directly to other journalists. They say that this explains the reduction in direct government subsidies to journalists.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution grants the right to peaceful assembly for any lawful purpose throughout the country, but a government permit is generally required for major demonstrations. Within the Federal District, opposition political groups, as well as peasant and indigenous organizations, are allowed frequent access to both main boulevards and the city's large central square for demonstrations. However, various opposition groups have alleged that peaceful demonstrations were broken up by police and security forces, and some participants have been assaulted and arrested. The Government generally defends its tactics by asserting that the demonstrators pose a threat to public order.

Basic trade union, worker, and employer rights are protected under Mexican law, and most, such as the right of workers to organize trade unions, to bargain collectively, and to strike, are guaranteed in Article 123 of the Constitution.

Mexico has a multiplicity of trade union organizations, most but not all of which are affiliated with the PRI. By far the largest of these are the CTM, or Confederation of Workers of Mexico, and the FSTSE, or Federation of Government Workers Unions, which includes most government workers. The CTM and FSTSE, along with various much smaller confederations and various independent but PRI-affiliated unions which are outside any trade union confederation, all belong to a loose umbrella labor organization known as the Congress of Labor. There are also a number of independent unions outside of the Congress of Labor, some with a conservative orientation, and others of a pronounced leftist, Communist, or radical orientation. Some independent unions continued to complain of occasional harassment from bodies associated with the PRI, but these complaints appear to have declined significantly during 1985. The majority of organized peasants belong to the National Conference of Peasants (CNC), an organization also affiliated with the PRI.

MEXICO

Unions in Mexico are permitted to affiliate and maintain relations with recognized international trade union and labor bodies. The CTM is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in Brussels, and is a leading member of the democratic ICFTU's Interamerican Regional Organization of Workers, the ORIT, headquartered in Mexico City.

A number of CTM unions and occasional independent Mexican unions are also affiliated with various international trade secretariats. The CTM also always provides the Mexican Worker delegate to the International Labor Organization (ILO). The Communist World Federation of Trade Unions' regional interamerican organization is permitted by the Mexican Government to maintain its own headquarters in Mexico City, although the regional group reportedly has only one small Mexican affiliate.

c. Freedom of Religion

Under the Constitution, individuals are free to practice the religion of their choice; however, no religious body has legal standing. The clergy is prohibited from participating in politics, voting, owning real estate, or wearing religious habits in public. Some of these prohibitions are not strictly enforced; neither is a constitutional restriction against pre-university religious schools, many of which exist. In practice, the hierarchy of the Catholic Church in Mexico maintains a close liaison with the Government. Although Mexico is predominantly Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish communities also exist.

Protestant Evangelists, especially from outside Mexico, are active and are especially successful in certain rural, largely indigenous communities. Some critics have stated that the Government is selectively enforcing the anti-clerical laws in favor of the predominant Roman Catholic Church. Other critics have asserted that, in some outlying areas, the laws are not being enforced against the evangelists, so as to reduce the influence of the Catholic Church.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within and outside the country is unrestricted, except for some areas along the Guatemalan border which have been closed to the public by the military.

Mexico has in the past traditionally followed a liberal asylum policy and its borders have been open to Central Americans fleeing from their countries. During the past year, there has been some attempt to control these entries without closing the southern border. The process of relocating the refugee camps from the border to the Yucatan Peninsula has continued, with the Government asserting that the purpose of the move is to protect the refugees and improve their living conditions. However, critics have charged that the real motivation is to discourage additional refugees from coming. According to the Mexico City office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), there were 39,600 Guatemalan refugees situated in Mexico's southeast region as of December 1985. Estimates of displaced Salvadorans in Mexico continue to be unavailable from the Mexican Government. The UNHCR will not estimate the total number of Salvadorans present in Mexico, limiting itself to stating that the number of refugees assisted by the office in 1985 was 2,300, of whom 70 percent were Salvadoran.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Mexico has been governed since 1929 by the PRI, the dominant party. To secure its continuance in power, the PRI has relied on revolutionary legitimacy, cooption of the opposition, extensive public patronage, massive government and PRI organizational resources and -- opposition parties charge -- electoral fraud in some cases. The PRI has broad representation from labor, peasants, and other sectors of society. Opposition parties have been able to make some inroads, especially among the peasants and the middle class. President de la Madrid, in all three of his Annual Reports to the Nation, emphasized his commitment to political pluralism in Mexico. In the second address, he pointed to the registration of two additional opposition parties, the Authentic Party of the Mexican Revolution (PARM) and the Mexican Workers Party (PMT). Critics have observed, however, that it is in the interest of the PRI to keep the opposition fragmented. They also charge that the PARM joins the ranks of other so-called opposition parties, such as the Popular Socialist Party (PPS), which generally support the PRI.

The President of the Republic and Senators are elected concurrently for one six-year term. The Lower House is elected for a three-year term, once during the elections for President and thereafter mid-way through the presidential term. State Governors are elected for six-year terms, with elections staggered in the various states throughout the course of the presidential term. Members of the unicameral state legislatures and all mayors are elected for three-year terms and these elections are also staggered throughout the President's term.

Before the July 1985 gubernatorial elections, the opposition asserted that the results in states with a developed opposition, particularly Sonora and Nuevo Leon, would represent a test of the PRI's commitment to political pluralism. The PRI's victories in both states' gubernatorial contests raised the possibility of electoral fraud. However, it is also true that, in response to the PAN's expected strong showing, the PRI fielded more attractive and aggressive candidates than it has in some time, and campaigned harder.

Previous allegations of the Government's refusal to recognize claimed opposition victories included the November 1984 municipal election in Chemax, Yucatan. The opposition PAN had refused to accept the PRI municipal government which, it said, was being illegally imposed. Appeals to the state legislature did not result in resolution, and periodic protests continued through June 1985; in March, a violent confrontation between PRI and PAN supporters resulted in the death of one PAN supporter.

Opposition parties are guaranteed access to public media and seats in State and Federal legislatures are reserved for them.

MEXICO

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government participates in international human rights forums and allows both domestic and international human rights groups to operate in Mexico without restrictions or harassment. Various ranking Mexican officials have met with representatives of Amnesty International; the National Committee in Defense of Prisoners, Persecuted, Disappeared, and Political Exiles in Mexico; the U.N. Human Rights Commission; and other concerned organizations and their representatives to discuss allegations and share results of government investigations of reports of human rights violations. Amnesty International has an office in Mexico.

Mexico is an active member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission, and during 1985 reported to the Commission on 75 cases of disappeared persons, providing information on 73 of the cases. As a consequence of the Mexican Government's investigations into allegations of disappearances and torture, the Commission is not continuing to investigate those allegations, proclaiming the Mexican Government to be in accord with the standards by which the Commission is guided. The Mexican Government has pledged continued close cooperation with and responsiveness to the Commission, as well as other international monitoring organizations. In March, Mexico signed the United Nations International Convention Against Torture, which commits it against the use of torture, as well as to periodic reporting by representatives of the Committee Against Torture. President de la Madrid signed the formal instrument of ratification on January 20, 1986.

Amnesty International 1985 Report, which covered calendar year 1984, was concerned mainly with arbitrary arrest and prolonged incommunicado imprisonment of political prisoners, sentences based on confessions allegedly extracted under torture and ill-treatment, and disappearances. Amnesty International was also concerned about information on the arbitrary arrest and murder of members of rural communities and Indian groups, in some cases alleged to have been carried out directly by members of the official security forces, and in others by armed civilians who seemed to be acting in concert with the former. Freedom House ranks Mexico "partly free".

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mexico's population in 1985 is estimated at 78.6 million and its population growth rate stands at 2.3 percent. The gross national product per capita was $2,350 in 1984.

Mexico's major domestic economic and social problems are poverty, inflation, generally depressed levels of economic activity since 1981, unemployment, underemployment and severely uneven income distribution. These problems have been exacerbated by the effects of the earthquakes in September 1985. The Government maintains its right to regulate many private economic activities in the public interest. Restrictions regarding the ownership of property by foreigners generally limit foreign equity participation to 49 percent.

Mexico has become an urbanized society, with 67 percent of the population living in cities as of 1980. Around 18 million people live in the Mexico City metropolitan area. Life expectancy at birth is 66.4 years and the infant mortality rate is 42.3 per 1000 live births. The primary school enrollment ratio was 121.1 percent in 1981 (male 122.7 and female 119.5). Primary education is both free and obligatory and has been extended to 10 years of schooling. Adult literacy as of 1980 stood at 83 percent. As of 1981, 58 percent of the population had access to safe water (urban, 61 percent and rural, 51 percent). The average caloric supply as a percent of requirement was 117 percent in 1977. There is no discrimination based on race, religion, sex, ethnic background or political opinion in the availability of food, shelter, health care, and education. The Mexican Government's figures show that unemployment is 8.0 to 8.5 percent. Underemployment has been estimated by many observers at 30 to 40 percent for several years.

Mexican law sets the minimum age for the employment of children at 14 years; children over 14 but under 16 years of age may work but are subject to special legal protections and shorter working hours than adults and cannot be employed in certain jobs. The law also provides for a minimum wage which is revised semi-annually, a maximum legal work week of 48 hours with a maximum work day of eight hours. Extensive regulations pertaining to occupational health and safety also exist. Child labor laws in Mexico are observed fairly strictly in medium-size and large manufacturing and commercial establishments, but less so in small shops and in such occupations as that of street vendor, where child labor is hard to control. Industrial safety laws are less frequently observed in practice, particularly in the heavy industrial sector and in the construction industry.

Men and women are equal in principle under the law. Mexican women have the right to file for divorce and separation. There are no travel restrictions on women and they can own property in their own names. Over the past ten years, women have increased their presence in non-traditional occupations. Although the concept of women as mothers and homemakers continues to dominate, the number of women's action groups is increasing and it appears that the objectives of women are becoming more diversified. Women comprise approximately 26 percent of the work force in urban areas but continue to work predominantly in nonsupervisory jobs with few at the executive level. However, a woman is now Secretary-General of the dominant political party. As the result of an appointment to fill a vacancy, the number of women in the 1982-1988 Senate has increased from six to seven of 64 Senators; of the 400 Federal Deputies elected in 1985 to the 53rd legislature, 43 are women (an increase of eight from the 52nd legislature).

NICARAGUA

In January 1985, the Junta of National Reconstruction (which had run the Nicaraguan Government since the 1979 revolution that overthrew the Somoza dictatorship) was terminated with the inauguration of President Daniel Ortega Saavedra and Vice President Sergio Ramirez and the swearing-in of a 96-member National Assembly. Real political power nevertheless continued to be wielded by the National Directorate of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), the Front's nine Marxist leaders who conceive and implement policies through an interlocking party-government structure. Intimidation and the restriction of basic human rights were significant factors in the largely successful consolidation of power by the Sandinista Front over the preceding five years. Though elections were held on November 4, 1984, important sectors of the political opposition declined to participate because of the Government's failure to establish the conditions necessary for a fair and free campaign.

During 1985, the Sandinistas increased markedly their intimidation of the Church and the civic opposition and their control of the society. The basic instruments of internal control, the police and state security organizations, fall under the control of the Ministry of the Interior. Using these agencies, the Sandinistas are able to enforce adherence to the standards of political conformity imposed by the FSLN through the power of arbitrary arrest, interrogation, and imprisonment.

The Nicaraguan economy is heavily agricultural. Its small industrial sector, weakened during the 1978-79 revolution, continues to deteriorate under Sandinista economic policies. The Government controls the distribution of foodstuffs, and even basic staples are subject to rationing. Politically-motivated expropriations, the increasingly state-managed economy, heavy military expenditures (accounting for an estimated 60 percent of the budget), and often capricious implementation of agrarian reform have substantially decreased living standards in the country.

The civil war continued throughout 1985, with heavy combat in the northern region causing casualties to civilians and extensive damage to economic infrastructure. Human rights organizations charged both sides with serious human rights abuses. Government security forces reportedly tortured and executed persons suspected of assisting the guerrillas, while the Government accused the guerrillas of killing, torturing, and kidnapping civilians. The Sandinista Army continued military impressment, conducting sweeps of public facilities and forcibly removing youths as young as twelve. Although the Government claims that conscientious objection to military service is permitted, it is not provided for in the law. On October 15, the Government reinstated and broadened the 1982 State of Emergency restrictions on civil rights and liberties originally provided in 1979 by the National Junta of Reconstruction in "The Statute of Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguan Citizens." Under the new decree many rights concerning arrest, trial, detention, speech, assembly, privacy and association were abolished. In effect, however, the latest suspension of civil liberties merely legalized various government activities that in practice had already been underway.

NICARAGUA

Beginning in mid-1985, government officials and entities began to increase and personalize public attacks on business, church, professional and opposition political leaders. Intimidating interrogations of such leaders, searches of houses and the confiscation of offices and publications occurred in the late fall. The Government continued to use an array of control techniques: political tribunals established outside the judicial system to try cases of suspected subversives, mass organizations controlled by the Sandinistas to help implement their policies and to instill loyalty and sanction opponents, and prior censorship of the print and electronic media to silence opposition.

The two domestic human rights organizations in Nicaragua which are independent of the Government were subject to constant harassment by the Sandinistas during 1985.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Ample evidence exists of a number of politically-motivated killings during 1985. The independent Permanent Human Rights Commission (Spanish acronym CPDH) received thirteen substantiated cases during the year of political killings committed by government authorities, and several more complaints in which government involvement was suspected. In one of the cases reported to CPDH in 1985, a Sandinista soldier took a Social Democratic Party member from his house. As soon as the family reported him as missing to CPDH, the Ministry of Defense issued a communique stating that a resistance leader by the same name had been killed in combat in November. The Social Christian Party called for, but did not receive, an official explanation for the death of a 17-year-old member whose decomposing corpse was discovered a few days after he was taken into police custody, apparently during a Government conscription round-up. In another case reported to CPDH, a Cuban military advisor indiscriminately opened fire on a group of Nicaraguans attending a party, killing three and injuring others. The Cuban was not prosecuted and Ministry of Interior officials reportedly attempted to bribe witnesses not to report the incident. Local newspapers announced that several Sandinista soldiers had been court-martialed for abuses in the field, but neither the trials nor the sentencing in such cases are open to public review. In one case, CPDH states that it has proof that the person convicted was sent to Bulgaria for study rather than serving out his term.

CPDH further alleges that, out of fear of reprisals, the majority of government political killings go unreported. In a May 12, 1984, letter to the Organization of American States (OAS) Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC), CPDH maintained it had evidence of an increase in the number of unexplained deaths. From 1981 to 1984, CPDH received 97 complaints of deaths attributable to identified civil and military authorities. In each case, after brief detention, the prisoners reportedly died "during attempts to escape," "in combat with army troops," "from heart attack," or under other circumstances CPDH found suspicious. CPDH brought all 97 cases to the attention of the Nicaraguan Government, but no investigations are known to have been conducted nor official explanations offered. In some cases, the families of the victims have themselves received death threats from government officials for making inquiries. CPDH findings of governmental involvement in political killings have been confirmed by a number of sources, among them former employees of the government-sponsored human rights commission and the Ministry of Interior.

One defector, Lt. Alvaro Baldizon, served as Chief Investigator of the Special Investigations Commission of the Ministry of Interior, established by the Ministry in early 1983 in response to mounting inquiries from international human rights organizations concerning reported government abuses. In 1985, Baldizon revealed that the Sandinista Government had systematically used state-sanctioned political assassinations, called "special measures" by Ministry of Interior authorities, against political opponents during 1983. According to Baldizon's own investigation, Ministry of Interior State Security forces summarily executed more than 300 farmers suspected of collaborating with the armed resistance in the Cua, Pantasma, Waslala and Rio Blanco areas. Relatives had reported many of these assassinations to CPDH and IAHRC, which published lists of the names of the missing persons. Baldizon's investigations in late 1984 turned up clandestine cemeteries in mountain communities of Matagalpa and Jinotega Departments where government investigators themselves believed victims of "special measures" had been buried. Baldizon charged that, in total, hundreds of assassinations and subsequent cover-ups were ordered by ranking Sandinista leaders--Interior Minister Tomas Borge and Vice Minister Luis Carrion.

In his October 1985 address to the United Nations, President Daniel Ortega claimed that insurgent forces, so-called "counterrevolutionaries," had killed 11,000 Nicaraguans, injured 5,000, kidnapped 5,000, and caused the displacement of 250,000 in six years of war between government and insurgent forces; he did not distinguish between Sandinista Army combatants and civilian casualties. CPDH and the 1985 independent Smith-Rygg human rights report claim that many civilian casualties have resulted from government use of heavy artillery near population centers in newly declared free-fire zones.

The Government has charged the insurgents with torturing and summarily executing civilians and prisoners of war. Americas Watch has accused both sides, holding the insurgent forces more culpable of violating international laws of war applicable to ordinary war conditions. There is evidence that many Nicaraguan civilians have been killed in crossfire. Some have died in insurgent ambushes of government military vehicles carrying civilian passengers. The Government has also distributed arms to persons engaged in civilian activities: in December, for example, it was announced that over one-half of the 10,000 coffee harvesters had received military training and would carry rifles in a defense capacity. The insurgents deny that they target civilians and in 1985 the newly-formed umbrella resistance group, the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO), announced that it would hold itself bound to the Geneva Conventions.

Although CPDH has received few reports of insurgent atrocities, some Nicaraguan government-sponsored international human rights researchers have produced extensive testimonies from alleged witnesses to political killings. Former Sandinista government employees who served in the area of human rights have charged that the Government controlled these groups' access to information. The Smith-Rygg report, based on interviews with Nicaraguan refugees in Costa Rica and Honduras and displaced persons inside Nicaragua, on the other hand, found no evidence of any systematic abuses conducted by counterrevolutionaries, in the form of intentional killings, torture, or rape.

b. Disappearances

Most reported disappearance cases result from what CPDH has labeled "a deliberate policy" by government security forces to hold suspected insurgents or political critics incommunicado indefinitely without notifying family members. The Government's October 15, 1985, suspension of legal guarantees for political detainees--habeas corpus, arrest warrants, and time limit on investigations--legalized this practice.

In its May 1984 communique to the IAHR, CPDH claimed that from 1981 to 1983, 433 cases of disappearance had been reported to its offices. As of that date, 142 of those cases had not been resolved and, in total for all years recorded, CPDH maintained it had 342 cases of prisoners who had disappeared. In the first six months of 1985, CPDH received 31 reports of disappearances. Of these, 16 persons had been located alive, with 14 of them detained in prisons. Three people had been found dead; 12 cases remained unresolved. CPDH found the Government implicated in 30 of the 31 reported disappearance cases.

The Government, for its part, has claimed that the insurgents have routinely kidnapped civilians. Insurgent forces have admitted to holding civilians captive temporarily in war zones. On January 26, 1985, Dr. Gustavo Sequeira Pena and a small medical team were taken captive by insurgents during battle on Rama Key, in the Bay of Bluefields. On April 29, the insurgents released the team, two members of which opted to remain with the Nicaraguan Democratic Forces (FDN). Nine members of the Sandinista "Fiftieth Anniversary Brigade"--volunteers who provide basic education in rural areas--were taken captive in 1984 and 1985. By the end of 1985, one continued to be held prisoner by the FDN, which was seeking the cooperation of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in arranging her release; one was working as a volunteer with the FDN; and one had returned to Nicaragua. The FDN reported to the ICRC that it did not have information concerning the remaining six persons. Seven members of other Sandinista brigades previously reported as missing were discovered to have joined the resistance forces. A number of international workers have been temporarily held by insurgents; two reported that they had been raped.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

CPDH holds that the Sandinista Government, particularly in State Security interrogation centers and clandestine prisons, has condoned the intentional infliction of severe physical and psychological suffering for the purpose of extracting information or confession, of punishing the detainee for an actual or suspected crime, or of intimidating the detainee and others. For example, CPDH estimates that almost all the political prisoners convicted by special Sandinista tribunals (called "TPA's,") were convicted by confessions which were extracted by torture or abusive treatment that might fall technically short of torture. CPDH further maintains that cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment of prisoners in the national penitentiary system is pervasive and a detainee could be investigated indefinitely, tortured, or submitted to cruel treatment without any legal mechanism available to stop the abuses.

NICARAGUA

Nine known Ministry of Interior security interrogation prisons and several clandestine prisons function in the country. The Government has denied repeated requests by international human rights monitors to inspect these facilities, and it does not permit the ICRC to provide assistance to prisoners in State Security prisons. In 1985, both Americas Watch and the Lawyers Committee for International Human Rights repeated previous requests to the Government to eliminate the practice of incommunicado detention and to permit inspection of the State Security prison facilities from which they had received persistent reports of cruel treatment of detainees. Concerned that international human rights organizations had not been able adequately to address abuses occurring in Nicaraguan jails, CPDH published a special report, "The Prison Situation--Nicaragua 1985." The report summarizes testimonies collected from CPDH's current case files of serious abuses of prisoners' human rights.

In the most notorious of the State Security interrogation centers, "El Chipote," located in the downtown area of the capital city of Managua, many detainees are held incommunicado sometimes for months, in dark subterranean cells in which they can only stand or sit. Air reaches cells through a tube and no toilet facilities are provided. ("El Chipote" was also used during the Somoza dictatorship as an interrogation and torture center.) State Security interrogators, some of them reportedly non-Nicaraguan, routinely deprive detainees of food, water and sleep for lengthy periods of time. CPDH received several complaints concerning detainees who were made to dig their own graves, subjected to mock executions, or had had empty pistols triggered at their temples. Others were beaten by interrogators, sometimes with rubber instruments that do not leave marks. One mother reported to CPDH that her son's face had been disfigured by repeated beatings. In the colder mountainous areas of Esteli, in the La Barranca Prison, and in the La Perrera Prison of Matagalpa, detainees have been forced to stand in barrels of cold water for periods of two to three days or until they made desired declarations or agreed to become informants.

In 1984 and early 1985, several women detainees in "El Chipote" reported they had been raped repeatedly by their guards, one woman after she had been drugged for an interrogation session. Women prisoners, without regard to age, have been forced to assume humiliating positions naked in front of male guards who insult and hit or kick them, in some cases only because their husbands or sons are accused of crimes against the state.

President Daniel Ortega himself, before international journalists during a televised press conference, admitted to and justified the detention at "El Chipote" of the president of a Catholic school parents' association. Commander Lenin Cerna, head of State Security forces, personally tortured the victim. The 60-year-old, who was not politically active, was detained because of his religiously-based criticisms of the government-enforced program of Marxist-Leninist patriotic education. Cerna and his agents reportedly beat the victim and Cerna himself put a pistol to the victim's head, saying he was going to kill him that night and the rest of his family later. At the behest of a visiting foreign delegation, a high Nicaraguan official intervened, after which the victim was released in the middle of the night completely naked, without his eyeglasses, on a main Managua thoroughfare. State Security agents had told him he was being driven to a location to be executed.

CPDH also has on file cases in which, during prolonged and intense interrogations, detainees have been made to listen to recordings of pleading voices and cries of loved ones. They were sometimes led to believe that relatives had been imprisoned and were being mistreated because of the detainees' recalcitrance to confess or to implicate others. In a number of cases, particularly those which involved government officials who had defected to other countries, family members have been detained and reportedly subjected to cruel treatment and torture in an effort to force the defector to return or to intimidate him into refraining from criticizing the Government.

Complaints filed with CPDH by the relatives of prisoners and some released prisoners indicate that the prisons of the national penitentiary system are characterized by severe overcrowding, inadequate food and medical treatment, and unhygienic conditions that are intentionally imposed by prison authorities. CPDH believes that prison conditions have deteriorated within the last year and alleges that prisoners' families fear reprisals if they request reviews of cases or conditions. CPDH has evidence that prison authorities have also used exceptionally cruel forms of punishment that include sealed cells or cars placed in direct sunlight, where the prisoners are placed until they dehydrate. Indiscriminate beatings and unexplained transfers also occur. CPDH has provided to the Government the names of abusive prison officials and the charges against them, but it has no evidence that investigations have been undertaken.

The Government admits that it uses forced prison labor to harvest crops in war zones. Two known hunger strikes were known to have taken place in Managua prisons in 1985, during which prisoners protested the use of forced labor and poor prison conditions. Approximately 100 of the strikers were transferred to the El Chipote complex for incommunicado detention and special punishment.

According to its own statistics, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is presently permitted by the government to provide medical and nutritional assistance to approximately 3,700, or 50 percent of the known political prisoners. A special agreement with the Government provides that the ICRC may not make public reports on conditions within the prison system. The ICRC also maintains an effective program of assistance to prisoner's families.

The Government human rights commission (CNPPDH) has developed a limited rehabilitation program within the penitentiary system for those prisoners who, according to CNPPDH officials, have come to accept the goals of the Sandinista revolutionary society. The program's most visible aspect is a system of open farm prisons. In those facilities, prisoners work during the day and have recreational programs, continuous visits by family members, and furloughs. While agreeing that such open prison facilities exist, CPDH and former CNPPDH employees maintain that they are few in number, and that they are used by the Government primarily for staged representations to international human rights monitors and visiting delegations. CPDH argues that the open farm prisons are populated by lower-ranking former Somoza National Guardsmen whose sentences are almost completed and who have agreed to cooperate with the Government as informants.

According to Catholic and Protestant church officials, priests and ministers are denied visitation rights or access to the prisoners. It has been reported to international human rights monitors that prison authorities have confiscated religious papers and books and broken up meetings of prisoners engaged in religious activity.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

States of Emergency decreed in 1985 suspended various legal guarantees and civil rights relating to arrest and detention. As of November, emergency decrees had deprived persons accused of non-political offenses of the right to have a hearing within 24 hours of detention, to request a "personal exhibition" before a judge, to obtain damages for false imprisonment, and not to be removed from the jurisdiction of a competent judge. Also, those accused of non-political offenses no longer enjoyed the guarantee against arrest without a warrant. Persons accused of subversive political activities were denied all of the above rights and guarantees as well as the guarantee of habeas corpus. Thus, any Nicaraguan citizen is subject to arbitrary arrest at any time and may be detained for an indefinite period "for investigation" of what are deemed political offenses without being formally charged or being accorded any other kind of due process.

In practice, arbitrary arrest and prolonged incommunicado detentions by state security forces and Sandinista police have been common for years. Numerous international human rights monitors, including the Inter-American Human Rights Commission, Americas Watch, Amnesty International and the Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights have made detailed and longstanding protests of these abuses. In its April 1985 report, "Nicaragua-Revolutionary Justice," the Lawyers' Committee stated that during its investigation government officials openly admitted to incommunicado detentions of up to 30 days, and the Committee found cases in which persons had been detained incommunicado for substantial periods ranging from five weeks to two and one-half months. In one case, the Lawyer's Committee found that an individual had been detained for 15 months without being charged.

Thousands of Nicaraguan citizens--political opposition leaders, businessmen, religious officials and lay workers, journalists, and private citizens who were actual or suspected dissenters from governmental policies--were arbitrarily arrested in 1985 and subjected to incommunicado detention generally ranging from six hours to more than ten days in State Security prisons or police headquarters. During the incommunicado detentions, State Security agents, and in a few cases policemen, tried during intense interrogation sessions to extract statements to support accusations of subversive or

"counterrevolutionary" activity on the part of detainees. Generally the detainees would receive orders to appear at a State Security prison or police headquarters at a certain time. On several occasions State Security agents arrested persons at their homes or work places, sometimes in the middle of the night. CPDH believes peasants in the rural areas are subject to more frequent arbitrary arrests and more lengthy periods of incommunicado detention. In its 1984 letter to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, CPDH claimed that "arbitrary detention, without trial, without legal charges, without possibility of defense, has been established as a system for intimidating citizens. After several months of illegal detention, they are freed without ever having been through any court and without being given any opportunity to defend oneself. Some of the prisoners have died in jails. Others, after several years in prison, are declared innocent, but their families have been destroyed, their property has been confiscated, they have lost their jobs."

In 1984 and 1985, CPDH received several complaints of mass arrests of the citizenry of small villages in war zones for supposed collaboration with resistance forces, or mass roundups of youths believed to be evading compulsory military service. In La Trinidad, 39 peasants, who were arrested and accused of circulating a letter stating that they had not voted in the 1984 elections, were held incommunicado for five days in the Esteli State Security prison, La Barrauca. There they were reportedly deprived of food for several days, isolated in dark cells, and made to stand in barrels of cold water until they confessed, before being transferred into the regular penitentiary system in Managua to await trial in the TPA.

Prisoners detained for TPA trials normally face additional long (usually five to six months, but sometimes longer) incommunicado confinement pending investigation by the Interior Ministry. Investigation can be extended indefinitely and family members and counsel, who are not notified of the arrest or generally permitted visits, have no evidence upon which to file allegations of either physical or psychological abuse. Writs of habeas corpus, available until October 1985, only served as notice from a government official, who reportedly had seen the prisoner, that a given detainee was being held in the State Security prison, El Chipote.

The Government does not usually exile dissidents, but in the spring of 1985 the Government forbade airlines to bring opposition leader Arturo Cruz into Managua. Also, many opposition leaders and critics of the Government have fled after receiving threats from government officials against their lives and those of their families and/or after their sources of livelihood had been destroyed by the Government through property confiscation or deprivation of employment.

In early 1985, the Government extended and broadened the terms of an amnesty, granted previously only to Miskito Indians and certain other exiles and "counterrevolutionaries," to include all Nicaraguans. According to government reports, over 2,000 people had received amnesty under that decree by November 1985. There were no known cases of later detentions for acts committed prior to amnesty.

Prohibitions on the use of compulsory or forced labor are among the rights and guarantees of Nicaraguan citizens. The

NICARAGUA

October 15 suspension of political and civil liberties did not affect those provisions of the law.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The state of emergency decreed in 1985 suspended various legal guarantees and civil rights relating to judicial processes. As of November, emergency decrees had deprived persons accused of non-political offenses of the following rights: to be informed of charges, to have a public trial before a competent judge, to participate personally in all proceedings from the start, and to challenge evidence. Such persons no longer enjoyed the following legal guarantees: against imprisonment without all requirements of law having been fulfilled, against double jeopardy, and against conviction for an act which was not a crime when committed. Persons accused of subversive political activities were denied the above rights and guarantees, as well as the right of appeal within the judicial branch. Within the severe restrictions imposed by the foregoing suspensions of rights and guarantees, the criminal courts showed some independence from political manipulation. Two kinds of special tribunals outside the judicial branch, however, had nearly discretionary powers to try economic, political, and security crimes--the Peoples Anti-Somocista Tribunals (TPA's) and the Sandinista police courts. The TPA's are entities within the executive branch (Interior Ministry). The TPA process theoretically functions as follows: once a complaint is filed, the detainee has two days in which to file a response. This initial period is followed by an investigative period of at least eight days, but the investigation may be extended indefinitely. Following the conclusion of the investigation the TPA has 3 days (or 10 if the defendant is not incarcerated), to pronounce sentence. There is a right of appeal only to the TPA Court of Appeals, composed of judges drawn from the same pool of people who staff the TPA. Sentences range from 3 to 30 years. Thus, the tribunals operate outside the conventional judicial system, and the defendant has no right to appeal to the regular judiciary. The members of the tribunals are selected on the basis of their leadership roles in Sandinista organizations and only one member of the three-judge panel is required to be a lawyer. Persons tried in these tribunals technically have the right to counsel and to introduce evidence, but highly expedited procedures and the use of flexible evidentiary standards severely diminish the exercise of these rights. The proceedings of the TPA's are in theory open to the public, but in most cases attendance is restricted. Trials have reportedly been scheduled with little or no advance notice, limiting opportunities for the accused to prepare his defense. Legal counsel to TPA defendants are frequently not advised of their clients' appearances before the court. Prisoners often spend further months "under investigation," even though they may have confessed, before being brought suddenly to trial. Since all special tribunal cases are tried in one court in Managua, it is often impossible for witnesses who live in other areas of the country to attend trials on time.

The TPA's became increasingly active in 1985 and according to government figures, as of October 31, 995 defendants had been processed through the tribunals since the TPA's were incepted on June 6, 1983. CPDH maintains that the number of TPA cases is much higher, with hundreds of cases remaining in pending status. The conviction rate of the TPA's is 90 percent, and these tribunals are known for arbitrary actions. In one case a prisoner was sentenced to seven years, and upon appealing to another tribunal, was sentenced to an additional eight years, reportedly for having made recourse to the services of CPDH. Although the TPA's were established to try subversives and counterrevolutionaries, one case sent to the TPA in 1985 involved two young Social Democratic Party members, Luis Mora Sanchez and Mauricio Membreno Gaitan, who were arrested because they participated in welcoming activities for the return to Nicaragua of newly-invested Cardinal Obando y Bravo. Arrested on June 15, the two were investigated during detention (which was incommunicado for Membreno) for over a month before being tried in late July. As of early December, they remained incarcerated, but had not been sentenced. According to the 1985 Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights study of Nicaragua's judicial system, "both the formal structure and mode of the operation of these tribunals undermine the basic due process rights of Nicaraguan citizens."

The Sandinista police courts also fall under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Interior, and so work within the confines of a military, not judicial, bureaucracy. Court procedures, which are not always adhered to, provide that police courts have seven days following arrest in which to conclude their proceedings. Within 24 hours of arrest, the police must make a probable cause determination, upon which the defendant will be set free or provisionally detained pending investigation. Investigation should not take more than five days. At the end of the investigation, the police have 24 hours either to remit the detainee to the civilian courts or to impose sentence for an offense that falls within "police tribunal jurisdiction," which can include "insulting authority," "cultivation, possession or distribution of marijuana," and undefined "economic crimes," such as violations of price controls, and black marketeering. The judges (Sandinista police officers) enjoy wide latitude: at the end of their investigations they may, at their discretion, remit detainees to the civilian courts or sentence them to up to two years in jail. Thus, a person who is brought before a police tribunal may, within a few days, be sentenced to two years without right to appeal. The Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights condemned the 1900 Law of Judicial Functions of the Sandinista police as "a particularly disturbing assault on the right to be tried by an independent tribunal." CPDH maintains that police courts have condemned several opposition leaders on trumped-up charges for purely political reasons.

The Government claims it has no political prisoners, though it admits to holding about 5,000 prisoners, including some 2,000 former National Guardsmen, plus other people convicted of counterrevolutionary subversive activities. CPDH conservatively estimates that the political prisoner total, including National Guardsmen who were convicted without due process, is between 7,500 and 10,000, with approximately 700 to 1,000 of that number being held at any one time for investigation in State Security prisons. The ICRC estimate of numbers of political prisoners falls within this range of 7,500-10,000.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

On October 15, the Government suspended Article 18 of the Statute of Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans, which states that "no person will be subject to arbitrary or illegal interference affecting his private life, his family, his home, his correspondence or his communications." Thus, with no legal requirement for a search warrant, police and state security officials regularly enter and search private residences, particularly those belonging to political opposition figures. The Government opens private mail and intercepts both incoming and outgoing international mail, taps telephone lines, and inspects the baggage and personal effects of both arriving and departing international travelers to confiscate items of literature including newspapers, films or tape recordings alleged to be subversive, as well as some religious materials that originate abroad.

The Government has developed an elaborate and effective security and intelligence network, employing both the security forces and Sandinista party organizations, particularly the "Sandinista Defense Committees (CDS's)," to ferret out dissidents and suspected subversives. The CDS's, based on Cuban model block committees, are organized in most neighborhoods throughout the country. The CDS central office serves as headquarters for a network of informers and as an instrument of pervasive political control and intimidation--they are self-described as the "eyes and ears of the revolution." Participation in the CDS is supposed to be voluntary, but they employ many methods to entice or pressure individuals into joining, including committee control over the distribution of ration cards for the purchase of basic products such as rice, beans, and soap. In 1985, access to public health care, public records, and the right to employment often depended upon a letter of recommendation from a local CDS. While many people who do not participate in Sandinista party activities suffer no ill effects, others are disdained as politically suspect or are denounced by Sandinista activists as subversives--for example, if they refuse to perform CDS neighborhood night guard duty known as "revolutionary vigilance." People who criticize the "revolutionary process" or its leadership may be subjected to pressure ranging from public ridicule and defacement of their homes to loss of employment and even detention.

CPDH has credible reports that under-age Nicaraguan males have been impressed into military service, including boys as young as twelve years old. A riot broke out in the small town of Nagarote in January 1985 as the citizenry resisted mass round-ups of youths by government troops, who forced their way into homes and public places.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government intensified its policy of prior censorship and practice of harassment against the private and electronic media in 1985. Since 1982, the only independent newspaper, La Prensa, has suffered widespread censorship of new materials and editorials. The two other newspapers, both supported by the Government, at times publish the same items that have been censored from La Prensa. The distribution of newsprint to all three newspapers is controlled by the Government, which limits the number of pages per week they may publish. Many small publications not aligned directly with the Government were forced to cease publication because of their inability to obtain newsprint. Though a July 19, 1984, decree proclaimed that censorship would affect only matters of national security, censorship in fact continued on internal political matters, economic problems, Church affairs, human rights and many other non-security issues. Censorship of La Prensa continued to be capricious and increased sharply by the end of the year. La Prensa editors estimated that in 1985, before the October 15 decree, 40 percent of the news coverage was censored; after the decree, the share regularly censored increased to approximately 80 percent. The paper had failed to publish eight times as of December 5, 1985. The Government also banned private and internal publications not for sale to the general public of organizations which had not first received permission to publish nor agreed to submit to prior censorship.

In early October, the Government told the Church that its planned newspaper, La Iglesia, would have to be registered with the Ministry of Interior's Directorate of Media Communications. The Church feared the request was a prelude to prior censorship, which the Church has consistently resisted. On October 12, the first issue of La Iglesia was printed. A delivery truck carrying copies to various churches was stopped by police and the driver forced to retrace his route, picking up already distributed copies of the newspaper. Later, armed men went to the Church's office and confiscated the remaining copies and printing equipment. When the Church attempted to register La Iglesia, the request to publish was denied.

On October 22, the Ministry of Interior issued a notice that all communications media and printing facilities must register with the Ministry of Interior. A literary magazine was confiscated prior to that date, and an opposition political party was told the party could no longer print and distribute its monthly newsletter without prior censorship. Several La Prensa journalists and most of the people involved with the publication of the Catholic paper were detained in El Chipote for interrogation, during which they were charged with involvement in "subversive" activities: one of La Iglesia's staff members, a foreign-born resident, was deported. Government security agents also harassed La Prensa distributors in areas outside of Managua, forcing a number to cease operations. In September, a small private publishing house was occupied by State Security forces and its owner jailed, reportedly for agreeing to print a private sector pamphlet. In November, the Ministry of Interior informed the independent human rights commission, CPDH, that all its publications, communiques and letters would be subject to prior censorship.

The Government owns two-thirds of the radio stations in the country. Production and broadcast of news programs are tightly controlled. Since 1982, 21 independent radio news programs have gone off the air because of excessive censorship. All radio programming, including commentary, names of music selections, and sponsors, must be submitted to the censors in advance. In the case of the two independent religious radio stations, one Protestant and one Catholic, the censors have, for example, found verses from the Bible and messages from the Pope and other religious leaders objectionable. Live transmissions on radio or television of Masses are prohibited, and the Government repeatedly threatened to close the "Radio Catolica" station and to confiscate its offices and equipment if the station failed to follow censorship orders. In 1982, the Ministry of Interior closed the station for 15 days for failure to abide by its censorship orders. In 1985, the Ministry of Interior twice raided the station to terminate transmission of Cardinal Obando's Masses, on one occasion despite previous assurances from Minister of Interior Tomas Borge that the Mass could be broadcast. On October 30, the station was closed for 48 hours as punishment for the broadcast of an unapproved homily by the Cardinal. On January 1, 1986 the Government announced that the station had been closed down by the Ministry of Interior because it had failed to join a national radio network in broadcasting President Daniel Ortega's end-of-year message. Both public statements by Government officials and the wording of the official announcement, which referred to the closure rather than suspension of Radio Catolica suggest that the shut-down may be permanent.

Both existing television channels are state-owned and managed by the "Sandinista System" (SSTV). Their daily news programs, "Sandinista News," are identical, and the content of the programming is indisputably partisan.

The Government also has stymied individual freedom of expression through selective persecution--the case of the torture of the Catholic Parents Association president for criticizing the state-enforced Sandinista patriotic education curriculum in religious schools is only one example. Non-programmed, critical questions or comments at government town meetings may subject the speaker to imprisonment or worse, according to cases on file with CPDH. There were detentions in retaliation for verbal expressions of private views or participation in public events and for the purpose of interrogation and intimidation on political subjects--political party and church links, contacts with foreign embassies, views expressed by priests, employment by foreign missions, support from foreign labor political groups, and so forth.

While there is no censorship of domestic or imported books, few books from the West are on sale in Nicaraguan book stores. Most books are subsidized and book stores are stocked largely with publications from Communist countries. The Government's imposition of "curriculum rationalization and coordination" on the two Nicaraguan universities has limited their autonomy in developing their curricula and has further circumscribed academic freedom. The Ministry of Education has imposed curricula with a strong ideological content on primary and secondary schools as well. Also, the Sandinista Youth organization is a pervasive influence in the public education system; it has reportedly paid for some members' tuition in private schools in order to have the organization represented there. Sandinista Youth members allegedly have denounced teachers for not supporting the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

On October 15, 1985, an official decree suspended many legal rights and guarantees including the right to "associate oneself freely with others for legal purposes;" the right to "found and promote regular, commercial, rural, etc., organizations and labor or professional organizations;" the right of unions to form federations and national confederations; and the right of these to form international union organizations or to affiliate with them. The right to strike was suspended simultaneously.

Before the October 15 decree, rights to associate and to establish organizations existed in theory but were limited in two ways: by a government requirement that all organizations have approved legal status (personeria juridica), and by government refusal to grant such status to organizations which it disdained. At least one professional organization, one political party, and a Protestant ministers' association applied for such status, but were refused. The application of an independent labor union has been pending for several years. These organizations therefore remain technically illegal, as do all their activities.

Prior to the October 15 decree, the right to assemble physically in one place existed in theory and was often respected. The Government sometimes made it impossible to assemble in desired locations, however, by refusing to rent space for private sector gatherings and to religious groups; by refusing permits for peaceful marches, reportedly by asking private theater owners not to rent to certain groups for specific meetings; and by ordering bus companies not to transport attendees. On May 1, police forcibly halted Confederation of Labor Unification members who planned to walk from a church where they had attended Mass to the site of Luis Medrano's assassination by the National Guard. Government officials publicly interpreted the October 15 suspension of the right to associate physically as a ban only on outdoor gatherings for which permits had not been granted. In one case, a dozen members of a committee which organized the celebration of Mass by the Cardinal in Chinandega in November were arrested because an unauthorized outdoor procession occurred there prior to the Mass. In September, the organizers of a private celebration were summoned and warned to cancel the festivities, and were held under house arrest on the day of the event. In December, five hundred persons invited to attend a graduation of private development trainees were also turned away by the police. Large outdoor assemblies by government-sponsored or favored groups, however, are routine during national holidays, Sandinista and Communist party anniversaries, and so forth.

Seven major labor confederations operate in Nicaragua. The two largest are linked directly to the FSLN: the Sandinista Workers Central (CST) and the Rural Workers Association (ATC). Three others are Marxist organizations with ties to Nicaragua's various Communist parties (the Independent General Confederation of Workers, with approximately 1600 members; the Confederation of Labor Action and Unity, with approximately 2600 members; and the Workers' Front, a marginal organization the membership of which is unknown.) Of the remaining two independent confederations, one is affiliated with the Christian Social Party (the Nicaraguan Workers' Central with approximately 3200 members) and the other, democratically-oriented, has no party affiliation. The CST is the FSLN's umbrella confederation for mostly non-agricultural workers, and with over 45,000 members is the country's largest labor confederation. The ATC is a farm labor confederation with over 35,000 members. According to ATC officials, however, the figure does not include more than 100,000 seasonal workers.

In addition to the large labor confederations, the Sandinistas also control most of the smaller labor unions representing various worker groups, such as teachers, health workers, journalists, and government employees. As is the case with the confederations, however, these labor organizations represent the interests of the Government, rather than those of the workers. Union officials thus act to ensure compliance with various Government decrees and regulations, encouraging strict labor discipline, inhibiting the normal demands for wage and benefit improvements, and discouraging strikes.

Despite these efforts, the worsening economic situation in 1985 led to increasing labor dissatisfaction among both the FSLN-affiliated and independent labor organizations. This unrest most often was expressed in short-lived wildcat strikes, which in every instance were put down through the use of the police and generally brief arrests of activists and leaders. While prior to the October 15 decree the right to strike existed in theory, in practice strikes were not tolerated. In June of 1985, for example, workers in the Ernesto Chamorro Soap Factory in Granada called a wildcat strike when the Government suspended payment in kind (the augmentation of workers' salaries by providing them with goods produced). The Government's reaction to the strike was first to ask the workers to return to their jobs, because it was the duty of all workers to support the revolution, especially while the country was at war. When the workers refused to comply, police were used to break up the strike and force the workers back to the job. Several workers were detained briefly.

Some arrests, however, involved much longer detention. Alejandro Solorzano, International Affairs Secretary of the Independent General Confederation of Workers, was arrested on October 15 and remains imprisoned. Solorzano has been charged, according to Interior Minister Tomas Borge, with "actions contrary to the methods used in a revolutionary country." Other actions against the independent union organizations included an armed raid of Independent Confederation of Workers of Nicaragua headquarters, in which State Security agents confiscated all union papers and documents and arrested Board members Augustin Rodriguez, Sergio Roa, and Eugenio Membreno. The three men were released following six hours of interrogation.

There have been no reported strikes since the State of Emergency was decreed in October.

c. Freedom of Religion

An estimated 80 percent of the Nicaraguan population is Catholic, and Catholicism and other religions are legal. Throughout most of the year, church services were not interfered with, but Catholic Radio and Radio Waves of Light (an evangelical station) were required to tape and transcribe Masses, sermons and religious services to be broadcast and to submit them for prior censorship.

Relations between the Government and the Catholic hierarchy and some Protestant churches have been strained for the past several years, but a new deterioration in relations between the Catholic Church and the Government began in the early summer of 1985 with the elevation of Archbishop Obando y Bravo to Cardinal. Hundreds of thousands of Nicaraguans poured into the streets to welcome the Cardinal in June when he returned from Rome. Two events marred the ceremonies. Police applied a water cannon to a group of faithful trying to enter the airport grounds to greet the Cardinal as he stepped off the airplane. Because of their participation in the welcoming ceremonies, eight young men were subsequently detained. Six were released after a few days, including one young man who admitted that he had shouted "Nine Get Out," a reference to the Sandinista National Directorate of nine comandantes; two were still detained as of December and were tried by the TPA for crimes against the state. Tensions diminished slightly between June and August, but in September the Government stepped up pressure on the Church. On September 12 and 25, Interior Ministry agents raided the Catholic Radio station, terminating transmissions of the Cardinal's homilies. The Ministry of Interior's response to the Church's protests of the incidents was to reiterate the necessity for submitting taped and transcribed homilies for prior censorship. The Government's position was underscored on October 30, when Catholic Radio was closed by official order for 48 hours for broadcast of an unapproved homily. On January 1, 1986, the Ministry of Interior closed the station again.

The Government also violated an informal agreement with the Church exempting seminarians from military service; during the month of September six seminarians from Granada and five from the Chontales area had been conscripted. Church efforts to secure their release have not been successful. Fifteen foreign priests working in the Rivas-Granada area involved in protesting the conscriptions were called before immigration authorities on October 1 and warned that if they did not desist from "political activities" they would be deported. The Church protested those threats, but again there was no response from the Government.

On October 15, security officials forced their way into the Church's Social Services offices, threatening, photographing, and eventually expelling the workers from the premises. State Security agents declared the office "officially occupied" and denied entry to all Church officials, including the Cardinal.

In November, the Ministry of Interior notified Cardinal Obando y Bravo that he must obtain the permission of the Government before traveling outside Managua to celebrate mass. The Cardinal's popular outdoor masses have been banned, and worshippers were prevented from entering some towns where he was holding services.

Government pressure on evangelicals was also stepped up during 1985. In early May, Oklahoma-based evangelist Larry Jones accepted an invitation to come to Managua, participate in a crusade, and distribute food through his "Feed the Children" campaign. Although Jones obtained personal assurances from President Daniel Ortega that he could hold his crusade and distribute six truck-loads of food through participating churches, the Government confiscated the food during the customs process. After lengthy negotiations, the Government returned four of the six loads, keeping two for its own use. The Government told Jones the confiscated food would be used to feed persons relocated under the government's resettlement plan, but it provided no evidence that the food was actually used for that purpose. On September 29, activities sponsored by a number of evangelical churches were disrupted by Sandinista mobs (turbas divinas). On October 30, State Security began rounding up leaders and youth activists from such groups as Campus Crusade for Christ, the First Evangelical Church of Central America, the National Council of Nicaraguan Evangelical Pastors, the Alliance for Children, and the Nicaraguan Bible Society. These men and women were subjected to abusive treatment. Some were forced to strip and wait for long periods in dark, cold cells, before interrogation. All were released from detention after periods ranging from one to ten days. One of the evangelicals, the Rev. Boanerges Mendoza, was rearrested and held for ten days because he discussed his first detention. Another evangelical, Dr. Jimmy Hassan, chose to leave Nicaragua for exile because of the threats made against him and his family.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

The October 15, 1985 state of emergency decree suspended freedom of travel throughout the country. The new restriction has, so far, been used against several thousand Catholic worshippers, who were prevented from attending two special masses given by the Nicaraguan Cardinal and against some opponents of the regime. It has not greatly affected routine travel, although security checkpoints are now numerous in all regions except the Pacific. The Government requires exit visas for departure from Nicaragua for both Nicaraguan citizens and resident foreigners. Opposition leaders still experience difficulty in obtaining exit visas. In August of 1985, the Government responded to the flight of medical doctors by requiring them to obtain permission from Ministry of Health regional directors before applying for exit visas. Other Nicaraguans with specialized skills, such as some refinery workers, must also obtain prior permission. Draft-age males cannot obtain exit visas without proof that they have registered for military service. Foreign travel remains difficult for most Nicaraguans because the Government controls access to hard currency and limits to US$1,000 the amount that may be taken out. Nicaraguans wishing to drive their cars out of the country also must post bonds which equal half the current value of the cars. The Government continues to confiscate the property of Nicaraguans who remain out of the country for periods of six months or more.

During 1985, thousands more Nicaraguans left the country. The Governments of Honduras and Costa Rica estimate the number of Nicaraguans in those countries at around 200,000, with another 200,000-250,000 in the United States, Mexico, and other Latin American countries, although the number granted refugee status is considerably smaller. Continued fighting and conscription, military induction of men up to age 40 for reserve units, and deteriorating economic and political conditions generate large outflows to neighboring countries. Nicaraguans who have fled the country and then choose to return appear not to face penalties. The UN reports that 750 people have been repatriated since January of 1985; the Government claims over 1,500.

In late 1981 and early 1982, the Government forcibly relocated about 10,000 Miskito Indians from their homelands to distant resettlement camps. In 1983, group political executions of East Coast Miskito Indians by the Sandinista military and security forces were condemned by the International League for Human Rights, and in reports made to the U.S. Congress, the OAS and the Indian Law Resource Center by Miskito Indian expert, Berkeley Professor Bernard Nietschman. The New York Times has estimated that approximately 800 Indian civilians were killed by the Sandinista Government. In an effort to mend relations with the Miskito Indians and to appease outraged international human rights organizations, the Sandinista government in 1985 publicly acknowledged its "past errors" and is now attempting to return Miskitos, earlier forcibly moved to relocation camps, to their homelands near the Rio Coco. A government program to resettle Miskitos who had fled to Honduras has brought back another 5,000 persons to the Rio Coco area.

On March 10, 1985, President Daniel Ortega announced that the Government would begin new forced evacuation of thousands of peasants from the northern countryside. He then stated that 7,000 families would be affected. The head of the government social service agency later estimated that 50,000 people would be moved in 1985, as part of a program that could affect 200,000-250,000 people. According to Sandinista officials, the purpose of the program was twofold: to deprive resistance forces of local support by removing from war zones relatives and neighbors sympathetic to them, and to create "free-fire zones," where the Sandinista People's Army could operate freely. CPDH believes another objective of the forced relocations is to create new dependence on the Government -- resettlement camps in which the inhabitants must accept government indoctrination and policies in order to survive. The Government describes those relocated as "displaced peasant families" who mobilized themselves in response to resistance forces attacks, seeking Sandinista government protection. Many peasants, nonetheless, report that Sandinista troops arrived in their towns and ordered the inhabitants to leave within 24 hours or less. In the northern town of Limay, evacuees and relief officers reported that homes of peasants were burned and animals killed to prevent people from returning. One evacuation official claimed that some people had been evacuated only because they had relatives with the resistance forces and that others had been ordered to leave because the Government had told them that they wanted to bomb their area.

Nicaragua has received more than 20,000 displaced persons since 1979, most of them from El Salvador. This figure also includes Colombians, Uruguayans, Chileans and Argentines. The UNHCR gave material assistance to displaced persons in Nicaragua, most of whom are Salvadorans. The Nicaraguan Government works closely with the UNHCR to integrate these people into society, and many no longer receive assistance. Of the 1,532 persons aided by the UNHCR in 1985, about 500 had been integrated, and assistance to them ceased by year's end. As of September 1985, 14 Argentines, 430 Salvadorans, 18 Chileans, 10 Colombians, and 52 Uruguayans had been repatriated. No displaced persons have been forcibly repatriated, although a number of Iranians attempting to enter Nicaragua from Costa Rica were deported back to their point of departure in Europe.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

A fundamental ideological conflict exists between the right of Nicaraguans generally to effect political change and the Sandinista Front's asserted right to rule, derived from its self-defined Marxist-Leninist role as the "vanguard party" of the people. From 1979 to 1984, the Front's National Directorate ruled through a junta of government, a council of state, and cabinet ministries. The Sandinistas always had a monopoly of force, and with that they increasingly dominated both executive and legislative functions. The November 1984 election of president, vice president, and National Assembly did not diminish their domination. It merely permitted a small minority composed of other parties to have formal, if ineffectual, roles in the legislative process. The Sandinista Directorate controls the Assembly through its majority of seats and its president, who is a member of the Front's National Directorate.

The Sandinistas have been even more jealous of power in the executive branch. All major appointments are of Sandinistas or their collaborators, and all policy decisions are made by Sandinistas. The statutes adopted by the National Assembly in April 1985 recognize that major decision-making authority lies with the executive. The National Assembly, which serves as a legislative body and the constitutional drafting institution, has no authority to involve itself in foreign policy, international agreements, or the budget. Moreover, during a state of emergency, the statutes provide that all legislative functions accrue to the President. That provision, however, has never been implemented.

Thirteen political parties exist in Nicaragua. There are a few small ones which do not normally criticize the Sandinistas. Government treatment of the others in 1985 reflected the Sandinistas' Marxist-Leninist assertion of the right to rule and extreme sensitivity to those who dispute it. In 1985 there were detentions of opposition activists of the Independent Liberal, Social Democratic, Liberal Constitutionalist, Social Christian, and Conservative (PCN) Parties; a complete prohibition on opposition demonstrations and parades; censorship of mass media to prevent even the mention of certain opposition parties; newly-imposed prior censorship of all written material distributed by all parties; interference with some parties' attempts to rent meeting halls; and personal intimidation of some party leaders at homes and offices.

The foregoing forms of repression, along with uncertainties created by a general suspension of civil and political rights in October, were clearly designed to dampen the desires of opponents to maintain viable independent parties. The suspension of rights left no citizen with legal freedom to travel in the country, communicate in writing, organize groups, assemble peacefully, or be free from disruptions to home, family, correspondence and other communications. Though prevented from striking back publicly in any effective way, all opposition parties issued statements condemning the suspension of rights. Even those parties in the National Assembly, other than the FSLN, voted against or walked out on the Sandinistas' proposal for ratification of the decree abolishing rights.

In addition to acquiring political party and governmental power, the Sandinistas have attempted to displace or frustrate independent civic and political pressure groups in order to achieve a monopoly of those also. Virtually every independent labor, professional, civic, commercial, and agricultural pressure group has its Sandinista-created counterpart, which is reportedly government-funded and always promoted publicly by the pro-Sandinista mass media. Formation of Sandinista parallel organizations for traditional groups appears to be the other side of a strategy of limiting the influence of independent groups by restricting their rights. Creation of competing organizations indirectly reduces the power of citizens to effect changes in government policies. In addition, the creation of Sandinista Defense Committees in urban areas at the neighborhood and block levels has tended to preempt or discourage the formation of community-based pressure groups. Would-be organizers of such groups are accused of anti-revolutionary sentiments and ostracized for trying to bypass the Sandinista Defense Committees, the ruling party's chosen instrument for grass-roots social change.

The small number of elected officials in Nicaragua also limits citizens' access to those who might be responsive to pressures for change in Government or government policies. There are no elected municipal, departmental, or regional officials. There are less than 100 elected officials in the Government. Municipal elections have been discussed publicly by government officials, but none was scheduled as of late 1985.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has not been forthcoming on investigations of alleged violations of human rights which were to be carried out independently of the Government. The independent human rights organization, the Permanent Commission on Human Rights (CPDH), an organization founded in 1977 to focus the world's attention on human rights violations by the Somoza regime, has been consistently frustrated in its efforts to do its job. In the most serious attempt to bring CPDH activities under state control, in November the Ministry of Interior ordered that all documents prepared by the organization be submitted to the Ministry for prior censorship.

Although a few non-governmental organizations have been allowed to enter the country to observe human rights conditions, these visits have been closely structured by the Government to expose the groups only to information and situations beneficial to the Government. This strategy of deception has been detailed by Alvaro Baldizon, who related that the efforts made to disinform include the careful preparation of places intended for visits. Such preparation includes the seclusion and even arrest of persons whose views toward the Government are known or suspected to be negative, and the placement of others--usually members of the Ministry of Interior--to act as "local residents" for the benefit of the visitors. According to Baldizon, security agents pretending to be journalists, photographers, or relatives of actual local residents frequently join the visiting group and act to steer the groups to particular places or persons, and to assist in the development of an itinerary. Such agents constitute what the Ministry terms "casual encounter" teams. Not only does the control of access to the public ensure the promotion of a positive image of the Government's policies and actions, it also provides a channel through which false information can be disseminated concerning alleged brutalities by the armed resistance.

The offices of Peace and Justice, the newly-formed human rights investigatory arm of the Catholic Church, have been occupied by security forces.

The umbrella group for the armed resistance, the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO), has formed its own human rights organization which is charged with the education of troops on their obligations under the Geneva Conventions, the American Human Rights Convention, and UNO's own Code of Conduct; the maintenance of records on abuses by its own forces and those of the Sandinistas; and the prosecution of UNO troops accused of abuses. According to UNO records, 21 individuals were so prosecuted between May and November, of whom 19 were found guilty and sentenced, and two were acquitted. The offenses involved theft, espionage, drug use, rape, and murder.

Amnesty International Report 1985, which covers events in 1984, expressed concern over detention of prisoners of conscience, primarily trade union and political party activists; unfair trials of political prisoners; and incommunicado detention before political prisoners were brought before the courts. Freedom House rates Nicaragua "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Nicaragua had a population growth rate of about 3.0 percent in 1985. The present population of the country is 3.23 million people. Per capita gross income dropped sharply in 1984 and 1985, as a result of inflation and a fall in the value of the cordoba.

The Nicaraguan economy experienced negative growth in 1984 and indications are that 1985 was worse. Inflation rose to an annual rate of over 200 percent. Private investment in the economy has virtually ceased, and government investment has been restricted to projects related to the war effort. Export values dropped in 1984 to US$393 million and to US$300 million or less for 1985. Import values were maintained at high levels as the Government continued to rely heavily on imported raw materials. Trade sanctions imposed by the U.S. in May 1985 have had an impact on the economy, but have affected private industry more than the government-controlled sectors; the Government had already begun a shift away from the United States to other, more friendly markets for its exports. Hard currency shortages have restricted imports, and the Government has begun to rely on donations of insecticides, fertilizers, and other vital inputs. Since May 1985, that trend has accelerated.

Serious economic mismanagement, trade difficulties, and armed opposition activity all contributed to Nicaragua's economic woes in 1985. Although the private sector accounts for roughly 60 percent of gross domestic product, it is closely controlled by government regulation of all sales, distribution, prices, bank credits, and foreign trade. The Government has responded to economic problems by increasing, rather than decreasing, its degree of control over production and marketing processes--a solution that has further stifled private investment and initiative, and perpetuated bureaucratic inefficiencies. Despite the Government's proclaimed intention to foster a mixed economy, it has proceeded with confiscations of private property. In many cases, the lands and facilities seized have been taken for blatantly political reasons. One of the most productive coffee farms in Central America was expropriated for "inefficiency" in April 1985. The owner is actively involved in the civic opposition. Seven leading cotton growers lost their lands and production facilities when the Government declared them to be "too big" and asserted the right of workers to farm corn and beans on land of their own. The properties given to peasant families and cooperatives come mainly from confiscations. Some are given titles legalizing possession of land (usually in the mountains) already held and farmed by a family, sometimes for generations. Land titles distributed under the Agrarian Reform Program grant the holder the rights outlined in the 1981 Agrarian Reform Act. The law specifically grants right to use only; holders of title cannot sell the land or divide it into parcels. Their children may inherit it, but only as an indivisible unit. In many cases, possession is contingent upon participation in a cooperative, or upon cultivation of a particular crop.

In a June meeting with the country's doctors and health professionals, President Daniel Ortega conceded that the people of the country were not receiving the kind of medical attention they should expect, and he acknowledged that the national health care situation was truly critical. Most public hospitals, though free, are poorly maintained, staffed, and lack equipment. Foreign exchange shortages and war effort priorities in the budget have caused extreme shortages in medicines. East bloc countries have provided and staffed several new health centers and hospitals. The infant mortality rate in 1985 was 69.0 deaths per 1,000 live births. According to government figures, about 91 percent of the urban population and 10 percent of the rural population have access to safe water, but severe water shortages experienced in 1984-85 may have decreased these percentages. The Government reported that 10 percent of the population was on social security rolls in 1984 and the literacy rate had reached 88 percent. Unemployment stayed at about 20 percent, although the character of the work force changed somewhat. Skilled laborers, technicians, and professionals continued to leave Nicaragua, and in many cases there was no one to replace them. Fifty percent of those unemployed in 1984 were agricultural workers, many of whom have left the land to seek greater income in the capital. At the same time, the agricultural sector experienced a serious labor shortage in 1984. Students, office workers, and international volunteers were mobilized to pick coffee and cotton, both vital export crops.

Children under the age of 14 are not permitted to work legally. Ministry of Labor officials, however, admit that the prohibition on child labor is often disregarded in the countryside, where entire families often labor for wages, particularly at harvest time. Under the National Organizational System for Work and Salaries (SNOTS), minimum and maximum salaries have been established for all of Nicaragua's salaried employees working in the public and private sectors. Agricultural workers have not been incorporated into SNOTS, and most are paid on the basis of productivity (e.g., the amount of coffee or cotton picked). For those who labor in the fields daily, however, a minimum wage of 138 cordobas per task (a task is defined as a three to four hour period) plus a daily food allowance of 40 cordobas have been established. Farm laborers may elect to perform two tasks daily, thereby raising their daily wage to 278 cordobas. Workers paid under the SNOTS system also receive an extra month's vacation per annum. Workers may elect, however, to take all or part of their vacation days as salary. As the SNOTS system established maximum as well as minimum wages, collective bargaining was eliminated. However, employers or workers can apply to the Ministry of Labor for permission to pay or receive either a one-time or annual bonus. Women are not subject to any special restrictive measures by the Government, and are active at all levels of society and government, other than the highest policy-making bodies. Women serve as officials in both the Sandinista and independent political parties, and a woman serves as the president of one of the Conservative Democratic Party factions. A large number of seats on the Council of States are also filled by women. Participation of women in the military is voluntary.

Conditions for the Miskitos remain poor. Whole villages, infrastructure and crops, previously razed by Sandinistas, have not been restored. Food shortages and malnutrition reportedly continue to exist, and a number of restrictions on movement and ownership have been established. Weather, military activity, and economic restraints have reportedly hampered the government's current project to return the Miskitos to their ancestral homelands, according to local press accounts.

PANAMA

Although Panama has a civilian President, the Panamanian military continues to dominate national politics. Nicolas Ardito Barletta, Panama's first directly elected president in 16 years, was unable to complete a year in office. Under extreme pressure from the country's military leadership and from his own ruling party, he stepped down on September 28; First Vice President Eric Arturo Delvalle became Panama's fifth president in three years.

The belief was widespread that the results of the 1984 elections, in which Barletta was declared the winner by a scant 1,713 votes, were rigged. Barletta failed to forge a national consensus on handling Panama's heavy foreign debt and overcoming its economic recession. Finally, in the aftermath of the September murder of Hugo Spadafora. Barletta was caught between opposition demands for a special inquiry and PDF resistance to the idea by the Panama Defense Forces (PDF)..

Panama continues to be confronted by economic difficulties. It is estimated that 1985 economic growth again will show a per capita decrease. Unemployment continues around twenty percent. The Barletta government had some initial success in attaining a new standby agreement with the International Monetary Fund. However, agreement on a second structural adjustment loan from the World Bank has been delayed by the Government's inability to obtain domestic political agreement on structural economic reforms.

Panama's Constitution guarantees broad individual and civil rights, and in most spheres of life these rights are exercised freely. Opposition media are active, although they allege official harassment, especially of radio and TV. The civil and human rights climate in Panama has been marred by the removal of the elected president and by two violent incidents in which there have been allegations of PDF complicity: the kidnapping and beating of a prominent opposition political figure, and the brutal murder of Spadafora.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Dr. Hugo Spadafora, a former Vice-Minister of Health and a guerrilla leader, fought in Guinea-Bissau and on both sides in Nicaragua. Spadafora had been a bitter critic of PDF Commander Noriega, whom he accused of involvement in drug traffic. According to his family, Spadafora had planned to return to Panama City from Costa Rica, where he was living, on September 13. He never arrived. The following day a headless body was found in Costa Rica near the Panamanian border. Fingerprints identified it as Spadafora's.

The PDF's immediate public reaction was to deny having any record that Spadafora ever re-entered Panama and to posit that he had been killed by an unknown guerrilla group. However, a report of the Costa Rican Organization for Judicial Investigation states that Spadafora was seen by witnesses entering Panama September 13 and that other witnesses saw him being removed from a bus by a PDF member. These events were also confirmed by several witnesses in Panama, according to a report made public by Panama's Attorney General October 24.

PANAMA

Opposition leaders and the Spadafora family demanded that an independent commission be appointed to investigate the crime, saying that a regular investigation by the Attorney General would only whitewash the PDF. The Archbishop of Panama and the Papal Nuncio espoused the cause. (In response, the PDF-controlled newspaper Critica warned the Nuncio against "meddling" in Panama's internal affairs.) Numerous professional, business, civic, labor, and political groups also expressed lack of confidence in the official investigation.

President Barletta claimed that he did not have the constitutional right to appoint an investigative body independent of the Attorney General, but a few days prior to his ouster he recommended that the Attorney General consider appointing a special advisory committee. PDF Commander Noriega publicly stated his opposition to the formation of such a committee, and oppositionists charge that this was why he moved against Barletta.

Both Spadafora and Mauro Zuniga, an opposition leader kidnapped the previous month by unknown assailants (see below), had the inscription "F-8" on their backs. This link raises the possibility that some sort of death squad may be operating in Panama. Some speculate that "F-8" is the successor of the infamous Seventh Force, a pro-government squad that was active during the 1984 elections.

b. Disappearance

On August 21, 1985, Dr. Mauro Zuniga, the head of the umbrella opposition group COCINA (National Civil Coordinating Committee), was abducted at gunpoint from a restaurant in Santiago, Veraguas Province. Some hours later, Zuniga was found along the side of the road in the far western Province of Chiriqui, badly beaten but alive. His abductors did not identify themselves or make any demands. The only lead was the inscription "F-8 terrorist" which had been scratched on his back with a ball point pen. The opposition press blamed the PDF intelligence unit for the kidnapping. The PDF promised a full and prompt investigation, but to date there have been no leads or arrests in connection with the case.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits measures that harm the physical, mental, or moral integrity of persons under detention. While opposition sources occasionally complain about the treatment of detainees, there is no indication of widespread or systematic abuse of prisoners.

Overcrowding in Panama's prisons continues to be a major problem. This is attributed to a lack of economic resources. The average population of the Central Men's Prison in Panama City, built in 1925 to accommodate 225, is now well over 700, and most detainees sleep on the floor. Supplemental foodstuffs and other prison services not normally provided may be purchased by those able to afford them. There have been occasional newspaper articles decrying the conditions in the prisons and charging that they constitute a violation of internationally recognized human rights.

PANAMA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides for habeas corpus and requires warrants for arrest, except for those arrested while committing a crime. The 1983 amendments to the Constitution strengthened procedural safeguards for arrested individuals. The police must inform an accused person immediately of the reasons for his detention and of his constitutional and legal rights. Failure to make such charges personally to the accused has led to invalidation of sentences.

The Constitution states that a suspect may be detained for no more than 24 hours without being charged and brought before a magistrate. However, on August 8, 1985, Michael Petrovsky, a U.S. citizen, and Pedro Rognoni were detained by the investigative branch of the PDF (the Departamento Nacional de Investigaciones, or DENI) and accused of masterminding an alleged cocaine-smuggling scheme. The lawyer for the two filed a writ of habeas corpus, charging that they had been arrested without a warrant as required by the Constitution, and that the Government had no proof that a crime had been committed since the cocaine had apparently left the country. The Supreme Court denied the writ, ruling that DENI had sufficient, though unspecified, evidence to hold Rognoni and Petrovsky. After two months of detention without charge, Petrovsky was released on October 15, 1985. Rognoni remains in custody.

Some opposition groups have claimed that detainees are held incommunicado for up to a week after arrest before being brought before a magistrate, but there were no confirmed instances of this in 1985. An accused may be held in custody after being charged for as long as it takes to conduct the investigation and bring the case to trial. In some cases, primarily involving people of lower economic classes, pretrial detention has lasted as long as eight months. Such time is credited against any sentence imposed following conviction.

Under Panama's criminal code, a convict may be required to perform labor on public works projects if the sentencing judge so specifies. The prisoner's sentence is reduced by two days for every day spent in such work. This is the only legal provision for compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Persons charged with crimes are presumed innocent until proven guilty and have the right of counsel. The local bar association provides a public defender service for the indigent. The current court process allows for written presentations by the prosecution and defense without the presence of the accused. The documents produced are available for examination by both sides. According to authorities, the burden of proof rests on the prosecutor, but the right to appeal the verdict is available to the prosecution as well as to the defense. A new penal code was enacted in 1983, and a revision of the judicial code is under way. The proposed judicial code mandates public trials based on oral testimony and argument and gives the accused the right to be present.

Panamanian and foreign observers have noted that juvenile delinquents are occasionally tried and incarcerated as adults, especially when they are considered to be hardened criminals. Although the Constitution prohibits self-incrimination, there have been media reports that juveniles and poor people with criminal records have been detained and pressured during interrogation to confess to crimes they may not have committed. Other reported practices -- publicly criticized in the Panamanian press by government officials and private citizens -- include summary proceedings and convictions for misdemeanors by "night court" judges without duly prescribed defense counsel. A credible report stated that 251 of the 547 prisoners at the penal island of Coiba had been sentenced by "night court" judges and that all but four had been convicted and sentenced on the same night they were arrested. Many of these prisoners had been given the maximum sentence of one year.

The Supreme Court is chartered to uphold the Constitution and the laws, and magistrates and judges are legally independent. The constitutional article on the judiciary itself was extensively redrafted to help strengthen its independence from the executive branch by making explicit its right to rule on and annul administrative acts. Magistrates are also now barred from simultaneously holding other public office or otherwise participating in politics. However, there are widespread charges that the judiciary is subservient to the PDF. Panamanian opposition groups believe the Spadafora and Zuniga cases have strengthened that view.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Private family life generally is respected. Under the Constitution, judicial warrants must be issued before officials may enter homes.

Both government and opposition media have reported that many government employees are forced to join the political party of the individual who heads the agency in which they work or face dismissal. As cabinet shifts occur, these employees often change political affiliations. There have also been frequent and credible charges that government employees are required to take part in official demonstrations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil and Political Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, press, and other forms of communication. There is no interference with academic freedom. The views of government opponents are made known through their speeches, and through the press and radio. The main opposition newspaper, La Prensa, the tabloid Extra, and various radio commentators publicly criticize government programs and policies. Opponents also freely and often vehemently criticize Panamanian civilian and military officials, including the President and the Commander of the PDF. In the context of President Barletta's forced resignation the opposition papers La Prensa and Extra again came under considerable pressure. During the night of September 27-28, PDF intelligence personnel surrounded La Prensa. Nevertheless, La Prensa's normal edition of the 28th was delivered, albeit late. However, the opposition tabloid Extra claims all 7,000 provincial editions of that date were confiscated. The city edition went out without incident.

In the extremely tense atmosphere after the Spadafora murder, opposition columnist Guillermo Sanchez Borbon went into hiding after announcing that military intelligence intended to arrest him. His column did not appear for several days. Other opposition press employees have spoken of incidents of intimidation, particularly telephone threats. In mid-October television and radio commentators were warned by a high-ranking member of the PDF not to criticize the military establishment and to reduce or eliminate coverage of the Spadafora case. One opposition commentator permanently canceled his radio broadcast, citing official pressure. In this same period, there were unusual sporadic interruptions of electric power during opposition radio and TV news broadcasts on the occasion of opposition protest demonstrations.

The three newspapers of the ERSA media group are responsive to directives from the PDF and Government. Absent guidance, however, individual columnists write freely about a wide range of topics. ERSA became a center of attention in March of 1985 when the Inter-American Press Association (IAPA), which was holding its annual meeting in Panama at the time, passed a resolution calling for the return of the ERSA papers to their previous owners, who include opposition leader Arnulfo Arias. The papers had been expropriated following the 1968 military coup that led to the rise of the late General Omar Torrijos. Employees of ERSA replied by holding a mock funeral for IAPA, an event that received broad coverage in all three ERSA dailies.

Law 11 of 1978, which allows for the closing of newspapers and the jailing of owners without due process, continues in force despite requests by the opposition media and the Inter-American Press Association that it be repealed.

Opposition groups have experienced serious problems gaining access to the electronic media, with all but one Panamanian television station and over 90 percent of radio stations controlled either by the Government or by pro-government groups. Opposition groups assert that they are unable to acquire radio or television licenses from the Government.

In the course of a particularly bitter election in the banana workers' union of Bocas Del Toro Province in February 1985, the opposition radio station "Ondas Del Caribe" was bombed. No one was charged in the incident. The station was later fined heavily for having hired an illegal Nicaraguan technician. In June 1985 a government station in Bocas Del Toro, Radio Teribe, was severely damaged by arson. Again, no charges have been filed in the case.

There is no censorship of foreign newspapers, magazines, books, or cable television programming.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right of peaceful assembly. Twenty-four hours' advance notice but not government permission is required for open-air meetings. Professional, social and political groups meet without interference in Panama.

Panama has a well-established organized labor movement and a liberal labor code, and union rights are generally respected. Panama has both politically aligned and independent labor organizations. One of the strongest groups is a local of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME), and a second is the regional branch of the National Maritime Union, both AFL-CIO affiliates. Union elections are democratic and generally free from government interference.

PANAMA

The Government periodically consults with the major labor organizations on a range of public policy issues. Both collective bargaining and strikes are constitutionally guaranteed worker rights, although government regulations restrict or forbid these practices for certain public sector employees. However, the Government appears not to have taken action against public employees of various agencies who struck during 1985. The rights to organize and strike are likewise restricted for employees in the Colon Free Zone and the offshore banking industry, which is a source of concern within the democratic trade union movement internationally.

A controversial issue in 1985 was the perceived need to reform the labor code in order to stimulate investment. No legislative proposals have as yet been publicized, and it is unlikely that any legislation would pass that would adversely affect internationally recognized worker rights.

The PDF has taken strong measures against certain demonstrators. In May 1985, the PDF used riot police and combat-equipped troops to break up a demonstration by residents of two neighborhoods that were to be affected by the construction of a new garbage dump. The riot police reportedly used clubs, rubber hoses and cattle prods indiscriminately, even beating a legislator who represented the area in the Legislative Assembly. The demonstration was broken up when regular troops armed with tear gas, shotguns, and M-16 rifles arrived. The Minister of Government and Justice, the nominal civilian head of the PDF, denied that he had ordered the riot police to attack the demonstrators. He said that the commander on the scene was responsible for taking whatever measures he deemed necessary.

The PDF did not interfere with the funeral of Hugo Spadafora or with a large rally and march led by the Spadafora family and opposition groups October 9 to protest alleged PDF involvement in the murder and to demand a special investigative commission.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees religious freedom to all, and there is no state religion. There are no restrictions on the free exercise of religious beliefs, including proselytizing, and a broad range of religious groups operates freely in Panama. Religious beliefs are not an issue in any of the national political parties.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution permits Panamanians to move freely within the country and to emigrate, and these rights are honored in practice. It also prohibits compulsory exile and extradition of Panamanian nationals to other countries. Some persons exiled by previous regimes have returned and resumed full participation in Panamanian society. Exiles choosing to remain abroad have been publicly urged to return to Panama. Panama has accepted displaced persons of widely differing ideological persuasions, and hundreds of displaced persons and self-imposed exiles from other countries reside in Panama. Several hundred Salvadorans originally sponsored by the Government of Panama are now supporting themselves in a resettlement village. Perhaps as many as several thousand Cubans are now in Panama awaiting onward emigration; there has been a sharp increase in the number of Nicaraguans entering Panama as well. No cases of forcible repatriation of political exiles occurred in 1985.

However, the influx of displaced--and largely disadvantaged--persons from Central America has resulted in newspaper articles warning of a "migration bomb." In August, PDF Commander Noriega pledged that the PDF would do all in its power to close the borders to illegal aliens from Central America.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The 1984 general elections, the first direct presidential and legislative elections in 16 years, have continued to be a source of discontent. It is now widely accepted in Panama that Nicolas Ardito Barletta did not win the elections in 1984, but rather that the PDF engineered his victory by tampering with the vote-counting procedures. This perceived lack of legitimacy made it difficult for Barletta to operate effectively. The leading role of the PDF in removing him confirmed the widely-held view that Barletta was not independent of the military establishment.

The circumstances surrounding Barletta's departure call into question the results of the process of transition from military rule to democratic civilian government. On this subject PDF Commander Noriega was quoted by the Spanish paper El Pais as saying, "The Panamanian Defense Forces have a role of guidance toward complete democracy. This is a period of transition. ...We attempted to leap toward full democracy, but that leap did not lie within the scope of national realities."

On the other hand, the Legislative Assembly elected in 1984 is, with a few notable exceptions, a legitimately elected body. There are opposition complaints that the majority Partido Revolucionario Democrático (PRD), which is considered to be controlled by the PDF, consistently manipulates debate and unjustly declares opposition legislators out of order when they try to speak. However, there are numerous occasions when the opposition side of a debate comes through in radio and print media coverage. There have also been a number of sharply split votes, with the PRD winning only by dint of its one-vote margin of absolute majority.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has espoused human rights causes in the Organization of American States, the United Nations, and elsewhere. A private human rights committee formed in Panama in 1978 continued to operate freely in 1985 and expressed concern over the local political and human rights situation.

Articles and editorials critical of the PDF's record on human rights and listing specific violations appear frequently in the opposition press, many signed by the members of the human rights committee.

Amnesty International Report 1985, which covers events in 1984, did not mention Panama. Freedom House rates Panama "partly free."

PANAMA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Panama's total population in 1985 was estimated at 2,180,000; the annual population growth rate rose to 2.1 percent in 1985 (from 1.8 percent in 1984). Real per capita gross domestic product was estimated at $2,075 in 1984, falling from $2,120 in 1983.

Recent economic performance has been weak, largely as a result of deteriorating regional and worldwide conditions. Approximately 22 percent of the country's population live in extreme poverty, unable to provide properly for basic necessities. Although a large percentage of the poor is found in rural areas, the trend toward urbanization has increased the number of poor in cities as well. Current estimates of unemployment rise to 20 percent, with estimates as high as 50 percent in the district of San Miguelito and the city of Colon. Infant mortality rose to 24.5 per 1,000 live births in 1985 (from 20.1 in 1984). Life expectancy at birth was 71.4 years in 1985. In 1980, 82 percent of the population had access to safe water (100 percent urban, 65 percent rural). The ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was calculated at 102 percent in 1977. All children attend grade school; the adjusted primary school enrollment ratio was 113.66 percent in 1982. The overall adult literacy rate was estimated at 87.10 percent in 1980, although the rate in rural areas was put at 61.8, while the urban rate was 93.7.

Panama has a comprehensive and complex labor code which provides liberal benefits to workers. Labor is prohibited for children under 14, or under 15 if the child has not completed primary schooling. All types of hazardous and night work are prohibited for children less than 18 years of age. Children from 12 to 14 are permitted to do farm work or domestic work as long as the work is light and does not interfere with schooling. The maximum work week is 48 hours, and the law requires that substantial bonuses be paid for overtime. The labor code requires compensation sufficient for a decent life for all work performed. The labor code contains extensive and detailed health and safety rules for all places of employment. The Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare attempts to ensure conformity, but its limited resources hamper strict enforcement.

Panama's social system and legal code accord equal treatment to women and men. The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, birth, social class, sex, religion, or political views. Women are accorded equal political rights under Panamanian law. Women play an active role in political and governmental affairs, and hold a number of important positions. The 67 members of the new legislature include four women. Of the 134 alternate legislators, 23 are women. Three independent agency heads are women. Women also serve as the president of the ruling party, one of the three members of the electoral tribunal, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Several women's organizations, such as UNIDAD and Accion Feminina, are active in Panamanian politics. While Panamanian women enjoy full social freedom, they still do not have the same opportunities for advancement as do men. This reflects both traditional bias and the current difficult economic climate. As Panamanian law does not recognize community property, divorced or deserted women can be and on occasion are left destitute.

PANAMA

Female employment in urban Panama is concentrated in the service sector, where wages are generally lower. Although the constitution mandates equal pay for equal work, wages paid to women are frequently lower than those for equivalent work performed by males and increase at a slower rate. Comparatively fewer women than men participate in the labor force, and their participation seems to fluctuate as the job market expands and contracts. Government statistics showed that in 1978 (the latest available), women made up about 29 percent of the economically active work force. Particularly in the poorer areas such as San Miguelito, many women are heads of households obligated to work for the government, usually as street cleaners, in order to receive government support funds. The labor code gives pregnant employees 12 weeks mandatory maternity leave and the right to return to their jobs.

Panama is a racially mixed country. The traditional monopoly of power by persons of European descent was effectively ended with the ouster of the civilian president by the National Guard in 1968. Blacks, Asians, and mestizos are now active politically, and are represented at senior levels of Government and the Panama Defense Forces, and in the new legislature, where there are also five Indians.

Prominent among the minorities which retain some degree of separate identity are English-speaking Blacks of Antillean descent, Jews, Arabs, Greeks, Chinese, East Indians, and North Americans. All of these groups play roles in Panama's urban economy well out of proportion to their numbers. There is no discrimination in law against these or any other social, religious, or cultural groups, except that naturalized citizens are forbidden to hold certain categories of elected office, and retail trade is constitutionally restricted to native Panamanians. While innumerable exceptions exist, Caucasians, Asians, and mestizos tend to be better off economically and occupy higher positions in Government than Blacks and Indians; however, the latter groups participate fully in both the public and private sectors. Indian tribes receive government assistance, particularly in the areas of public health and welfare, and education. They are not restricted to their tribal areas, but most remain there by choice, reflecting longstanding resistance to assimilation. Indians enjoy full voting rights and all other rights of Panamanian citizenship and are politically active. They play significant roles in the government of four provinces. In October of 1984 President Barletta, in keeping with a campaign promise, named a Kuna Indian Vice Minister of Health, the first time an Indian has held cabinet rank in Panama. He became Vice Minister of Government and Justice (which controls Indian affairs) in the cabinet shuffle following President Barletta's ouster.

Panama's Kuna Indians mostly reside in a self-governing, semi-autonomous district, the comarca of San Blas, established in 1953. The Embera (Choco) Indians, who live in Darien Province, eastern Panama, gained government approval for their own homeland in 1983 when a law was passed establishing their autonomous district or comarca. The Ministry of Government and Justice has completed and passed to the legislature for action a proposed law creating a comarca for the numerous and widely spread Guaymi Indians of western Panama. The Guaymi are reportedly not satisfied with the geographic limits of the proposed comarca, which would encompass an area of mostly poor land on which only one-third of the Guaymi now live; the law is expected to be debated in the Legislative Assembly.

PARAGUAY

Paraguay has had authoritarian regimes throughout its history. Since 1954, President Alfredo Stroessner has governed Paraguay, ruling through the Colorado Party, the military and police forces, and the government bureaucracy, all of which he dominates. He was elected in 1983 to a seventh term in a controlled election process. The situation in Paraguay continues to be characterized by the subordination of the legislative and judicial branches of government to the executive and by the domination of the nation's political life by the ruling Colorado Party.

Elections are held every five years for the presidency, the national legislature, and for municipal councils. However, the opposition's ability to conduct an effective campaign is severely restricted by the Government, and in practice there is no effective challenge to President Stroessner's authority. In the 1985 municipal elections, the opposition did not win a majority or plurality in any of the country's 190 municipalities.

After a period of rapid economic growth in the late 1970's and early 1980's, Paraguay entered a steep recession. Following two years of decline, an agriculture-led economic recovery commenced in 1984. Economic policies and international prices from Paraguay's exports, however, have not evolved in a manner expected to sustain recovery. The balance of payments remains in a deficit position, and substantial delays on servicing international obligations still pose problems.

There continue to be violations of civil and political liberties, though the number of serious incidents has declined significantly since the mid-1970's. As has been the case almost without interruption since 1929, the State of Siege provision of the Constitution remains in force. Under it, the President may order the detention of any individual without trial for an indefinite period. The police forces regularly arrest and hold persons arbitrarily without due process of law, sometimes citing the State of Siege power and sometimes Paraguay's "anti-subversive" statute or, as was the case in most of the detentions which occurred in 1985, they simply give no rationale. Constitutional guarantees, such as protection of the integrity of the individual, the requirement for judicial warrants, freedom of assembly and association, the right of habeas corpus, and the provision for a prompt and impartial trial, can be ignored by government officials. Although there is no formal system of prior censorship, there are serious unwritten limitations on what the media are free to report and comment upon. Trade union activities are also restricted and, in practice, strikes are not permitted under the State of Siege.

During 1985 the subtle forms of repression such as short periods of arbitrary detention without charges, and efforts to intimidate the media through threats and closings, increased slightly while gross violations such as torture or imprisonment of political opponents declined. Some investigations of torture charges were initiated. The six political prisoners held at the end of 1984 were all released by the end of 1985. The Paraguayan Government became more responsive in international human rights forums to answer and clarify charges against it, and it requested a direct contact mission from the International Labor Organization (ILO) with a view to improving its compliance with international standards.

PARAGUAY

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported cases in 1985 of killings for political motives by the Government, political parties or other entities.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported disappearance cases in 1985, nor have there been any such reports since 1980.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In this year as in past years, there have been credible charges of torture and physical abuse by police authorities against prisoners, which have led in some cases to disciplinary actions and in others to denial of the charges. There were nine reports of such mistreatment or violence in 1985. In February, a police commissioner and two police conscripts were charged with the death of a prisoner. They claimed the prisoner committed suicide by hanging himself, but he was found to have died from a blow to the head. In April, a factional political dispute led to the jailing of five ruling Colorado Party members. They charged police officials with having tortured them and the officers were dismissed and charged. In June, in Ypacarai, Benedicto Lopez was detained and held for 14 days during which period he claimed to have been severely beaten. He died ten days after his release, from pneumonia according to local authorities.

Also in June, a domestic employee who was interrogated about a robbery asserted that she had been tortured by electric shock; the police denied the charge. Two other cases were also reported in June where robbery suspects alleged torture. In July, in Concepcion, a prisoner was killed, supposedly while escaping. An investigation resulted in two police officers and two conscripts being charged. Also in July, a navy conscript died in police custody, allegedly from the accidental discharge of his gun. However, his body showed signs of torture. His father's efforts to obtain an investigation have had no apparent effect.

These reports of police violence were atypical in that they appeared in the press. Physical mistreatment of suspects and prisoners by the police is believed to occur frequently. The so-called "investigations police" are widely known for such actions.

In most cases, once formally arraigned, detainees go to regular prison facilities, where conditions are generally better than in police stations. Prisons are austere, especially the maximum security facilities used in more sensitive cases, which are administered directly by the Ministry of the Interior and the Asuncion police. Court and Justice Ministry officials visit the regional prison facilities several times each year to examine conditions and interview prisoners. They do not regularly visit the maximum security facilities, although representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross are permitted access.

PARAGUAY

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention and Exile

Detentions are used as a form of warning or punishment for those who criticize the Government or whose political beliefs or activities are deemed to be threatening. Sometimes individuals are picked up by the police, detained in local police stations where they are often held incommunicado and released after a few days, usually without formal charges having been brought. Other detentions may last for weeks.

Some such detentions have been justified by the authorities under the State of Siege provision of the Constitution, which provides that persons may be detained without trial, and that public meetings and demonstrations may be banned, in the event of war, foreign invasion, internal disturbance, or the serious threat of any of these conditions. Despite constitutional requirements that the State of Siege be imposed only for limited periods, in practice it has been in effect almost continuously since 1929. Technically, the State of Siege was lifted outside Asuncion in 1978. In practice, backed by a court ruling that prisoners may be moved to Asuncion and held there, Paraguayan authorities proceed as if the State of Siege were still in force throughout the country.

Implementing legislation called for by the Constitution has never been passed. In the absence of implementing legislation, the Government and Courts take the position that State of Siege restrictions supersede the safeguards on human rights contained elsewhere in the Constitution and legal code. Several prominent legal scholars and the opposition political parties contest this interpretation.

Seventy-two persons were reported publicly to have been arbitrarily detained for political activities in 1985. In these cases the Government occasionally cited Law 209, the "Anti-Subversive" Statute, a loosely worded law which provides for imprisonment of persons who "foment hatred," defame members of the Government, commit a variety of other acts, or are members of the Communist Party. All 72 individuals were released after varying periods of custody.

The detention of two politicians who attended a meeting of their non-recognized opposition party in Itacurubi in April is illustrative. They were detained for seven days without being informed of the reasons for their detention, and their detention was not brought to the attention of a judge, actions which violate specific provisions of the Constitution.

In January, fourteen members of the non-recognized Authentic Radical Liberal Party were arrested for holding a meeting on private property. Twenty-two members of that party were detained in similar circumstances in May. A member of the recognized opposition Febrerista Party was detained without charges for forty-three days at mid-year.

Arbitrary detention has also been used against political exiles who have returned. Over the years many political opponents of the Government have either been forced or have gone voluntarily into exile. In December, 1983, the Interior Minister stated that with the exception of two prominent opposition figures--Domingo Laino and Luis Resck--all exiles would be permitted to return to Paraguay. As a result, a number of political figures, many of whom had been in exile for over twenty years, returned. Prominent among the returnees were officials of the Colorado Popular Movement (MOPOCO), a dissident faction of the ruling Colorado Party whose leaders were expelled from Paraguay in 1960. A number of the returnees have been subjected to various forms of harassment, temporary detention, and internal exile by the Government. Four MOPOCO members were detained for over a month each between September and October--all without charges. The Government has not changed its ban on the return of Drs. Laino and Resck or Agosto Roa Bastos, who was added to this list in 1984. In December Roque Ruiz Diaz, one of the six political prisoners released during the year, was sent into exile in Argentina.

In June, Dr. Heriberto Alegre, a respected lawyer, was released after nine months detention without a trial. His arrest reportedly resulted from suspicions that he encouraged landless campesinos to seize land. However, Dr. Alegre was defending the campesinos after the seizure had taken place.

The number of arbitrary detentions in 1985 represents a continuation of the decline in such cases since the mid-1970's when they were counted in the hundreds.

The Paraguayan Labor Code does not permit the practice of forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Paraguay, like most other Latin American countries, does not have trial by jury. Trials are conducted almost exclusively by presentation of written documents to a judge, who then renders a decision. All judgments are automatically reviewed by an appellate-level judge, and appeals to the Supreme Court are possible. Part of the trial process is open to the public and trials are routinely reported in the press.

In theory numerous safeguards set forth in the Constitution and the Penal Code protect the rights of the individual during the trial process. However, the judiciary has traditionally been subject to extensive influence by the executive branch of the government and by the military. This, together with budgetary and other institutional failings in the judicial system, continues to compromise the ability of an accused person to receive a fair, speedy trial.

Nonetheless, over the past two years a number of changes have been made which many observers credit with having improved the quality and speed of the judicial process. Widespread changes in the personnel of the judiciary system, particularly judges and their clerks, are said to have reduced the amount of corruption. One judge was suspended during 1985 after having been charged with taking a bribe to keep a person out of a narcotics case. However, it is widely acknowledged that the courts still are not independent of the influence of the executive branch in politically sensitive cases.

Six persons considered political prisoners in last year's report had been released by the end of 1985. There were no new political prisoners added during the year. Two individuals whose cases, while involving criminal offenses, appear to have been affected in part by political factors continue to be incarcerated.

PARAGUAY

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Government and security forces do not intervene as a matter of course in the daily life of most citizens. The Constitution provides that, except to prevent the commission of a crime, private homes may not be entered without a judicial warrant.

Nonetheless, some private citizens complain that their right to privacy is being abused by the security authorities. Leaders of the Colorado Popular Movement (MOPOCO) claim that they are followed by the police wherever they go, day and night. They also complain that their telephones are tapped, their private correspondence monitored, and their ability to move about restricted. The police have reportedly told them that they may not meet in groups of more than three, and it is claimed that those whom leaders of the group contact are later questioned. Other opposition figures and critics of the Government have similarly complained about interference with their mail, particularly foreign correspondence, and telephone tapping. Although the police in October 1984 denied the charges made against them by members of the Colorado Popular Movement, it is widely believed that the charges in fact are true. Finally, although publications critical of the Government circulate freely in the country, there continue to be cases in which foreign newspapers, magazines, or books containing material critical of the Government are confiscated at the port of entry.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The closure of Paraguay's most independent and popular newspaper, "ABC Color," in March 1984 was the most serious violation of freedom of the press in many years. Despite broad guarantees in the Constitution of freedom of speech and the press, in practice there are limits to the amount and kinds of criticism which the Government will tolerate. Such things as direct criticism of the President, the military, and key civilian leaders, are usually avoided by the major newspapers, as well as sensitive topics such as defense matters and corruption, human rights, Colorado Party policy and certain government policies such as foreign exchange rates, the State of Siege and public sector investment. It is widely believed that "ABC Color's" continual pressure against these limits was the reason for its closure.

The Government's decision to shut down "ABC Color" was appealed to the Supreme Court which ruled that the Minister of Interior had acted within his powers and in the public interest. Since then the Government has considered the case closed.

A certain measure of press freedom does still exist. The Febrerista Revolutionary Party, one of the recognized opposition parties, publishes a weekly newspaper, "El Pueblo," which has printed strong criticism of the Government and its policies, subjects that daily newspapers shy away from. The Catholic Church publishes a newspaper, "Sendero," which reopened after "ABC Color" was closed and now appears twice a month. It too has printed articles criticizing government policies and actions and touches on subjects which the Government considers sensitive. A new monthly opinion magazine, "Nuestro Tiempo" appeared in July. It is backed by a Roman Catholic Church official and is written largely by former

"ABC Color" staffers, one of whom was briefly detained by the investigations police shortly after the magazine's debut. This magazine is also being harassed and its most recent editions could not be printed in Paraguay. Copies entering the country from Brazil were seized at the border. The unrecognized Popular Colorado Movement (MOPOCO) publishes a monthly newsletter "Patria Libre," which regularly lambastes the Government. Similarly, the Colorado Party publishes a daily paper which regularly and often shrilly attacks the political opposition. The Government claims that it permits these non-daily newspapers considerable latitude because their political bias is clearly established. Also, these publications have less impact because of their small circulation and less frequent appearance.

The daily papers report activities of the political opposition, both recognized and unrecognized, as well as information on charges of abuse of authority. However, their coverage is not marked by the aggressive investigatory journalism which characterized "ABC Color."

Paraguay's two television stations are both privately owned. Their news programs are carefully self-censored and closely monitored by the Government. They always carry commentary laudatory of the Government, and reporting on the activities of opposition parties is virtually nonexistent.

Two of Asuncion's radio stations, Radio Caritas, which is affiliated with the Catholic Church, and Radio Nanduti, which is privately owned, have been notable for their willingness to broadcast more sensitive items of local news. Radio Nanduti, in particular, has specialized in carrying interviews with politicians of all parties, including those which are not legally recognized, sometimes on sensitive issues. As a result, the station was shut down for ten days in 1985. The station's owner, Humberto Rubin, has received occasional warnings from the authorities about airing the views of "unrecognized" politicians and about giving too much coverage to the closure of "ABC Color". He was detained by the police for 34 hours for allegedly having broadcast "sensationalist disinformation" about a high government official, a charge which he rebutted. The station operates "illegally" in the sense that the Government has refused to accept payment for renewal of the station's license for several years.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Despite constitutional guarantees concerning the rights of peaceful assembly and association, these rights are often violated in practice. Under the State of Siege it is technically necessary to obtain permission for any assembly, regardless of purpose, of more than five unrelated persons.

Generally, however, the provision is not applied to organizations which are non-political in nature and is strictly enforced only in the case of gatherings sponsored by opposition political parties or other organizations critical of the Government. For example, a group of opposition Liberal Party members who formed a movement to reunify the various sections of that divided party were denied permits to hold public meetings to give publicity to their movement.

On the other hand, there were occasions when the Government did permit public meetings by those political parties which are not legally recognized. For example, the Christian Democratic Party was able to hold the inauguration of a new center for training party members in Asuncion. Similarly, while the police normally do not permit public demonstrations, even peaceful ones, that criticize the Government or its policies, occasionally such events do take place.

Most of the labor unions in Paraguay are members of the Federation of Paraguayan Workers, which claims to represent over 90 percent of organized labor. The Federation is carefully controlled by the Government and does not actively attempt to defend the interests of the Paraguayan work force. The leadership of the Federation, and of most of its member unions, is not freely elected by the membership, but rather is chosen on the basis of acceptability to the Government. Union officials who differ with the Federation's policies are often harassed or fired by their employers, with tacit support of the Government.

Paraguayan workers are not permitted to organize freely. In 1985, a bus drivers union leader, along with other activists, was fired from his job. He was then arbitrarily detained twice during the year for his efforts to organize "solidarity" rallies to pressure for reinstatement. It is virtually impossible to call a legal strike.

There do exist a number of independent unions in Paraguay, several organized at the company level. Some have been strong enough to bargain with management, despite efforts by the private firms--sometimes supported by the Government--to resist their efforts. Some of the independent unions have been granted legal recognition by the Government, but others have not, making it difficult or impossible for them to bargain effectively. The Government is less likely to recognize groups which it perceives to be more independent of its control.

The activities of the independent unions are carefully monitored by the security forces and the Ministry of Labor. Their leaders are often summoned by officials of the police or the Ministry of Labor for questioning and, on occasion, for warnings about those activities of which the Government disapproves.

The Federation of Paraguayan Workers does not maintain ties with any of the public or private international labor organizations. It was expelled from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) several years ago. The ICFTU in late 1983 complained that the Government was systematically violating the rights of the Paraguayan working class. Some of the independent labor unions in Paraguay do maintain ties with the International Labor Organization. The ICFTU, in criticizing the Paraguayan Government, has called for greater international support for these independent unions.

An international meeting of the Catholic Action Workers Movement (MOAC), under the sponsorship of the Paraguayan Roman Catholic Church, took place in July. Three Colombian participants were detained by Government authorities and sent out of the country because they were carrying publications of "an eminently subversive nature." The Colombians were also carrying money to defray conference expenses, which they charge was taken from them by authorities. The Government denied this latter charge.

PARAGUAY

Another international conference, of ORIT (the ICFTU's Organizacion Regional Interamericana de Trabajadores) affiliated labor leaders, took place in Asuncion sponsored by the Paraguayan free trade union movement, Intersindical. It was criticized in the government media but was not interfered with beyond the presence of the police, who routinely attend all labor meetings.

In the ILO, in June 1985, Paraguay requested a direct contact mission to treat the issue of the application of conventions number 87 (freedom of association) and 98 (right to organize and collective bargaining). These areas of concern deal with the lack of guarantees in Paraguayan law for such rights as collective bargaining, strikes in public sector enterprises, and firing without indemnification or previous notice. The acceptance by Paraguay of the need for a direct contact mission represented a step forward; previously the Government of Paraguay had completely disregarded ILO expressions of concern. The Direct Contact Mission occurred in the fall, and the annual ILO report reflected the Government's position on the cases under review. As a result, the ILO made some recommendations to the Government for more careful future observance of ILO conventions.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution establishes Roman Catholicism as the official state religion, but it also guarantees freedom of conscience for other denominations. With very few exceptions, this freedom is respected. Adherence to a particular creed confers no advantages within Paraguayan society and conversion from one faith to another is permissible. Many denominations conduct their activities freely, and missionaries are, for the most part, permitted to enter the country and proselytize. However, Paraguayan law prohibits the granting of legal status to new religious groups, and a few evangelical churches have been unable to obtain government approval for their operations. The Jehovah's Witnesses lost legal registration in 1979. The church filed an appeal with the Supreme Court, but no action has ever been taken on it. Further, under orders of the Ministry of Education, Jehovah's Witness children have been expelled from school because of their refusal, as a matter of their faith, to salute the national flag or sing the national anthem. Lower courts have found in favor of the children, but the cases have been overturned upon appeal, and the first test case is now before the Supreme Court.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for freedom of movement, which is usually not restricted within the country. Most citizens may enter or leave the country freely. However, members of one unrecognized political group have complained about a police requirement that they report any intention to leave the country 48 hours in advance. In addition, opposition figures and human rights activists continue to complain about difficulties in obtaining passports. Nonetheless, there appear to have been fewer incidents of such restrictions on travel recently, and a number of prominent critics of the Government have traveled to international meetings. Three Paraguayans who live in exile and are not permitted to return despite the 1983 open door policy are Domingo Laino, the former head of the Authentic Radical Liberal Party; Luis Resck, the Vice President of the unrecognized Christian Democratic Party; and Agosto Roa Bastos, a leftist who is arguably Paraguay's most famous novelist. Members of the outlawed Paraguayan Communist Party living in exile would likely face imprisonment if they returned. During 1985 the Government used State of Siege powers to relegate three individuals to internal exile.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Stroessner dominates the Paraguayan political system. He rules through the Colorado Party, which administers public patronage, through the military and police forces, which maintain public order and guarantee the security of the regime, and through the governmental bureaucracy. The legislative branch, consisting of a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies, is responsive to the desires of the President on all important matters. The Colorado Party's two-thirds majority in both houses gives it complete control of the legislature. There have been very few occasions under President Stroessner's rule when the legislative branch has rejected government proposals or policy. The legislative branch also automatically includes representatives of the opposition. Their one-third of the seats, divided among the two recognized opposition parties that present candidates, allow them to express their views and criticize the Government. Yet even though they have more seats than they actually have earned in recent elections, they have no real power to affect the workings of the legislature.

General elections are held every five years for the presidency and the two houses of the legislature and were held most recently in 1983. Municipal elections, which were held in 1985, also occur every five years. The law requires that all Paraguayans 18 to 60 years of age vote. However, sanctions for not voting are not usually applied except for public service employees. Two of the three legally recognized opposition parties participate in the electoral process; the third has participated in the past, but it currently declines to do so on the grounds that the Government's control over the political process makes such participation meaningless. In 1985, as in past elections, the absence of some opposition political parties, the system of indirect selection of candidates, and the control of the electoral machinery by the dominant Colorado Party resulted in a seriously flawed election. Secret ballot provisions were frequently abused, votes were counted in many cases without the presence of opposition poll watchers, and the Colorado Party ended up with over 100 percent of the votes of registered voters in some instances.

Access to positions in the government, as well as in the officer ranks of the military and the police, is in practice limited to members of the Colorado Party. Individuals often join the party for economic and social advantages, such as enrollment in the national university or permission to bid on public contracts. At the local level, police and other government officials use their considerable powers and influence to support the Colorado Party. The opposition has yet to be awarded even one municipal election contest among the 190 municipalities of the country.

In addition to the three legally recognized opposition parties, there also exist three political parties which do not enjoy juridical recognition from the Government, and therefore cannot participate in the political process. These parties, the Christian Democratic Party, the Authentic Radical Liberal Party, and the Popular Colorado Movement (MOPOCO) are joined with the recognized Febrerista Party in the opposition coalition, the National Accord. The National Accord has as one of its primary tenets nonparticipation in elections until the election process has been opened up. Regardless of their legal status, all the National Accord parties are subject to even greater limitations on their political activities by the authorities than are the recognized opposition parties.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government describes negative comments about its human rights performance from outside sources as unwarranted interference in Paraguay's internal affairs. Nonetheless, the Government has recently begun to respond to inquiries from organizations such as the United Nations Human Rights Commission and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. In 1984 the UNHRC adopted a resolution concerning the impact of the State of Siege in Paraguay. The Paraguayan Government has generally cooperated with the Commission. The Government has never agreed to a long-standing request from the Inter-American Human Rights Commission that it be invited to visit Paraguay.

The most recent visits by private human rights organizations were in 1984, when the Inter-American Press Association and America's Watch each sent missions. They were received and permitted wide access, although not until after initial difficulties which displayed the Paraguayan Government's ambivalence towards such visits. While for the most part willing to allow visits by human rights activists, the Government rejects any suggestion that serious human rights problems exist in Paraguay.

The Government allowed international efforts to determine whether Joseph Mengele, the Nazi war criminal, was still in Paraguay, despite its repeated assertions that Mengele was nowhere in the country. The Government points to the confirmation of Mengele's residence and death in Brazil as indicative that the international media are too ready to believe adverse information concerning Paraguay.

A number of local private organizations continued to be active during 1985 in trying to protect individual liberties. These included the Inter-Faith Committee, which is supported by three church groups, the Paraguayan Human Rights Commission, the Paraguayan Chapter of the Association of Latin American Lawyers for the Defense of Human Rights, and the Union of Paraguayan Women. The opposition political parties and certain of the media also have sought to publicize human rights problems and to express support for a more open and democratic society. These human rights groups have made known cases involving alleged human rights violations and provided legal assistance to individuals. Their efforts have also helped to keep human rights abuses under international scrutiny and to secure the release of a number of detainees. As it is with foreign organizations concerned about human rights problems, the Government is critical of the work of local human rights organizations. Some local human rights activists complain of government harassment, which they attribute to their public criticism of human rights abuses.

PARAGUAY

Amnesty International Report 1985, which covers events in 1984, expressed concern about 30 prisoners of conscience, most of whom faced charges under Law 209 which, according to Amnesty International, "has been used increasingly to prosecute people for the peaceful expression of their beliefs." Concern was also expressed about short term arrests under state of siege provisions, as well as legal proceedings in political trials which did not appear to conform to internationally recognized standards. Freedom House rated Paraguay "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Paraguay's population, estimated to be 3.7 million in 1985 and growing at a rate of 3 percent per year, is small in relation to its land area of 157,047 square miles. The relative economic prosperity from the mid-1970's to the early 1980's pushed Paraguay into a middle-income developing country category with a per capita gross domestic product surpassing $1,000. Agriculture is the most important economic activity, accounting for nearly one-third of gross domestic product, one-half of employment, and over 95 percent of merchandise exports. Probably because of the relative abundance of good land, urban poverty and landlessness -- though on the rise -- are not as apparent in Paraguay as in many other developing countries. Since economic policies and international prices for Paraguay's exports have not evolved in a manner conducive to a sustained recovery, the balance of payments remains in a deficit position, and there are substantial delays on international obligations.

Even though nearly one quarter of the central government budget is devoted to health and education, funds available for social programs are low relative to needs. Users complain that public health and social security funds go to hospital construction and the purchase of sophisticated equipment, while staffing for basic health needs and supplies of medicines are inadequate. Basic health indicators, however, are improving. Life expectancy at birth was 66 years in 1985 and infant mortality was measured at 52.2 per thousand live births, down sharply from 109 in 1972. The population as a whole is judged to have a daily caloric intake approximately 20 percent greater than the minimum daily requirement. In the agrarian-based Paraguayan economy, adequacy of food is seldom a problem, although an imbalanced diet sometimes leads to problems of malnutrition among the poor. Government and private agencies attempt to address the latter problem through stronger home extension services. In 1980, it was estimated that 21 percent of the population--39 percent in urban areas and 10 percent in rural areas--had access to safe drinking water.

Adult literacy was estimated at 80 percent in 1972. Over the years, education has become more widely available so that virtually all children receive some schooling. There are wide disparities, however, in the quality of primary education and the availability of secondary education in rural areas, where it is more difficult to provide services. Whereas nearly two-thirds of urban school children enter the sixth and last year of primary education, little more than a quarter of rural school children do so. The total retention rate from the first to the sixth year of primary education is about 40 percent. Furthermore, although nearly two-thirds of primary school graduates pass on to secondary education, only one-half that number (or about 13% of the population) actually graduate from secondary or intermediate level education.

PARAGUAY

The Paraguayan Labor Code contains minimum guarantees of worker rights and benefits. Temporary, public sector and domestic workers are not covered under this law. According to the code, maximum hours are set at eight hours per day or seven hours for night work, with one day of rest per week. A minimum wage is established by the labor authority depending on the type of work and the region, based on studies of the cost of living by the National Economic Coordinating Committee. The law provides for a one month annual bonus. Minors between 15 and 18 years of age may be employed only with parental authorization and cannot be employed in dangerous or unhealthy conditions. Between 12 and 15 years, these same standards apply in addition to the restriction that work be at a family enterprise, an apprenticeship, or an agricultural endeavor. Married women require their husband's consent to enter a labor contract; however labor contracts may not be denied to women who worked prior to marriage. Paid maternity leave of six weeks prior to and after birth is required. Day care centers for children under two years are mandatory for enterprises employing more than fifty women. Severance pay is specified and compensation is provided for in the case of unjustified dismissal. The labor code also governs conditions of safety, hygiene and comfort. Forced labor is not permitted. Finally, all workers must be enrolled in the Social Security Institute. The absence of a strong independent trade union movement, and the slowness of the labor law system to correct abuses, result in the frequent failure to apply the protections of the labor code.

The Constitution guarantees "the equality of civil and political rights" of women, while emphasizing the importance of marriage and the unity of the family. Women play a minor role in the political life of Paraguay. The executive and judicial branches of government have only a few prominent female officials, and there are three women in the 90-member parliament. Several others, including a prominent human rights leader and a municipal council member, enjoy independent political renown. While the traditional social system limits the participation of women, particularly those from lower income groups, increasing numbers are participating in business, the professions, and the artistic world. However, women usually receive less remuneration than men for comparable work. There are two organizations concerned with women's rights: the Paraguay League of Women's Rights, a wing of the ruling Colorado Party; and the Union of Paraguayan Women, an organization founded in 1982 by a former opposition Member of the Parliament.

Paraguay has an unassimilated Indian population estimated at 45,000. The government's National Indigenous Institute can purchase land on behalf of the Indians and expropriate private property to establish tribal homelands. Implementation of this program has been slow and its promise thus far unrealized, but during 1985 the Institute purchased land on behalf of Indians for the second consecutive year. The problems of the Indian population continue to receive wide publicity in the Paraguayan media. The most controversial issue during 1985 concerned efforts by a prominent businessman to forcibly evict Indians from a traditional tribal area on a large landholding he had purchased. This occurred despite assurances from the Institute that it would protect the Indians from expulsion.

PERU

Peru has a freely elected democratic government, with an executive branch headed by a president, a bicameral legislature, and an independent judiciary. Full political freedom is provided for in law and is respected in practice. Political representation in Congress ranges from conservative to Marxist. Independent trade unions are active, and opposition groups have excellent access to the media. In April 1985, Alan Garcia of the American Popular Revolutionary Alliance (APRA) party was elected President. He took office in July, marking the first transfer of power in forty years between two democratic governments. The new president has vowed to redress social and economic inequities, and to respect human rights.

Peru has a mixed economy with a large private sector, and private property is generally respected. Natural disasters and low commodity prices have seriously affected the economy in recent years, and per capita income has declined to about the 1965 level.

In 1985, the Maoist terrorist group Sendero Luminoso repeatedly carried out attacks in Lima and rural areas, killing police, military, and civilians, and began to use car bombs. The terrorists sought unsuccessfully to disrupt the 1985 electoral process.

Beginning in 1983, some in the security forces responded to Sendero with violence of their own, engaging in extrajudicial killings, disappearances, torture, and arbitrary detentions. Most of these violations occurred during 1983 and 1984 in the Ayacucho Emergency Zone where the declaration of a state of emergency delegated full civil and military authority to the armed forces. (Now applied in an area covering 19 provinces out of 126, the state of emergency suspends the rights of assembly and movement, lifts search warrant requirements, and allows indefinite detention of suspected criminals.) During 1985, reports of such abuses by security forces dropped sharply, reflecting both the previous and the present Governments' desire to improve respect for human rights. However, government investigations revealed that on two occasions in August members of the security forces had killed a total of 76 persons in the Ayacucho area. President Garcia responded swiftly, relieving three top military commanders, and the Government brought charges against the alleged offenders. The President and military leaders reaffirmed their opposition to the use of illegal methods against terrorists. The President also formed a Peace Commission of private individuals to explore the possibility of dialogue with the terrorists and to review pardons for persons claiming to have been unjustly accused of terrorism.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political killing became a significant problem in Peru in the early 1980's, following the initiation of armed activities by the Maoist terrorist group Sendero Luminoso. Committed to the overthrow of Peru's democratic system, Sendero targeted the police and the military, local officials, and peasants, sometimes after submitting victims to torture or mock trials.

PERU

Although the bulk of its attacks occurred in the remote mountain region of Ayacucho, Sendero also operated in other rural and urban areas, including Lima. During 1985, Sendero carried out several car bombings and a substantial number of machine gun attacks in the capital, often against police officers and military members. In late October, it attacked APRA party offices, killing four civilians, and assassinated a prison director, which served to confirm Sendero's intention to continue to engage in terrorism despite the change in administrations. All legitimate political groups in Peru, including the Marxist left, have condemned the brutal terrorism of Sendero Luminoso. Two other insurgent groups, the Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement (MRTA), an unrelated Castroite, urban-oriented group whose leaders reportedly have been tied to Cuba and Nicaragua, and its off-shoot the People's Revolutionary Command (CRP), were active in Peru in 1985, causing disruption and damaging property, but apparently causing no fatalities.

Beginning in January 1983, when the armed forces began to concentrate their counterterrorist effort in certain areas of the country, terrorist casualties mounted, but increasing numbers of innocent civilians died as well. Total deaths related to antiterrorist operations of the security forces are estimated by human rights groups as being in the thousands for 1980-85, including about 200 military and police personnel. Precise information is lacking on the number of civilian victims and their identities (terrorist or non-terrorist) as well as the identity of their assailants (terrorists, security forces, or peasant self-defense forces). Until September 1985 the Government did not issue communiques on clashes with terrorists in the emergency zones, and the threat of violence discouraged private observers from traveling in rural areas. Some allegations of government abuses appeared to be politically motivated, and the picture is further obscured by narcotics-related violence in the Tingo Maria area, as well as traditional peasant inter-communal conflicts, which may have increased in recent years. Nevertheless, Peruvian and foreign human rights groups believe that the security forces may have summarily executed a significant number of terrorists and suspected terrorists as it fought Sendero. Observers believe that the number of extrajudicial killings involving the security forces has declined significantly since early 1985, possibly in response to international and domestic pressure. However, foreign and domestic groups remained concerned about deaths caused by peasant self-defense forces. Membership in those forces was alleged to be involuntary in some cases.

In his July inaugural address, President Garcia rejected the use of illegal methods to fight terrorism. He reacted quickly when in September the media reported the discovery of seven bodies in an unmarked grave in Pucayacu (the scene of other mass graves discovered in 1984) and the deaths of as many as 69 peasants in the village of Llocllapampa, in the Accomarca district. Both locations are in the Ayacucho Emergency Zone, under military control. The Government ordered the military to investigate and report within a week. These reports revealed that three military members and a driver were responsible for the killings of seven persons in August at Pucayacu, and that an Army sublieutenant and three other officers were responsible for the Accomarca massacre of some 25 to 69 peasants. A separate investigation by the Senate Human Rights Commission supported these conclusions. In response, the President forced the resignation of the Head of the Armed Forces Joint Command and relieved of their command two generals who had direct responsibility for the Ayacucho Emergency Zone. The President and senior military officials subsequently made numerous statements demanding an end to extrajudicial killings and announced a revision of counterterrorist strategy. The eight implicated individuals have been charged in both the military and the civilian court systems; the Supreme Court is to decide final jurisdiction. Local human rights groups applauded the Government's steps, but called for investigations into earlier cases of reported killings, and for assurances that alleged offenders would be tried in civilian courts.

The deaths of 30 terrorists in October during a police search of Lurigancho Prison led to additional allegations of extrajudicial killings. However, the Government offered persuasive evidence that other prisoners had caused the fire that killed 26 of the 30 inmates who died, and that police had not abused their authority.

In another case, the Chamber of Deputies Human Rights Commission confirmed the finding of a mass grave with 15 bodies including 7 children in the town of Bellavista. According to campesinos, the killing took place on September 3 by military men. Reportedly there are other graves in the area still not dug up. Further, according to newspaper reports, other mass graves had been discovered in the town of Huacar containing bodies of people who had previously been arrested by security forces.

As part of its antiterrorist campaign, the Government has made clear its desire to incorporate insurgents into democratic society, if they renounce violence. In September, the Government created a Peace Commission, composed of six private citizens, with a mandate to study dialogue with the terrorists and the possibility of amnesty. Sendero has rejected dialogue to date and the Commission had by the end of the year made little headway. Some commissioners complained they were not receiving sufficient government support. In October the Government announced that two groups comprised of over 150 Sendero terrorists and peasant support members had turned themselves over to the authorities and had sought their protection.

b. Disappearance

Domestic and international human rights groups have expressed serious concern about disappearances allegedly carried out by the security forces. Working with local human rights groups, Amnesty International presented a list of about 1,100 disappearance cases to the Government in early 1985. Local groups submitted about 500 of these cases with fuller documentation in June to the United Nations Human Rights Commission Working Group on Forced or Involuntary Disappearances. According to these groups, about 180 additional disappearances occurred between January and August, a figure which reflected a significant decrease in the number of new reports of disappearance cases. The Belaunde Government admitted some excesses had occurred, but claimed that the number of disappearance cases was exaggerated and indicated that it would submit evidence to back these claims to the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

Almost all of the disappearances are alleged to have been carried out by the military or the police, generally in the Ayacucho Emergency Zone. Peruvian human rights groups believe that victims frequently are detained in military installations. Although some individuals eventually are freed or legally detained, most remain unaccounted for. The fact that the seven persons killed by the security forces in Pucayacu had all been detained immediately prior to their deaths has been cited by human rights groups as evidence that disappearances continued to be a problem, notwithstanding the overall decline in alleged cases since the beginning of 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and inhumane or humiliating treatment. Nevertheless, charges of security force brutality toward detainees and accused criminals have been commonplace since the military first took control of the emergency zone in December 1982. Although such accusations are frequently difficult to verify, a local prosecutor affirmed that the bodies of the seven Pucayacu victims bore signs of torture. Survivors of the Accomarca killings claim that soldiers raped numerous female victims before killing them. A Senate Commission, however, was unable to prove this allegation. Local human rights groups and criminal lawyers generally concur privately that police frequently engage in abusive practices toward accused persons, such as beatings. Prison conditions in Peru are extremely poor, and detained persons are likely to encounter limited hygienic facilities, poor nutrition, ill-treatment by prison staff, and abuses by other prisoners who take advantage of lax prison supervision. The Garcia administration has expressed outrage over these conditions and has acknowledged the need to improve them, particularly conditions of dangerous and violent criminals (including terrorists) and female prisoners (whose minor children frequently live with them in prison). The Government has also initiated a major anti-corruption drive to end abusive practices, including the dismissal of 369 police officers.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires that persons arrested be arraigned within 24 hours, except in cases of alleged drug trafficking, terrorism, or espionage, for which the limit is 15 days. Arraignment normally occurs in a timely manner. Arrested persons are entitled to have an attorney present when they make statements to the police. Public prosecutors (from the Public Ministry) customarily are also present during such statements, and they are supposed to ensure that statements are not made under threat or coercion. Human rights groups continue to express concern that these safeguards are not always respected by authorities in terrorism cases in areas under a state of emergency.

Though not mentioned specifically in the Constitution, habeas corpus is a concept in Peruvian law supported by the Constitution and respected in practice. However, the state of emergency permits authorities to detain individuals indefinitely in those areas in which it is in effect. Local human rights groups claim that security forces in the Ayacucho Emergency Zone frequently detain citizens arbitrarily for brief periods, but the groups lack overall statistics on the number of such incidents. Although bail is available in most cases, in practice the Government successfully seeks to deny it to persons accused of terrorism.

PERU

The Constitution prohibits compulsory labor or unpaid personal service.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Peruvian judiciary is an independent branch of government. Judicial appointments are for life; only Supreme Court justices require legislative approval. The legal system is based on the Napoleonic Code. Once criminal charges are filed, a judge determines whether probable cause exists. The next step is a judicial hearing process that may last up to five months, followed by a public trial. Sentences may be appealed, and courts may send cases back to lower courts for additional investigations. Although public defenders exist, their numbers are inadequate; most defendants must pay for legal counsel or depend upon pro bono lawyers, including some provided by Peru's human rights organizations. For security reasons, all terrorism trials are held in Lima; most persons accused of terrorism are held without bail in Lima prisons.

The courts face severe backlogs, the product of the sharp increase in cases of alleged terrorism, inefficiency, and, according to some observers, influence peddling. According to the Government, 17,000 of Peru's 22,000 prisoners have not been sentenced and remain at some stage in the trial process. Local human rights groups have documented numerous cases of persons who have been detained, without bail, awaiting trial for periods up to four years. In September the Government dispatched 100 additional prosecutors to a Lima prison in order to reduce this backlog. Terrorists reportedly have threatened judges handling terrorism cases and in October took one hostage for eleven hours.

Throughout 1985, Marxist opposition parties denounced the detention of between 150 and 300 alleged political prisoners. The opposition maintained that most of these persons had not committed violent crimes, but rather had been accused under the broad antiterrorism statute to punish them for carrying out legitimate political or labor union activity. Both the Belaunde and Garcia administrations have denied the existence of such political prisoners. In his July inaugural address, President Garcia recognized that some persons might have been arrested unjustly, and called upon the executive and judicial branches to address the problem. In September the President announced the formation of the Peace Commission, one of whose duties is to study individual cases and recommend presidential pardons where merited. Several dozen alleged political prisoners reportedly have been freed since July; about 150 remain in jail.

The Constitution requires that civilians be tried in civilian courts. A separate military court system exists for military offenders. There is wide disagreement over the conditions under which military members can be tried in the civilian court system.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution stipulates that police require a judicial warrant to enter a private dwelling, which is generally respected in practice. The requirement for a warrant is suspended in areas under a state of emergency, and security forces in those areas routinely conduct searches of private homes without a warrant.

PERU

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and the press, and these rights are honored in practice. The media reflect viewpoints across the political spectrum and frequently criticize the Government. Neither the Belaunde nor the Garcia administration has sought to censor the media. In October the Government annulled the law of disrespect (Ley de Desacato) under which some journalists had been charged in previous years. Journalists are not required to belong to a professional association. In addition to the numerous privately owned media outlets, the Government owns two newspapers, two television and radio networks, and a news service.

The declaration of a state of emergency does not affect freedom of speech and press. However, legal restrictions on travel, as well as the threat of terrorist violence, have restricted journalists' work in the emergency zones. Two journalists were killed during 1985, one by an unidentified assailant and one by a police officer; motives for both killings were unclear.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These rights are expressly guaranteed in the Constitution and are normally respected in practice. Municipal authorities are usually forthcoming in approving permits for demonstrations. For the most part, the Government deals with even unauthorized demonstrations in a non-confrontational manner. The right to assembly is among those specifically suspended in those areas under a state of emergency.

The Constitution guarantees private workers the right to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike. Unions are required to engage in direct negotiation and to seek conciliation (at the Ministry of Labor) prior to any strike action. Public sector workers (except for the armed forces and high officials) have similar rights. In practice, all workers organize and strike freely.

According to the Government, 17.5 percent of the work force is organized. Total membership in Communist and other far left unions is larger than that in democratically-oriented unions. Unions generally are not formally linked with political parties, but important national confederations are identified with particular political tendencies, ranging from the far left to the government party. Union leaders are consulted regularly by the government. Peruvian labor organizations affiliate freely with regional and international trade union organizations of all ideological tendencies. Peru is an active member of the International Labor Organization (ILO).

The Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO has criticized the Government for failing, despite numerous requests, to respond to charges that arrests and violent deaths occurred during a general strike in 1983.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Roman Catholic faith is overwhelmingly predominant in Peru, and the Constitution formally recognizes the Church's importance. The Constitution also establishes the independence of church and state and guarantees freedom of religion and conscience. These rights are respected fully in practice. Members of minority religions encounter no difficulty in practicing their faith or in exempting their children from religious instruction in public schools. Missionary organizations operate freely in the country with the cooperation of government ministries.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees the right of free movement and prohibits the exile of citizens. There are no political or legal constraints on foreign travel or emigration. Freedom of movement is suspended in those areas governed by a state of emergency.

Peru is a signatory of the 1967 United Nations Protocol on the Status of Refugees. Persons fleeing turmoil in other countries traditionally have been encouraged to return eventually to their country of origin, but have not been forced to do so. Involuntary repatriation occurs only in the cases of persons accused of nonpolitical crimes.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Peru is a democracy governed by a freely elected President and Congress. The political process is completely open and is vigorously contested by groups ranging from conservative to Marxist. Suffrage is universal for persons over 18 years old (except for members of the military). In April 1985 Peru had free and fair elections for a president, two vice-presidents, and 240 members of the two houses of Congress. In July the incumbent administration (whose Popular Action party was defeated in the elections) turned power over to the rival American Popular Revolutionary Alliance Party (APRA), marking the first transfer of power between democratically elected presidents in 40 years. The current president's party has a majority in the congress.

Leadership of the various parties tends to be dominated by the urban elite, whose educational, financial, and communications resources give them advantages over rural-based elements. Indians and the small black community remain underrepresented at top levels of all governmental institutions and professional associations. The new Government has made it a top priority to increase the flow of resources and attention to the poor, largely Indian, rural areas.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Amnesty International and Americas Watch expressed serious concern during 1985 about extrajudicial killings, disappearances, torture, and arbitrary detention in Peru. The Belaunde administration reluctantly admitted that unauthorized excesses had occurred in the course of the antiterrorism campaign in isolated cases but continued to dispute the veracity of complaints made by these groups, as well as by domestic human rights groups. The Government claimed that the vast majority of the 1,100 disappearance cases presented by Amnesty International involved persons who had been legally detained, or involved fictitious persons. The Government facilitated working visits to Peru by the United Nations Human Rights Commission's Working Group on Forced Disappearances in June, and by an international group in July that included Nobel Prize winner Adolfo Perez Esquivel.

The new Garcia administration has welcomed investigations by domestic or foreign groups in human rights. A recent editorial in the government-owned daily La Cronica lauded Amnesty International and its 1985 World Report. The newly established Senate Human Rights Commission played a major role in the investigation of the Pucayacu and Accomarca killings. While voicing concern about the human rights situation, local human rights groups have reacted favorably to the new Government's approach and believe they have much better access to officials than before.

A number of human rights groups exist in Peru. In January, 1985, thirteen groups formed the National Coordinator of Human Rights. The three largest groups are the Association for Human Rights (APRODEH), formed in 1983; the Evangelical Commission for Social Action (CEAS), a Catholic church group; and the National Commission of Human Rights (CONADEH), formed in 1980. Lima is also the headquarters of the Regional Andean Commission of Jurists. In September the Government formed a Peace Commission composed of private citizens, including a member of the Catholic Church hierarchy. It was charged with seeking a dialogue with terrorists, with a view to reincorporating the latter into democratic society. It was also to have begun to study pardons for persons who are allegedly unjustly accused of terrorism.

Although local groups remained concerned about the human rights situation, they acknowledged that the new Government had carried out unprecedented steps to assert its constitutionally mandated authority over the military and to address human rights violations.

Freedom House rates Peru "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Peru's population was estimated at 19.7 million in 1985, growing at an annual rate of 2.6 percent. Per capita gro was calculated at $1,040 in 1983, down from $1,254 in 1982.

Composed of several distinct geographic regions, Peru is a classic case of differential development. Public investment traditionally has been focused on the coast, drawing migrants to the cities, especially Lima. The one-third of the population in the capital area accounts for two-thirds of gross domestic product (GDP). Many Indians live in Peru's poorest regions in the mountains. Development efforts have been impeded by the difficulty and cost of providing services to areas remote from the mainstream of the dominant hispanicized culture and the centers of economic activity. As a result of this dichotomy and of historical prejudices, the economic and social needs of Peruvians of European ancestry are more likely to be met than those of mixed or pure Indian heritage.

Natural disasters and low commodity prices have had a negative impact on Peru's economy. The new Government has implemented a wage and price freeze and has promised an austerity budget, with important consequences for Peru's economic future. The Government has also promised that assistance to the distressed agricultural sector will be one of its top priorities. During the latter half of 1985, inflation dropped from an annualized rate of about 200 percent to between 43 and 51 percent. About 60 percent of the labor force is either unemployed or underemployed. Foreign debt in 1985 reached $13.5 billion. Peru received an estimated $800 million annually in foreign assistance during 1983-1985. The new Government changed the previous policy of carrying out frequent mini-devaluations and has maintained a stable foreign exchange rate.

Life expectancy at birth is 58 years, with an infant mortality rate of 96 per thousand. The literacy rate is 72 percent. Some 84 percent of children between the ages of 6 and 14 are enrolled in school. Fifty-one percent of the population have access to safe water and 70 percent have access to some type of health care. Figures for 1977 indicate that 49 percent of the urban population was below the absolute poverty level; although statistics on rural poverty are unavailable, the situation in those areas probably is worse.

Peruvian law prohibits the employment of children under 14, but it allows the employment of older children who are literate. Although minimum-age legislation generally is enforced in all sectors of the official economic system, chronic social problems lead many destitute children to seek a living on the streets. The present administration has launched a campaign to protect these minors.

Employers are required by law to pay workers the minimum wage. Ministry of Labor inspectors are charged with enforcing compliance with workplace safety and health regulations. Both public and private sector employees are covered under the state-run Social Security Institute health plan. Workers have benefited from an eight-hour workday since 1918, and the official work week is forty hours.

Women represent 26 percent of the Peruvian labor force. In 1984, 61.9 percent of the female workforce was employed in commerce and services, 16.6 percent in the industrial sector and the remaining 19.5 percent in other occupations (mainly as domestics). The average wage of male workers is double that of females. Women are well represented in government and professional occupations, although not as well in large businesses. There are three women in the 60-member Senate, and there are 10 women in the Chamber of Deputies (out of 180). Several women's groups exist in Peru, but the scope of their activities is limited compared with that of human rights groups. The Constitution grants women equality with men, and laws on marriage and divorce do not discriminate against women. Nevertheless, tradition still tends to impede the access of women to leadership roles in major social and political institutions. A similar situation is faced by the rural indigenous population and by Peru's small black community. The former group traditionally has lacked access to public goods and services. The new Government has vowed to increase public resources to the rural poor.

ST. CHRISTOPHER AND NEVIS

St. Christopher and Nevis (commonly called St. Kitts) which received independence from the United Kingdom in 1983, has a government modeled on the British parliamentary system with elections at least every 5 years. The political opposition is active and vocal. The Constitution provides the smaller island of Nevis considerable self-government, as well as the right to secede from the federation if certain enumerated procedures, including 6-months notice, are followed.

Security forces consist of a small police force which includes a small Special Service Unit with some paramilitary training.

St. Christopher and Nevis has a mixed economic system. Most commercial enterprises are privately owned, but the sugar industry--the country's largest--and 85 percent of all arable land are owned by state corporations.

The country's human rights record continued to be good during 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No political killings were reported in 1985.

b. Disappearance

No politically motivated abductions, extralegal detentions or disappearances were reported in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Law enforcement authorities abide by the constitutional prohibitions against the use of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Prisoners are housed in an outmoded jail; family members, attorneys, and clergy are permitted to visit detainees regularly.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and detention. Habeas corpus provisions require that persons detained be brought before a court within 48 hours. Opposition politicians have made unsubstantiated charges that the present Government has been involved in politically motivated arrests. There were no reported cases of exile. Although there is no known legal provision against it, forced or compulsory labor is not known to take place in St. Christopher and Nevis.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution requires that every person accused of a crime receive a fair, speedy, and public trial. The judiciary is highly regarded and independent. Like most of the English-speaking Caribbean, St. Christopher and Nevis is served by the West Indies Court of Appeal. Legal assistance is available to indigent defendants.

ST. CHRISTOPHER AND NEVIS

- f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Neither the Government nor police interfere arbitrarily in the private lives of individuals. Warrants are required to search private homes.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

- a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. St. Christopher-Nevis does not have a major daily newspaper. Each of the large political parties publishes a weekly or biweekly newspaper, and there are regional church-funded newspapers. International news publications are readily available. The Government owns and operates the only television station, but opposing political views are freely debated on television as well as on the commercial radio station.

- b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right of peaceful assembly. Organized demonstrations, rallies, and public meetings sponsored by political parties occur regularly without government interference. Labor unions are free to organize and to negotiate for better wages and benefits for union members.

- c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees the free exercise of religion, and there are no restrictions on religious practices. Most church members belong to Protestant denominations.

- d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel inside and outside of the federation is unrestricted. Kittitian citizens resident in other countries are free to return at any time.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The multiparty political system encompasses a wide variety of political views. Suffrage is universal over age 18. Political parties are free to conduct their activities, and every party holds some type of annual convention.

The current Government is a coalition of two of the three major political parties: the People's Action Movement, led by Prime Minister Kennedy Simmonds, and the Nevis Reformation Party, headed by Simeon Daniel, the Premier of Nevis and Minister of Natural Resources and Environment. In June 1984 national elections, the coalition strengthened its mandate by winning 9 of the 11 elected seats in the federal Parliament.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Internationally recognized human rights organizations have not commented on the human rights situation, nor has anyone requested an investigation or called for inquiries into alleged violations. The Government is firmly committed to the promotion of human rights and takes criticism related to human rights seriously.

ST. CHRISTOPHER AND NEVIS

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The nation's economy is emerging from a period of decline. The world recession of the early 1980s, coupled with a steep decline in sugar prices, resulted in economic stagnation. Total government revenues needed for capital development projects fell. Per capita gross national product (GNP) was an estimated US $824 in 1982.

The Government has developed a program of economic diversification to increase earnings in tourism, manufacturing, and agricultural production other than sugar. The sugar industry remains the single most important revenue producer in the economy, accounting for 11.9 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP) in 1983.

The population, estimated at 41,000, had a negative growth rate in 1985, averaging minus 1.2. percent. The nation's birth rate is 24 per 1,000; the infant mortality rate remains high at 39.5 per 1,000 live births.

The minimum legal working age is 14. The work week is 40 hours in 5 days, and workers are guaranteed a minimum vacation of 2 weeks. Although a minimum wage is established by law, it is arguably less than that on which a person can be reasonably expected to live.

The role of women in society is not restricted by law. Women's participation in public life got a boost in the June, 1984 election, when Constance Mitcham won a seat in Parliament, defeating the leader of the opposition. Ms. Mitcham was then named Minister of Women's Affairs.

ST. LUCIA

A member of the British Commonwealth, St. Lucia has a multiparty parliamentary democracy. The current Prime Minister, John Compton, was democratically elected in May 1982.

Although political disruption marked the two years following independence from the United Kingdom, constitutional processes prevailed. Political stability has been enhanced by 4 years of economic growth, but high unemployment and a fragile economy remain sources of potential instability.

The police are the only security force in St. Lucia. Its small Special Service Unit has received some paramilitary training, and participated in military maneuvers with other nations of the region which are members of the Regional Security System. St. Lucia is also developing a coast guard. The nation's security forces are small but are imbued with traditions of integrity, professionalism, and respect for human rights.

St. Lucia continues to have an excellent human rights record.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of killing for political motives in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In December 1984, a murder suspect, Alphonsus Fontenard, died under questionable circumstances while in police custody. A government inquest concluded that the suspect was shot by police officers acting in self-defense.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution, which prohibits arbitrary arrest or imprisonment, provides that persons arrested be brought before a court within 72 hours. The Government honors these provisions in practice. There were no reports of arbitrary arrests or other forms of detention or forced exile in 1985. The "Women and Young Persons Acts" prohibit forced or compulsory labor; the law is respected in practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution mandates public trials before an independent and impartial court and guarantees the provision of legal counsel to indigents. Accused persons are presumed innocent until proven guilty. The regional West Indies Court of Appeal, long known for its impartiality, serves as St. Lucia's court of appeals.

ST. LUCIA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Constitutional prohibitions against arbitrary search, seizure, and entry are observed by the authorities. There were no reports of arbitrary intrusion of the State into the private lives of individual citizens in 1985.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional guarantees of free speech and press are respected in practice. St. Lucia has two newspapers reflecting contrasting opinions. A television station is privately owned and controlled. The Government owns and operates Radio St. Lucia, and a religious organization operates another radio station. The Government does not censor the news or communications media.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no legal or practical restrictions on public meetings in St. Lucia. Political opposition groups organize and conduct activities freely.

Workers have the right to form trade unions, to elect their officers, to conduct union activities free of government intervention, and to engage in collective bargaining. The right to strike exists in the private sector if government-sponsored efforts to resolve disputes fail. Trade unions represent the majority of wage and salary earners and play a prominent role in the nation's economic and political life.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no religious discrimination in St. Lucia. The majority of the population is Roman Catholic.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees these rights and they are generally honored in practice. The Government did not permit 16 St. Lucian citizens to travel to Libya in 1983, on national security grounds. Alleging that the group was to receive terrorist training, the Government revoked their passports. It still holds the passports of several of the original sixteen, thus restricting their travel outside St. Lucia.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

St. Lucia has a parliamentary system of government under which citizens have a genuine choice of parties, policies, and officials. The nation's political life continues to be vigorous. Opposition parties play an active role in and out of Parliament, where they hold 3 of 17 seats. Parliamentary elections were last held in 1982 and by law must be held again before May 1987.

ST. LUCIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

International human rights bodies filed no reports or requests for investigations into human rights violations in 1985. The multidominational St. Lucia Christian Council is the major domestic organization following human rights issues. Amnesty International did not mention St. Lucia in its 1985 report. Freedom House rates St. Lucia as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Half of St. Lucia's population of 122,000 is under 25 years of age. The 1985 population growth rate was 1.1 percent. Emigration elsewhere in the Caribbean, to the U.S., Canada, and the United Kingdom is high.

The economy relies heavily on banana exports and subsistence agriculture. Bananas account for about 60 percent of the country's export earnings. The per capita gross national product (GNP) was estimated at US $962 per year in 1982.

In an effort to expand secondary schooling, St. Lucia has channeled more than 20 percent of its total recurrent budget expenditures into education over the past 6 years. Education is compulsory between the ages of 5 and 15. The nation's elementary schools enroll 95 percent of those eligible, but shortages of facilities and classroom space limit secondary school enrollment. The literacy rate is estimated to be over 75 percent.

The national insurance scheme pays for most medical care; in-patient care at the general hospital is free of charge and 97 percent of the population has access to health care centers within 3 miles of home.

St. Lucia's infant mortality rate is 19.9 per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth is approximately 69.8 years. One-hundred percent of the population has access to safe water.

The minimum legal working age in St. Lucia is 14. The workweek is 40 hours in 5 days and workers are guaranteed a minimum annual vacation of 2 weeks. Some of the provisions of an occupational safety law passed in 1985 are being disputed by labor unions. Although no minimum wage is established by law, a government-established Wage Council reviews wage rates in different sectors and makes recommendations which are generally accepted as having the force of law. The wages set by this procedure are arguably less than that on which a person can be reasonably expected to live.

There are no legal restrictions on the role of women in St. Lucia. Although the more traditional household role is the predominant one for St. Lucian women, they are well-represented in government and the professions. As more women take advantage of public schooling and other government programs, the participation of women in other sectors of society is expected to increase.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

St. Vincent and the Grenadines retains the multiparty parliamentary system of government which it inherited upon independence from the United Kingdom in 1979. Democratic traditions and respect for the rights of the individual have continued since independence. In July 1984, the New Democratic Party led by James F. Mitchell defeated the ruling St. Vincent Labor Party led by incumbent Prime Minister Milton Cato in peaceful, democratic elections.

The Royal St. Vincent Police is the only security force in the country. A small Special Service Unit with some paramilitary training has been established within the police force, and a Marine Wing created under police command to serve as St. Vincent's coast guard. Some members of the Marine Wing are not police officers. The St. Vincent police maintain traditions of professionalism which place a high value on respect for human rights.

A poor country with a very young population, (half under 15 years of age), St. Vincent's most serious problem is unemployment. The nation's economy remained sluggish in 1985 mainly because of a slow recovery from the world-wide recession and exchange rate reductions which affected the vital banana industry.

The country's human rights record remained good during 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killing in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1985.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that persons detained for criminal offenses be provided legal representation and that their cases be reviewed periodically. The Government assiduously follows these provisions. There were no reports of arbitrary arrests, or summary exile in 1985.

Although there is no known legal prohibition against forced or compulsory labor, such practices are not known to take place in St. Vincent.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for public trials before an independent and impartial court. Criminal defendants have the right to legal counsel, are presumed innocent until proven guilty, and have the right of appeal, ultimately to the Privy Council in London.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry, search, and seizure; this prohibition is honored in practice by law enforcement authorities. There were no reports of arbitrary search and seizure, or other government intrusions into the private life of individual citizens in 1985.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press, and the Government respects these rights. The Government neither censors nor interferes in the operation of newspapers, which openly and freely criticize it.

b Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to assemble peaceably is respected in practice.

The Government has adhered to the International Labor Organization's Convention on Freedom of Association. Unions enjoy the right of collective bargaining and the right to strike; they represent approximately 7,000 workers (slightly more than 10 percent of the labor force).

c. Freedom of Religion

All religions are free to practice and proselytize in St. Vincent and the Grenadines.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are guaranteed by law and honored in practice.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

St. Vincent has a parliamentary system of government in which citizens have a genuine choice of parties. In the 1984 general elections, the opposition New Democratic Party won an overwhelming electoral victory, winning 9 of the 13 seats in Parliament.

In August 1985, the Speaker of the House of Assembly excluded opposition parliamentarians from a debate on the budget. The following month, both the Speaker and Deputy Speaker resigned from their positions after a vote of no confidence. Prime Minister Mitchell asked the Speaker to resign because of alleged malfeasance.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international human rights organizations maintain offices in St. Vincent. Although there is no local body which publicly monitors human rights violations, opposition political groups occasionally comment on human rights practices. The Government is responsive to public and private inquiries on its human rights practices. Amnesty International did not comment on St. Vincent in its 1985 report. Freedom House rated the country as "free."

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

With a population of 101,000 inhabitants, St. Vincent and the Grenadines is a small, poor country with a moderately growing population (.9 percent growth in 1985). Per capita gross national product (GNP) in 1982 was estimated at $616. The nation's economy relies heavily on an ailing agricultural sector; bananas are the principal export crop.

The Government has identified several programs essential to economic progress, including development of basic infrastructure, assistance to the outlying Grenadine islands, development of tourism, and implementation of a land reform program (including public sector divestiture of parastatal enterprises in the agricultural sector).

The Government's development policies emphasize education: education is compulsory for 10 years. The adult literacy rate is about 95.6 percent.

Health care is hampered by the shortage of funds, facilities, and personnel. Health care facilities have improved in recent years, but many of St. Vincent's best-trained personnel migrate each year, chiefly to earn higher wages. St. Vincent's infant mortality rate is 40 per 1,000 live births.

The minimum working age is 15. The workweek is 40 hours in 5 days, and workers are guaranteed a minimum annual vacation of 2 weeks. The Government is currently endeavoring to convert loose arrangements covering occupational safety and health into statutes. The minimum wage established by law is arguably not enough on which a person can be reasonably expected to live.

The role of women in society is not restricted by law, but custom dictates that most Vincentian women center their lives around the home. As women take greater advantage of public education programs, health facilities, and family planning, many observers expect the women of St. Vincent and the Grenadines to participate in larger numbers in the nation's economic, professional, and political life.

SURINAME

Suriname has been governed by the military since the 1980 coup which overthrew its elected Government and suspended the Constitution. Since the coup, political power has been exercised or delegated by Leader of the Revolution and Commander of the Armed Forces, Lieutenant Colonel Desire D. Bouterse and by other members of the military authority. In 1985, Suriname continued to operate under an official state of emergency.

In January 1985, a new Cabinet consisting of nominees of the military, labor and business was installed under Prime Minister Wim Udenhout and given a mandate by the military to govern until March 31, 1987, the end of the announced transitional period to "democracy." The military, organized labor and organized business also nominated members to a new National Assembly whose main tasks include the writing of a constitution, approving a budget, and legislating. In August, the Assembly approved a decree formalizing the de facto role of the military in the government by naming Commander Bouterse as "Head of Government" and by identifying the five-member "Military Authority" as a component of the Government. However, the military has said that, when the Constitution is completed and has received popular approval, it will hand over governing power to new constitutional authorities.

Suriname's predominantly free market economy came increasingly under government regulation in 1985--primarily through allocations of scarce foreign exchange and import licenses to importers and manufacturers. Economic conditions worsened rapidly because of a shortage of foreign exchange, and companies engaged in importing and commerce suffered a sharp decline in trade. Unemployment has risen less rapidly than it might have, because layoffs are forbidden without government approval.

The human rights situation in Suriname showed some signs of modest progress in 1985 as violations attributable to government actions declined further. There were serious abuses in the expulsion of 5,000 illegal Guyanese residents. The powers of the military police were expanded. Showing sensitivity to expressions of international concern, the Government in August brought the long-awaited "Civil Rights and Duties Commission" into existence. Political rights, however, are still denied, and Surinamers remain intimidated by the regime.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

There were no known cases of killing with political motivation or at Government instigation in 1985. In its 1985 Human Rights report on Suriname, however, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) reported allegations concerning several assassination attempts on the lives of political opponents of the Government living abroad.

SURINAME

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence that the Government sponsored abductions or kidnappings by governmental or non-governmental forces, nor were there any reports of such disappearances during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Approximately five thousand Guyanese who were allegedly in Suriname illegally were rounded up and deported in January and February 1985. Many were detained and moved to the border without being allowed to collect their children or property. During their overnight detention in an abandoned banana warehouse at the border town of Nieuw Nickerie, hundreds of Guyanese were denied access to adequate sanitary facilities, food and water, and at least one child is said to have died under these circumstances. Following a public outcry by the churches, the military police stopped the operation in February.

The 1985 IACHR report on Suriname sharply contrasts prison conditions found in such military installations as Fort Zeelandia with those of regular state penitentiaries such as Santo Boma Prison. The report describes Fort Zeelandia's temporary brig as "badly over-crowded, filthy, with only the most primitive facilities." It describes Santo Boma as a "truly model facility" where regular school classes and trades are taught and where guards and administrative authorities are "well prepared educationally for their jobs."

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile

During 1985 the only known case of arbitrary arrest involved a young man who was taken into custody in July for having written a book which the authorities described as subversive. He was arrested by the military police and held incommunicado for over five days. The Court decided that there was insufficient evidence to detain the man and he was released after having been detained for a total of approximately nine days.

According to Surinamese law, a person suspected of having committed a crime the sentence for which is longer than four years, may be detained by the police for investigation for up to fourteen days before being brought before a court to be charged. He may be detained longer only if a judge decides that there is sufficient evidence to justify the charge. There is no provision for bail during this period.

There is no forced or compulsory labor in Suriname.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The civil court system provides fair public trials when the accused are turned over to the civil authorities, and there were no known cases in 1985 of military police not adhering to this practice. The judiciary continues to maintain its independence and to act properly in cases referred to it.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Military police in 1985 entered homes and businesses without warrants to conduct searches. The People's Militia and the February 25 Movement are organizations which have the power to monitor what people say and to act as informers to the authorities. Information on how this power is used is lacking. There are no known cases of persons having been forced to join or actively support these organizations, though benefits do accrue to those who do. It is widely believed that there is widespread wiretapping by the Government of private conversations. Some letters from overseas are suspected of being opened by the Government while in the post office.

SURINAME

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

People have not forgotten the events of December 8 and 9, 1982, when fifteen prominent opposition leaders were killed while in government custody; they remain circumspect about publicly criticizing the regime.

The press is not free; the Government continues to censure editors who publish what it does not like. In January 1985 the editor of one newspaper was called in and told to correct his "unpatriotic" reporting. He had printed a story on an internal Colombian matter on page one and had relegated a dispatch on Commander Bouterse's visit to Colombia to an inside page. In February, the editor of a church newspaper was called in by the authorities and warned that he was liable to be prosecuted for his criticism of the Government for its round-up and treatment of Guyanese alleged to have been in Suriname illegally. In July, the editor of a weekly was told to correct an article because it had insulted a high government official. The editor asked by letter which part of the article should be corrected and how. He did not receive a reply and no corrections were made. Similar pressures were experienced by the privately owned radio stations.

In April 1985, a new, privately owned radio station was opened; there are now three privately owned radio stations and one public radio station. There is one government-owned television station. There are two private daily newspapers and one private weekly newspaper. In addition, the Catholic and Moravian churches each publish a small weekly newspaper which often carry articles critical of the Government. The Lutheran and Reformed churches publish a combined monthly journal.

Surinamers listen freely to independent shortwave broadcasts from abroad, most especially to the Radio Netherlands World Service. There is no attempt by the Government to restrict this practice. Indeed, the Government complains often and loudly about Radio Netherlands' reports on Suriname, thus showing that it also carefully monitors these daily reports.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political rallies which do not support the military and the Government are not permitted. Although pre-coup political parties had been banned for the past five years, some of their leaders met throughout the year with representatives of the Government to discuss democratization plans. Beginning on September 30, 1985, leaders of the three largest parties were authorized to meet with their members once again. People may assemble freely for social purposes. Initially, the Government strictly limited the number of persons allowed to meet party leaders, in one instance stationing an armored car at the meeting place to assure compliance with the headcount restriction. From December onward the numerical restrictions were relaxed. People may assemble freely for social purposes. Religious associations, clubs and fraternal societies operate without government interference.

Labor organizing, union elections, wage negotiations, and labor actions, including strikes, normally take place freely. However, labor leaders continue to be cautious in their dealings with the Government. Such caution is an indication of lingering intimidation prompted by the December 1982 killings of 15 prominent critics of the regime while they were being held in government custody. About half the labor force is unionized. Union and business associations affiliate with international bodies as they see fit. Three of Suriname's four labor federations and two business associations participate in the Government. This year business and labor nominated several cabinet ministers and named their respective representatives to the new National Assembly.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is freedom of worship. No one religion is favored above any other, nor is there discrimination against members of any religious group. Articles and programs sponsored by religious groups appear in the newspapers and on radio and television. Religious groups publish what they like without advance censorship, maintain international contacts as they wish and freely organize trips abroad. Despite the serious shortage of foreign exchange, the Government took steps to assure that an important pilgrimage to Mecca could take place. The Government allocated scarce foreign exchange to allow for the printing abroad of a commemoration book for another religious group. Foreign clergy are allowed to minister to the needs of both local and expatriate congregations. However, in August 1985, one foreign priest was expelled from the country for making statements from his pulpit critical of the Government's human rights abuses. Missionaries are allowed to enter the country and to proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

Surinamers generally may travel as they wish, both within the country and abroad. There were two known cases of the authorities seizing or denying passports to persons to prevent them from traveling freely abroad. Both individuals were associated with opposition political views. Surinamers may move residences and change workplaces freely. They may take abroad only the equivalent of $297 in currency per year, unless a special license is obtained, which is difficult to do. In order to buy a ticket to a destination other than Suriname Airways' terminal points, Surinamers must apply for a special license for the foreign exchange. These restrictions are the result of the extreme shortage of foreign exchange and were not instituted for political reasons. Surinamers may emigrate without interference. They may return to take up residence in Suriname at anytime, even after long periods abroad. In general, Surinamers who are identified with the pre-coup Government are not harassed. However, those regarded as enemies by the current regime would likely fear for their safety if they returned to the country. In its 1985 Human Rights report on Suriname, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights expressed concern over reports of harassment, intimidation, and in some cases, the attempted assassination of political opponents of the Government living abroad.

SURINAME

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Surinamers have been denied the right to change their government by democratic means since 1980. Effective power rests in the hands of the five member Military Authority which retains or delegates power as it sees fit. There have been no political elections since the military coup of February 1980. By decree the chairman of the Military Authority, Commander Desi Bouterse, was made Head of Government in August 1985 and the Government was composed of military, labor and business groups. A 31-member National Assembly was appointed in January 1985. Fourteen members were nominated by the military. Labor unions and a business association nominated the other 17 members. The principal task of the Assembly is the drafting of a new Constitution. The Assembly also has certain legislative powers. During 1985, leaders of Suriname's traditional political parties began a series of discussions with the Military Authority regarding future democratic political structures, which led to a signed agreement on November 23 between the military and the political leaders to continue the discussions, the goal of which is restoration of democracy. As a result of this agreement, each of the three parties nominated two members to participate in discussions on questions of a political or administrative nature in the Supreme Council, the top policy-making body of the Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In January 1985, the Government accepted a visit of a delegation of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. The delegates met with government, labor, business and church leaders and visited social projects.

In March 1985, the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees's special rapporteur on summary or arbitrary executions, Mr. S. Amos Wako, was released. According to the report, "summary or arbitrary executions took place on the night of 8-9 December (1982) in Fort Zeelandia...It was universally acknowledged to the special rapporteur that, in looking to the future, summary or arbitrary executions can be prevented if democracy is restored."

In August 1985, the Government appointed five persons to the "National Institute of Basic Rights and Duties of the Surinamese People," the long-awaited human rights commission. The Institute has as its main tasks the furthering of respect for the fundamental rights and duties of man, the study of national and international legislation to ensure that Suriname's laws are brought into compliance with international standards, the promotion of cooperation with the UN, the OAS and other organizations in the field of human rights, and the provision of information and support to organizations which wish to be informed about these fundamental rights and duties.

SURINAME

Critics charge that the Institute does not have as part of its specific functions the investigation of individual complaints about human rights abuses. They fear that the Institute may not have the authority nor the ability to conduct independent investigations, and note it does not have an autonomous budget. However, by September 1985, two individual complaints were before the commission. So far, the commission has not acted on the complaints.

There are no nongovernmental human rights organizations within the country. The churches have on occasion spoken out against what they allege to be violations of human rights, most specifically during the campaign to round up aliens illegally in the country in January and February 1985; the Government responded by warning one church newspaper editor that he could be liable for prosecution for what he had written on the issue.

The Government is not actively involved in international or regional human rights bodies dealing with violations in other countries.

Amnesty International Report 1985 mentions judicial developments in the cases of the 14 persons held in military custody, the subject of the 1983 and 1984 reports. Freedom House rates Suriname "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

According to the latest government figures, Suriname has a population of 390,000, and its population growth rate, according to World Bank data for 1985, was two percent per annum. However, the Inter-American Development Bank's planning bureau estimated the population growth rate in 1982 at 3.1 percent per annum, while at least one local government agency puts it at 2.2 percent. Per capita gross national product, according to World Bank data, was $3,420 in 1983.

Suriname's import oriented economy continued to suffer in 1985. Depressed international market prices for bauxite and its derivatives have weakened the country's ability to earn foreign exchange. As a result, many imported consumer goods and raw materials for industry are scarce. The private business sector has been hurt and the standard of living is dropping. Overall unemployment is estimated to be as high as thirty percent even though the government employs forty-two percent of the labor force. During the last decade, the country has lived above its indigenous means. This was possible because of generous amounts of Dutch development aid and, later, a drawing down of reserves. The aid has been suspended, the reserves are now gone, and the standard of living is dropping.

Latest figures available for life expectancy at birth is 66 years; infant mortality is 21 per 1,000 live births; adult literacy is 65 percent. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio in 1978 was 103. In 1979 the caloric supply as a percentage of requirements was 119.

There is little effective government supervision of labor conditions. The Government has few inspectors and many conditions are not covered by regulation or law. For instance, there is no legal minimum wage in Suriname. On the other hand, the country enjoys a highly-developed labor movement with a tradition of effective bargaining over wages, benefits and working conditions. Approximately half of the workforce is organized. The unions are usually able to monitor working conditions and to enforce conditions of labor acceptable to national standards. Wages generally provide for an adequate standard of living for workers. The work-week in most companies is between thirty-nine and forty-five hours long.

The legal minimum age for employment of children is 14 except in the fisheries industry where it is 15. The Government is concerned that worsening economic conditions are encouraging the spread of child labor, and established a commission to study the problem. The commission did not examine the extent, form or causes of child labor, but concluded that economic decline contributed to an increase in child labor. The commission noted that economic growth would cause child labor to decline. The commission recommended that the legal minimum age for employment be raised from twelve to fifteen, that the government begin a study of the extent, form and causes of child labor and improve surveillance and enforcement of existing laws. In areas in which unions are organized, such as in industry and retail establishments, child labor does not exist.

Women have equal access to education and employment, although social pressures and customs still inhibit women from fully exercising these rights. Racial discrimination is prohibited and it is very uncommon in this multi-racial society. However, ethnic consciousness remains strong among all groups.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Trinidad and Tobago is a republic with a parliamentary style government. Its population of about 1.2 million inhabitants is 41 percent black and 41 percent East Indian. The ruling People's National Movement (PNM), traditionally supported by blacks and some East Indians, has governed the country since 1956. Opposition parties have contested every election and currently control 10 of 36 Parliamentary seats as well as the House of Assembly on the sister island of Tobago.

Trinidad and Tobago's legal system is independent and is similar to that of the British, with the Privy Council in London serving as the highest Court of Appeals. Although press reports occasionally allege improprieties on the part of individual officers, the Trinidad and Tobago police service as a whole is capable and professional.

Trinidad and Tobago has the third highest per capita income in the Western Hemisphere, although it has suffered recently as the worldwide oil glut continues to weaken its oil-based economy. The economy is mixed, with whole or partial government ownership of many major industries, but there is a strong tradition of private enterprise and private ownership of property. Social indicators such as longevity and infant mortality are closer to those of the First World than those of the Third World with which the Government identifies itself politically.

Trinidad and Tobago's human rights record remained good in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no politically motivated killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment
